Coolidge

by Warren Chapman

Sunday night, Grant Hall reverberated to the combined sounds of Syrinx and Rita Coolidge & the Dixie Flyers. Syrinx, a Toronto-based group, has composed and played the music for such diverse mediums as the National Ballet and the television programme, "Here Come the 70's". Headed by John Mills-Cockell on the Moog synthesizer and Doug Pringle on the electric sax, they probed into the outer regions of what is accepted as jazz. Syrinx's music, consisting of chromatic melodies and harmonic cross-relations, was hardly engaging at an emotional level. The addition of an extra drummer only served to make the music too heavy on the percussion side. Rather than a smooth flow of sound, the result was sporadic musical fragments. This lack of cohesiveness is undoubtedly in part a result of the developmental aspect of their music, no 'form' as such, yet being defined.

In contrast to Syrinx, the Dixie Flyers provided a complex, rhapsodic, uniquely ordered flow of sound. Rita's voice, sensual in a distinctly personal way, was more than adequately complemented by the suave perfection of Marc Benno and company. The songs ranged from a slow, rhythmic gospel blues with Rita on piano, to light rock ("The Doughnut Man"), to several tightly-put-together boogie numbers. The only criticism that can be leveled at Rita is that her presentations tended to be a little too smooth, lacking that gutsy force that a Joplin could have achieved. This lack of boldness and crudity was especially evident in her rendition of Jones-Bell's 'Born Under A Bad Sign'. Lack of spontaneity is usually the price that is paid for musical refinement.

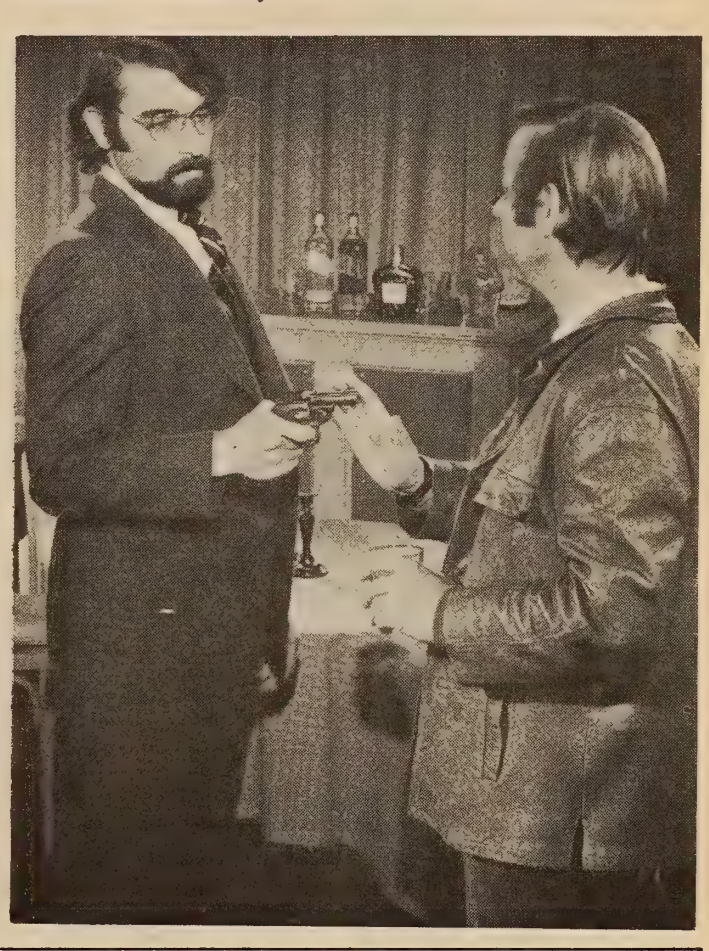
Strangers Reconsidered

by Paul Gompertz

The main problem with reviewing a new play is that it requires two sets of criticism, one for the actors and one for the writer. And yet it is possible that each may observe the other's strengths and failings. 'How can we know the dancer from the dance?' becomes the most important question when considering a production such as this.

"Strangers" is certainly no exception, and it is to the play's credit that it would be far easier to dwell on its success, or at least its promise, and the actors' generally sensitive approach to their parts, than to analyze the weaknesses, which were characterized by occasional hiatus and slackening of dramatic tension. In a case such as this, does the critic extol the virtues and pay passing deference to the flaws? Or will a scrutiny of the flaws within play and production imply the strength of the whole? I think the latter approach is the more profitable, but it is essential to make it known that the criticisms do not pull the play out from under the auspices of the general category "good" or at least "interesting".



The play itself was a well-conceived piece of drama, which stood in the strength of its individual parts rather than of its whole. Some of the dialogue sparkled into life, but at times the lines, particularly the witty and flippant rejoinders characteristic of Woody, lost their naturalness as the author's self-conscious creation of an artefact showed through. They were too pat to use an old, but valuable, cliche.

The plot unfortunately fell between two stools. It was almost credible, but also owed an allegiance to the tenuous created reality that Pinter uses so often, which perhaps led it into its most noticeable failing, its lack of self belief. Just as Pinter's plays, especially such early works as "The Room", do not believe themselves, so "Strangers" did not offer its own validity to the audience. It was a situation conceived for the strength of its internal tensions, which allowed for powerful language. And hence its strength in parts, and not as one unit.

These problems confronted the actors even more than the audience. Fred Euringer, as Woody, was confronted with two insoluble problems, and though his performance was polished and as cogent as the material allowed, he could not carry the whole part. He hid the awkwardness of some of the more self-conscious lines behind his drunkeness, and wisely he did not attempt the impossible task of suggesting latent qualities in his character which most of the play studiously denied, and upon which the end relied. This had the one desired effect of heightening the element of surprise; but it also left too many questions untouched. The younger brother (Christopher Miller) conveyed the right aura of sensibility, whilst being shackled by a subservience which even he found at times incredible. Perhaps it was this externally imposed impotence which made some of his gestures awkward, his hands tended to adopt fixed positions unrelated to the rest of the action, and to occupy themselves as best they could.

Patti Fardell didn't have a part to play, as her character remained incohate for want of time to develop. Her tightened lips and stiff confusion were her best line of defence under the circumstances, and she laboured valiantly against the strictures of her stylised and rigid function within the play.

All that remains is to recall to mind the overall assessment of the play as 'good' and 'interesting'; to congratulate the actors on their proficiency, to hope that Mr. Bock will develop a dramatic style that will not lie in the realms of tension for tensions sake'; and to wish Chronicles well for the future.

Awareness

At the moment, we are halfway through a three week programme about poverty. It has been designed to get people thinking about priorities. We want people to ask questions:

- why are there so few poor people attending Queen's?
- do people have inadequate housing because of the competition from Queen's students?
- what are the priorities of our student government ($22,000 for Blood, Sweat and Tears)?
- what could the local political power of the student bloc be?
- what are the ethics behind professional incomes? (with apologies to Norman Eshoo)
- is affluence due to hard work or theft?
- is Canada's wealth based on her exploitation of her poor?
- does the West depend on the exploitation of developing counties?
- what does poor mean?

We've shown a number of films, held a panel discussion and listened to Norman Alcok over the last week and a half. We've also had a panel discussion on poverty as a natiional issue, and a talk with Stanley Burke is coming next week. We need agressive audiences.

But there is still a problem with this kind of programme. It's basically passive. You sit; some talk; everyone feels guilty. It can become a rather masochistic form of entertainment. Poverty is not entertainment. It affects people in very debilitating ways. It undermines self-dignity, which is probably the most important thing a person has. That's why poverty is such a terrifying prospect.

We don't want our programme to become entertainment. On Monday night, February 14, we have reserved most of Kingston Hall. We call that night Queen's -- Hotbed of Apathy (a title made up by Leslie Kaye of the Journal.) Some rooms will have interested volunteers to lead discussion about themes brought up in our programme -- how they relate to us and what we can do about them. You don't need an invitation to come; in fact, if you're interested, you can have your own room and your own discussion.

Any ideas brought up on Monday will be discussed three days later in Jeffrey Hall. We have reserved room 128 for the final event of our programme -- a planning session to see what can be done.

Dropouts

Dear Editors:

The article on the dropout rate at Queen's which appeared in your February 1 issue may have given your readers a wrong impression of the advice given to students in the Faculty of Arts and Science who are considering withdrawing, and a wrong impression also of our attitude to academic counselling in general.

The main purpose of academic counselling is to provide students with information and to help them make wise decisions with regard to their academic programs. Students who withdraw do so for various reasons: some withdraw for health reasons, some for financial reasons, others because they lack motivation to study. It is true as Mr. Mutrie suggests that the difficult employment situation for university graduates has influenced a considerable number of students across the province to reconsider their intention to attend university and this seems to have been one cause of enrollments being lower than expected in some universities in Ontario this year. But it has never been assumed by academic counsellors in the Faculty of Arts and Science Office that preparation for specific employment is the only, or the most important, reason for pursuing programs of study in the Arts and Science Faculty which, of all the faculties, is most essentially committed to the values of a liberal education.

It will have come as a surprise to those of your readers who have talked with me about their study programs to have read that I readily counsel students to drop out rather than " 'plough through' something they have no use for." Students today have many virtues, but the ability to study in a disciplined way material whose importance is not immediately evident to them is not as widely cultivated as it should be and I always suggest this line of thought to students in the hope that they will stay with their original programs or settle on new ones and pursue them with firm resolve. At the same time it should be recognized that withdrawing for a time, or even permanently, may be the wisest decision for a given student, all things considered.

A.M.S. court

Dear Editors:

In your issue of Thursday, November 8, 1971, you announced the appointment of the Chief Justice and Junior Justices of the AMS Court. At that time, there were four cases waiting to be heard by the Court.

What has happened since then? No mention has since been made of the Court or the four cases which it was to hear. For all we know, the five members of the Court may be just figments of our imagination.

Since no word has been heard from the Court, one can presume that the cases which were to be heard have been dropped. If so, it is merely pointing to the fact that the AMS Court is little more than an obsolete body, serving no useful purpose in the university community.

Constituted under BY-Law 11 of the AMS Constitution, the Court is responsible for the punishment of offences committed by a member of the AMS or any organization under the jurusdiction of the AMS. The Court also is responsible for the interpretation of the Constitution.

If the Court is to be a sort of select society, never called upon to perform, what is its purpose? One wonders if it even needs to exist at all. Certainly, the presence of the Court as a deterrent to the student who violates AMS regulations, drinks at football games or strikes an AMS constable is virtually nil. No person has been brought before the Court in the last couple of years on any charges. This only strengthens my point that the Court is a body in name only, its members appointed because the Constitution so stipulates and performing no active function whatsoever.

I suggest that the Judicial Committee make a thorough study on the desirability of the retention of the provisions in the Constitution for a Court. If it is to be an effective and efficient body, it must be active, and essential changes must be made to the Constitution to gvie it some credibility. As it is presently constituted, it is a body which very few have heard of, and even fewer care about, and as such, should be abolished.

Robert Smith.

Leonard Hall dance

Dear Editors:

I wish to bring to your attention the successful dance held in Leonard Hall last Friday night. (Feb. 4, 1972)

Perhaps the no-show of a band due to snow conditions emphasizes the following points: 1. Dances at Queen's can be successful. (The complaint that "nobody goes to Queen's dances anymore" just isn't valid. Put a reasonable price tag on it, like 50 cents per person and one can get a good turn out if they advertise, and take special care to inform those not living in residence.) 2. Leonard Hall is an ideal place for a dance and pub. (It is close to residence, there is lots of room to dance, many places to sit, talk, drink and listen to the music. There are advantages over Wallace Hall: larger room and a dance floor. There are advantages over Grant Hall: one doesn't have to wait in line for 15 minutes just to get a place to sit and have a drink.) 3. Dances can be cheap. (50 cents a person and beer: 3 for $1.00 is pretty reasonable. Also, good dancing music on tape can and did substitute for an expensive band.) 4. Cheap Friday night dances at Queen's can and should be re-established on campus, perhaps with the support of the A.M.S. (At one time Queen's could only support one social function at a time. Now that our enrolment is over 8,000, a regular cheap Friday night dance is again possible.)

Therefore, I recommend that the Campus Activities Commission (if the I.R.C. is not interested) advocate two possible forms of dance sponsorship: a) instead of giving clubs an outright grant, regular dances could be held and each club or group of clubs be made responsible for advertising, coat checking, clean up, etc. In return the club would receive its grant and perhaps make a profit if they do a good job. b) The A.M.S. could sponsor the dances, pay for the A.M.S. Constables and use the profit to establish a dance fund which could later be used to subsidize dances so that the price can be kept down, thus insuring that students can afford to attend.

In general, I would like to praise the organizers of the Friday night Leonard Hall dance for providing the opportunity for a fun filled evening. Also, those at the dance showed admirable tolerance of the no show of the dance band. The choice of taped dance music was excellent and I hope to see more cheap Friday Night Leonard Hall Dances.

The bad and the ugly

Television has always been vulgar. It's one of the few things we can enjoy naked and relaxed. It's the boob tube, the idiot box -- we're all slobs in undershirts, scratching ourselves, drinking beer, passive, absorbed, content. It's the religion of the proletariat.

The sensuality of television obscures the fact that it is the most powerful propaganda instrument ever invented: it works because we are unaware of it. Where are all the people in Canada who campaign for freer schools, civil liberties, ecology, political sanity? They're at home, cheerfully cuddled up with their families watching Mod Squad, The FBI, Cannon, Longstreet, Hawaii Five-O, O'Hara, U.S. Treasury. Do they have the faintest idea of what they are watching? I'm not talking about violence: these cops-and-robbers shows are vicious and obscene not because they glorify murder, which they do, but because they're fascist. Legal murder is a means to an end, and the end is law and order.

It's no accident that the networks are churning out police shows at a time when law and order -- especially order -- is an important social issue in the United States. They are meant not just to entertain us but to convince us through ceaseless repetition that the power of the police state is absolute and invincible. They are very convincing.

The big lie, said Hitler, is the basis of all successful propaganda, and there are some lies worth looking at in the police shows. They are supposedly shows about justice, but their heroes are all cops, government agents or troubleshooters for Big Business. Some of them, like the kids on Mod Squad, are spies and informers, the kind of people who in real life would be spat upon. No longer are we shown the process of law where a man is innocent until proven guilty; we are shown a manhunt. Perry Mason has turned into Ironside; the difference describes the psychological distance America has traveled.

Who are these people who are held up for our admiration? Longstreet is a psychopathic cripple driven by hate and revenge for his loss of sight, a cold, ruthless monomaniac. Ironside is a little more subtle but the same. Link Hayes, the black goon in Mod Squad, turned stoolie after he was jailed for participating in the Watts riot. So much for black justice. Cannon is a jolly fat man who goes about ingratiating himself with people to spy on them for fun and profit. The "straight" heroes are all Green Berets in mufti -- white, tall, lean, handsome, cruel and obsessed. Humorless and without affection, they are trained killers.

All these creeps and thugs are presented to us as nice people who are helping society. This new hypocrisy marks the difference between Mike Hammer, who was a hood, and Jim O'Hara, who is a hood disguised as a businessman. There is always some tearful widow, disturbed child or pathetic down-and-outer these guys are rushing to rescue from the clutches of evil fiends. They pat small boys on the head and give long, kindly looks at the camera. The emotion is phony -- the sentimental schlock of soap opera -- and designed to fool us. These guys aren't really helping ordinary people at all. They're helping the U.S.Treasury, the FBI, the Los Angeles police, the insurance company and the guy who pays their bills. They're helping the rich; they are maintaining order. They are the Gestapo.

We have been conned into thinking these cop shows are just harmless, escapist detective stories. They are not, and the difference is important. In a murder mystery, the identity of the villain is not known until the end, when enough evidence has been gathered to unmask him. In the goon shows, the identity of the crook is revealed from the very beginning. He is assumed to be guilty; the excitement lies in finding out how he is going to be caught. It becomes a problem in technology. Will he be shot, strangled or pushed from a tall building? The FBI fancies helicopters, others prefer karate or a quiet knife in the ribs. The end is always the same: the victim is hunted down by the massive machinery of the State and usually executed. The logic is the same as a morality play: Jesus wins, sinners lose. We all cheer.

The effect of watching several hundred hours of these shows is simple -- we learn that whoever the cops say is guilty, is guilty. We identify with the police because we know they are going to win. The shows are deliberately realistic so we can transfer this lesson to our own lives. Orwell called it doublethink: if the police are always right, we must always believe the police even against our judgment and the evidence of our senses.

I can understand why the Americans might want to inculcate feelings of fear and subserience, but I would like very much to know what these shows are doing on Canadian television, especially on the CBC. Not only are they politically and morally degenerate, in Canada they are totally irrelevant. Canadians do not share the parnoia about violence, subversion and free thought that lies at the base of these programs; the last time the RCMP tried to use kids as undercover agents it became a national scandal. If Canadians wanted police shows, we'd produce them ourselves.

We are being saturated with these programs simply because they're available. The BBC rejected Sesame Street because they thought it authoritarian. This is the kind of critical judgment that has never even occurred to Canadian broadcasters. There is no one at either CTV or CBC who seems to be capable of making a thoughtful decision about what imported shows should or should not be shown on Canadian television. The CBC is notorious for keeping Canadian shows off the air for various sexual and political reasons, but when it comes to American shows standards vanish. The only question is: will it sell?

Cop shows have come on strong this year because public indignation blew itself out a couple of years ago over the red herring of television violence. The violence in the cop shows is more sophisticated than the spilling of blood. But we are very naive about television. We're taught to see commercials as propaganda and to be suspicious of them. Maybe it's time we looked at programs as commercials.

(By Heather Robertson, Macleans's, Feb. 1972).

the Dormouse

by alan broadbent

There was a letter in the Journal last week from Chris Redmond which perfectly documented a fact of life that has been bothering me for the past few months.

I am always fairly attentive to what Mr. Redmond has to say, partly because he is one of the few remaining members of the Tricolor Society. In his letter, he was commenting on the proposed University Centre, and the tendency at this university to amble along in such projects in studied nonchalance until, suddenly, the building is lying right in the path of half the campus.

Essentially what this represents to me is the revolt of the serving class. The guys we have hired at this university to build our buildings have developed a system to encourage the image of participation by everyone who is interested; but this is just an image, for they are proceeding to build the thing as they were going to anyway. Rather than they doing our will, the situation is one of them patronizing us.

This seems to be true in many places. Those who we have traditionally thought of as being in serving positions in the community have now risen to being hard nosed professionals with markettable skills.

I had a tremendous example of this the other day. I had been sick in bed for about four days with what proved to be a case of pneumonia, and a friend called the student health service to see if a doctor would come up to analyze what was the matter. The health service doctor said, "Tell him to throw a coat on and come down here. It would really be much simpler." It was explained to him that it would not be all that simple for me, particularly with the weather being as it was, but the doctor informed my friend that it was really out of the question to expect him to go out and make house calls, particularly in this weather. A subsequent check of other doctors in town showed the same indignation that such an imposition would be asked of them.

Another example of this is our attitude towards politicians and their attitude towards their work. Under our system of government, we elect our delegate to represent us in governing bodies. Once they are elected, we don't demand or even ask them for things; we beg them for concessions. In Kingston, we have a cabinet minister representing us in both the federal and provincial governments, but you would never know it from the power they exert in relation to this community. The only thing we are apt to get here is another prison every 15 years.

We are too used to sitting back and letting them do as they wish. They and the civil service seldom serve anymore; they make the decision of what is good for us and then they do it.

This is what has happened at the university as well. The fundamental function of the university is teaching and learning. That requires teachers and students. Long ago, teachers and students began to hire other chaps to do some of the paper-work, to insure that the plant would keep working and that the teachers and students could devote full time to teaching and learning.

What has happened is that the chaps they hired, the administrators, now control the place. They make the decisions for the teachers and students. They no longer serve; they run the place and from time to time patronize the rest of us, letting us think that we have a part in the governing process.

But, you say, look at the Senate of the university; over half of the members are from the faculty. Doesn't this give the faculty the control? No, because the faculty and students don't have the necessary information to be able to define the issues, let alone decide on them. The administrators form the issues, hold the information, and isolate the areas in which democratic decisions are safe. Their tools are the institutional bureaucracy, its rules, its systems, its hierarchy, and its pressure points.

And what about us students? What about our leaders? This was the ideal week to take a good look around, to see what our past and future leaders are doing. This may have been the last time you will see them so humble, so willing to listen. When they get into office, they will probably become like these other people who I always thought were there to serve us. They will probably become aloof from their representative duty.

Of course, we could demand things from them. We could trade our votes for their service. We voters could become the hard nosed professionals.

Women Skiers aim for title

The Queen's Women's Alpine Ski team will travel to Collingwood for the W.I.A.C. Ladies' Alpine Meet on February 10-11. The girls take with them an impressive record over the last two seasons. During the 1970-71 season, Queen's placed first in the Waterloo Invitational Ski Meet and third in the W.I.T.C.A. Ski Meet. This season, they have again captured first in the Waterloo Ski Meet. Competition will be held in the Giant Slalom and Slalom Alpine events at Collingwood.

Queen's feels that they are fielding a team with an excellent chance of winning the championship. They feel the competition of Western and U. of Toronto to be their strongest in the meet.

Queen's has two "A" Class racers in Marg Chaput and Pam McCormick. Marg Chaput was the 1971 winner of the Waterloo Invitational Ski Meet and was runner-up in the same meet this year. Pam McCormick placed sixth for Queen's at the Waterloo meet. She is at McArthur and in her first year with the Queen's team.

The Queen's team also features three "B" Class racers -- Sue Honeyman, Barbara Armstrong and Heather Fleming. Sue Honeyman placed 10.5th in this year's Waterloo meet.

The strength of the team should bring them success in their bid for the championship.

Hockey Gals barely in Finals

Although the ice hockey gals worked hard in their encounters with Western Friday evening and McGill Saturday evening, Queen's suffered two more defeats. This adds up to four losses, one win and one tie since Christmas; quite a change from their "no loss record" before the holidays.

The ice hockey gals were scheduled to play at 6:00 pm on Friday, but the heavy snow fall and treacherous travelling conditions delayed the competitors until 10:30. Therefore the game was played from 11:00 pm to 1:00 am -- quite the time to play hockey.

Ginny Backus scored the first goal unassisted for Queen's at 10:04 in the first period. However, Western was quick to retaliate and tie up the score at 4:40 in the same period. Jane McGillvray sent a nicely raised puck to Queen's goalie and Gyde nabbed it in her left hand. Yet the unexpected was to happen; the puck rebounded back and deflected off the glove fingers into the upper left corner of the net. The score was evened up 1-1 at the end of the first period.

Sylvia Cameron fights for puck vs McGill

Both girls' teams continued to fight hard in the second period which made for an exciting game. Yet it was Western's fate to pull through with the winning goal. Elinor Good, with Hargrove and Gjos assisting, slid the puck diagonally across the slot into the far corner of the net under the goalie, Wanda Gyde. Gyde had a bad knee and a rough time elevating herself -- after her great saves. Therefore the defense reinforced her by playing their positions with extra care.

Western had three penalties in the first period while only one was handed out to Queen's Gwen Harrison for tripping. During the second period the Western players were to sit out two more penalty sessions while Debby Gilmour sat out the 1½ minutes for her usual hooking. The third period came and went with lots of action but no goal scoring. Western and Queen's each had a penalty during this period.

At one and a half minutes to play, the Queen's goalie started over to the bench to make way for a sixth attacker. However, a Western player broke away with the puck and Wanda tried to get back between the posts. Her bad knee gave way through and she couldn't get up. Debby McCaw and Debby Gilmour came to the rescue and stopped the puck. In doing so Debby Gilmour gained a back injury as the Western player jumped on her while already on the ice. As well Western gained a penalty shot, but Wanda came through and stopped the shot.

As a last attempt to save the game, coach Annabelle Twiddy pulled the goalie again at 1:10 in the last period and sent out Karen Howatson as the sixth attacker. This was short lived as she gained a body contact penalty with 46 seconds left to play. Queen's was left to contend for a goal with a player short for the rest of the game but remained unsuccessful. So the game ended 2-1 for Western in the wee hours of the morning.

The McGill game, Saturday night at 9:00 wasn't as thrilling or as well played, but Queen's did dig and make a real attempt to make it their victory. Yet once again the competitors were to gain the crucial goal. Michelle Arpin netted the puck at 5:27 in the first period. Queen's Debby McCaw chalked up two penalties, but the four player squad remaining, Debby Gilmour, Sheila Pratt, Arlene MacIntyre and Liz Lankin, did a fantastic job in killing the penalties on both occasions.

Sheila Pratt came close to scoring with 1½ minutes to play with a line drive shot which ricocheted off the goal post. As this failed, the Queen's goalie was pulled at one minute left in the game. Although Karen Howatson avoided a penalty in this repeat performance, the six attackers couldn't acquire a goal in the remaining time despite many close calls. Therefore the buzzer went with the power line struggling for a goal; Cathy Collins, Ginny Backus, Gwen Harrison, Karen Howatson, Debby Gilmour and Deb McCaw. the Queen's coach had the following comment, "I don't know how you can do so much right and still not score."

Nevertheless, the Queen's ice hockey gals are off to Toronto with McGill Thursday afternoon, February 17th for the final hockey torunament. Here's hoping the Queen's girls can achieve another winning streak for the weekend and adorn the Physical Education Centre with the Intercollegiate Ladies Hockey Trophy which hasn't visited Queen's for many long years.

CANADA

OTTAWA — The number of unemployed in Canada increased by 135,000 to 665,000 in mid-January, equal to 7.7 per cent of the labor force, Statistics Canada reported Tuesday.

But the seasonally adjusted unemployment rate, which takes into account seasonal fluctuations in the size of the labor force, declined to 6.2 per cent last month from 6.3 per cent in December. It was 6.4 per cent in January last year.

Unemployment can be expected to increase still further in the next few months and the federal Government has no additional plans for combatting it, according to the new Minister of Manpower and Immigration, Bryce Mackasey.

OTTAWA — The consumer price index rose three-tenths of a point in January with increases in food and housing costs the main factors behind the cost of living gain, Statistics Canada reported Wednesday.

The increase was close to the average recorded between these two months in recent years, the federal statistical agency said.

The index showed that it would cost $13.67 to buy goods and services in January that would have cost $13.63 in December and $13.03 in January last year.

These same goods and services would have cost $10 in 1961.

HAMILTON — The McMaster University Graduate Students Union claimed Monday that close to 1,000 of its 1,015 members went on strike Monday, withdrawing their services as tutorial leaders and laboratory instructors in a grant dispute with the university.

However there were few outward signs of such a strike on campus and a spokesman for the university said he doubted that 200 graduates had left their teaching-assistant jobs. He said everything was close to normal during the day, pointing out that only 175 of the graduates had voted for the strike action last Friday, indicating a lack of support.

The strike is a reaction to the failure of the university to cover income losses averaging about $400 annually, brought about by new tax laws which made the graduates' grants taxable since Jan. 1 of this year.

In addition, the students want a legal contract with the university for their teaching duties, with the Graduate Students Union recognized as its official bargaining agent.

Alvin Lee, dean of graduate studies, said yesterday that full-time students working at a total of only 200 hours a year, do not "justify a group formally bargained for by a bargaining unit."

VANCOUVER — A university philosophy professor says some doctors are secretly allowing patients with no hope of recovery to commit suicide, and that a medical institution should be established to aid persons in taking their own lives.

Donald Brown, who spoke to a seminar at the University of British Columbia, said laws prohibiting suicide impede a person's right to self-determination and should be repealed.

Brown is a member of the British Columbia Civil Liberties Association.

TORONTO — The removal of the safeguards from the 1965 Canadian-U.S. auto pact would mean the end of growth for the automotive industry in Canada by 1975, according to James Laxer, leader of the Waffle wing of the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Laxer, keynote speaker at a public meeting held Sunday to discuss the implications of removing the safeguards, told an audience of about 200 that this would result in a ceiling for automobile production in Canada, and that this would mean all future growth and investment in the industry would be out of the country.

OTTAWA — Quebec is getting "the lion's share" of grants designed to combat unemployment under the Local Initiatives Program, a spokesman for the Department of Manpower and Immigration said Tuesday. He said that as of Jan. 30 the Government had approved 2,091 projects worth $57.4-million and of this total, 661 projects worth $20.5-million have been granted in Quebec. The grants allow the creation of 29,649 jobs across the country, of which 10,049 are in Quebec, which has the highest unemployment rate in the country, the spokesman said.

THE WORLD

UNITED NATIONS — Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim said Tuesday he planned faster action by the world body in world crises to restore confidence in the political abilities of the organization.

The Austrian diplomat said in an interview that he would not hesitate to use his authority under the UN charter to put disputes before the security council on his own initiative.

That authority has been used only once - by former secretary-general Dag Hammarskjold in the 1960 Congo crisis.

LONDON — Prime Minister Edward Heath's government has tentatively decided on a three-pronged plan to relieve the bitter and bloody conflict in Northern Ireland, it was learned Tuesday.

According to sources very close to the government, the plan's key elements are:

—A relaxation of the internment policy under which Irish Republican Army (IRA) suspects have been held without charge or trial.

—Massive economic aid to reduce the fearsome unemployment, which now amounts to one man in nine.

—Some form of community government, guaranteeing key posts to members of the Roman Catholic minority.

The Heath cabinet has scheduled meetings over the next few days to decide whether and when to offer the plan. The best-informed sources expect a favorable decision, probably to be announced next week.

NEWRY — The Civil Rights Association emerged as a powerful force in Northern Ireland Sunday, defying police and possibly death to produce one of the largest peaceful demonstrations in the country's history.

A crowd estimated at more than 20,000 obeyed instructions for strict discipline and marched about a mile in Derrybeg Estates, a subdivision of grey stucco houses, to hold a rally in a small park.

WASHINGTON — President Richard Nixon Monday signed legislation limiting the rising cost of political campaigns in the United States and requiring presidential candidates to report contributions of more than $100. The bill, the most comprehensive reform of U.S. election practices in almost half a century, sets spending limits on presidential and congressional candidates for various stages of their campaigns. Presidential candidates may spend no more than $13.9-million for communications and advertising after being nominated by party conventions.

SALISBURY — Lord Pearce, chairman of the British commission testing public opinion on the terms of the Anglo-Rhodesian settlement, Monday accused Rhodesian authorities of reneging on an agreement to allow normal political activity during the acceptibility test.

He said in a statement that he has asked for two additional commissioners to investigate claims of intimidation, pressure and obstruction involving pro-settlement and anti-settlement factions in the breakaway colony.

TOKYO — Japan decided Monday to increase military spending in 1972 by almost 20 per cent and outlined a new program to improve its defences over the next five years.

A meeting of the national defence council presided over by Premier Eisaku Sato, proposed a defence budget for 1972 of about $264 billion.

This is a 19.6-per cent increase over the current fiscal year ending in March. It has yet to be approved by the Diet (parliament).

WASHINGTON — The United States is about to embark on a new reconnaissance satellite project which, if successful, would help the president avoid miscalculations when responding to sudden foreign crises.

The new spy satellites are meant to provide even more detailed pictures from space than current U.S. camera-carrying spacecraft and more important, to position themselves quickly over any trouble spot and speed their pictures back to Washington within hours, or even minutes.

While several days is time enough to keep watch over things that happen slowly — such as a Soviet missile build-up — it is not fast enough for the type of flare-up that takes place in the Middle East, or to keep track on an hourly basis of a mobilization of Warsaw Pact forces in central Europe.

The new satellites will be designed to translate what their cameras see on earth into electronic signals, which can be transmitted to communications satellites. In this way, pictures taken on the opposite side of the world can be relayed to Washington almost instantaneously.

"Things must be looking up. There's a civil war developing in the Philippines and the Americans are not even sending in advisers."

Canadians prejudice against unemployed

WINDSOR — Prime Minister Trudeau is encouraging prejudice against the unemployed with his repeated claims that jobs are available if workers are willing, a Canadian authority on social welfare charged Sunday night.

Reuben Baetz, director of the Canadian Council on Social Development, told University of Windsor students that Trudeau has put more than 500,000 unemployed Canadians under a "cloud of suspicion."

"And as long as we believe unemployment is the result of a lazy streak in a substantial number of Canadians, we will fail to seek out the real cause," namely, the government's fight against inflation.

Baetz said Canadians tend to callously ignore the poor people around them. Whenever Canadians are forced to confront poverty, "we trot out the hackneyed and outdated cliches about pioneer spirit, fierce individualism and every man for himself."

He said Canadians are generally intolerant of the unemployed poor, claiming they prefer welfare to working.

"Nowhere is unemployment laid so harshly on the heads of those unfortunate individuals who are unemployed. This attitude of personal blame is equalled only in the U.S., where it can be conveniently attached to a racial bias."

"We attack the unemployed while other more enlightened nations attack the unemployment."

Commerce, rehab announce results

The Commerce Society and the Rehabilitation Therapy Society have announced the results of their annual elections, held last week.

The president of rehab will be Donna Collins, of second-year occupational therapy. The vice-president, who must be from the other half of the school, is Carol Chapman of first-year physiotherapy.

Secretary,treasurer is Sharon Cook; social convenors, Kitty Noble and Sue Coish; athletic sticks, Anne Besley and Ianna Swann; and AMS representatvie, Sue Drowley.

The president of commerce will be John Telgmann of Commerce 74. Vice-president will be Bob Patterson. Elected junior AMS rep was Ken Wong, and senior AMS rep John Green.

Treasurer Jeff Mitz, athletic stick George Smith, and senator Jim Dinning were acclaimed earlier.

Artsci correction

In Friday's issue of The Journal it was wrongly stated that one of the new arts and science reps to the AMS would be John Bankes.

In fact, the person who received the 405 votes and the position was Leslie Bankes of Artsci 75. John Bankes was not even a candidate.

Woman is year pres

A woman is the 1972-73 president of Artsci 74.

Mathematics student Anne Macdonald of Halifax was chosen president of second-year arts and science students at the spring year elections Wednesday. She is the first female year president in the history of the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society.

Other members of the Artsci 74 executive will be Pat Sinclair, vice-president; Sharad Tembe, treasurer; Gini Stephen, secretary; Judy Dobias and Ron Shaw, social convenors; Wil Kranenburg, publicity convenor; Anne Bennet, female athletic rep.

The year is still looking for somebody to be male athletic rep.

Pictured is one spectator at Friday night's judging of the Golden Words beer-brewing contest. Winner was Glenn MacNeill with a score of 79.4 points; second was Jim Carson with 77.8 and third was Bill Fee with 77.5. "Homo sapiens, not homo the sap," — Alcock

by Rachael Edwards

"We're standing on our heads, caught up in an old pattern inappropriate to man today," Dr. Norman Alcock, told a session of Awareness 72 last Wednesday evening.

Alcock is the founder and present director of the Canadian Peace Research Institute, and a former Queen's student. He is the author of several books dealing with his work in peace research, The Emperor's New Clothes being his latest.

Alcock recalled a visit he made to Queen's about ten years ago, when there was general apprehension about the arming of the big nations and nuclear weapons.

At that time, he said, there was a state of "international madness" with so much money being spent on weapon research.

But today "our priorities are still crazy", he added.

He said that the systems set up in the past for defence, economic growth, population and poverty just don't apply today.

Anti-ballistic missile systems set up in some countries, at a cost of 10 to 20 billion dollars, are in reality useless, he said. There are 5,000 missiles on each side and the effectiveness of the system is only about two percent, so that some missiles are bound to get through.

Alcock noted that prestige is one of the main factors in the arms race. The big nations build bigger and better weapons than the others for the higher prestige that they will gain, he said.

"This is part of the absurdity of defence", he said. He pointed out that in the world today there are about 100 nations who are arming steadily, and only seven disarming, the largest of them being Canada.

With regard to economic growth, Alcock said that the priorities are "dead wrong". Economic growth is a sacred thing to the government and official establishments, he said, and peace and security are considered minor things.

If North America continues to grow at its present rate, he said, it will deplete the earth's resources of energies in about 10 years. The metals will last about 15 years, he added.

According to Alcock, North Americans are "robbing, raping and exploiting the poorer parts of the world to have our standard of living". As they grow wealthier, the poor nations grow poorer because every Canadian uses 33 times the resources that every Indian uses, he said.

They must learn that they can live bounteously without a new car every year, a colour television and other luxuries, he said.

Life should be measured by the things that contribute to its quality, such as the number of hospital beds, or educated people, Alcock said, or by the things that make life joyous like art objects, not by the Gross National Product.

He outlined some of the results of testing that the Peace Research Institute has done in the past ten years on the attitudes of different people. He noted that people who showed attitudes of conservatism, nationalism and religiosity tended also to be militaristic.

Attitudes of hostility and authoritarianism, as well as neurotic tendencies, also resulted in a militaristic point of view, he said.

Alcock said many of these attitudes are grounded in a childhood training where there is an absence of permissiveness.

"A child who is not taught to believe in himself doesn't believe in others," he said.

The old way of bringing up children in an authoritarian, nationalistic and ethnocentric way might have been valid years ago, when it was vital to the economic stability, he said, but "weapons have changed the rules".

Alcock also noted that the results of the testing were similar in most countries that were polled.

Even in two Communist countries tested there was a definite link between nationalism and capitalism.

"There seems to be something about capitalism that is not totally healthy!" he added.

"We can no longer go with the prevailing myths," he said, "Man must be homo sapiens, not homo the sap!"

Alcock said that, faced with these problems, there are some things ordinary citizens can do.

First they must become more knowledgable and better informed about the problems, he said. By joining kindred spirits — the small groups who are also concerned — one can retain one's own spirit and concern, he said.

"Protest is not an ineffective way," he added. He cited the case of a group of World Federalists who, by their frequent letters and visits to Ottawa, convinced the External Affairs Department to begin a brief on the 25 year old United Nations Charter.

Alcock also noted that by directing arguments for social change towards the type of person one is dealing with, one can be more convincing.

For instance, if a person is fairly open-minded, the basic facts and arguments will be convincing. However, if the person is closed-minded, one must appeal to his sense of authority by finding out what he believes in and using that.

"Have we the time and the right priorities?" he asked, "Homo sapiens have had a great big glorious experience, but in time the cockroaches will take over--they are more impervious to radiation!"

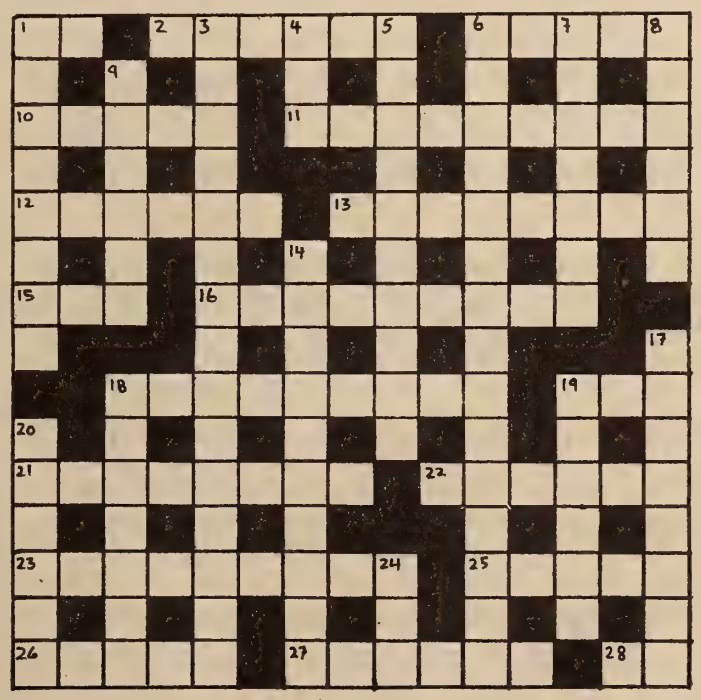
Math department head Dr. John Coleman, right, with panelists Wednesday evening in Grant Hall.

Solution is political says panel

The solution to the poverty problem is political: that was the thrust of a panel discussion Thursday, sponsored by Awareness 72, in which the authors of "The Real Poverty Report" joined a Queen's student and a professor in discussing "People, Politics, Power and Poverty".

Ian Adams and Brian Hill were two members of the Senate committee on poverty in Canada who resigned because they said the committee was glossing over pertinent facts and presenting an unreal picture of poverty in Canada. Their opinions appeared in the "real" poverty report.

Dr. John Coleman, head of the Queen's mathematics department and one instigator of the Awareness programme, chaired the discussion, centering it around a group of questions: What is poverty? Who are the poor? Are they just lazy? What is the effect of poverty? What is the cause of poverty -- for example, is automation a factor? Is there a solution? What responsibilities do students have with regard to poverty?



Adams and Hill spoke for a political approach. Both said that in their book they were trying to analyze the situation in such a manner as to make way for a political solution. An important factor in such an analysis is the recognition of class structure in Canada, they said.

Politics professor Dr. Ned Franks presented what he called three pseudo-solutions: representative democracy, bureaucracy, and participatory democracy. He indicated he was less idealistic than the other panel members, suggesting that an end to poverty requires more than cooperation between students and members of the working class.

Adams and Hill were challenged from the floor by students who expressed scepticism about their political solution -- or, in some cases, any solution.

But in general the suggestions made were for political approaches to the problem -- as suggested by the title of the discussion.

off the record by Dick Loney

Harry Nilsson, one of the most impressive of the "underground" songwriters, has a rock album. Not that his earlier albums were not fully within that sphere it's just that after the lush string arrangements and vocal experimentation of NILSSON SINGS NEWMAN, this collection of ten Nilsson tunes comes down hard into the heavy back-beat camp. Several offerings, such as "Let The Good Times Roll" and "Jump Into the Fire" are departures into territory which formerly only was embraced on a few of Harry's songs.

Harry's former albums were unique in that they were built around his own talents of multi-tracking with maybe some strings thrown in – with SCHMILSSON, Harry recorded at London's Trident Studios, along with some very familiar side-men. From Mr. Elton John, Harry recruited Caleb Quaye, Roger Pope, and Herbie Flowers; from the Harrison entourage (and from Joe Cocker) Harry chose Jim Gordon on drums, Klaus Voorman on bass, and on brass he utilized Jim Price and Bobby Keyes. Arrangements are divided among Paul Buckmaster, George Tipton and Jim Price, while even Jim Webb (of "Phoenix" and "Up Up and Away" fame) pops in to tinkle the ivories.

First two cuts on side one, "Gotta Get Up" and "Driving Along" are about those daily inadquacies which Nilsson laments in many of his songs: people driving along, seemingly going nowhere, and never caring about their neighbour; while "Early In The Morning" is entirely a Nilsson entry, as he plays organ and sings one of the three numbers he did not pen himself.

Several years ago, the British royal family of rock was queeried as to their favourite American group: John Lennon quipped without a trace of tongue-in-cheek -- "Harry Nilsson". If you listen to "The Moonbeam Song", you get the idea that John wasn't far off base, as Harry has a knack of joining a meaningful lyric with a tune which is simple, yet catchy.

Highlite of this disc has to be Harry's feeling for the Pete Ham, Joey Evans composition (they, of Badfinger) "Without You". This beauty begins with a softly stated piano backing by Gary Wright, under Nilsson's flowing vocal, and the strings and horns conducted by Buckmaster. It then breaks into the desperation of the chorus "I can't live, if livin' is without you", and Harry wails it on this one, proving that no-one sings better harmony than Harry Nilsson does with himself.

"Coconut" is a syncopated experiment into a nonsense lyric played to the acoustic guitar of Quaye, and the multi-tracked Nilsson chorus. For Nilsson fans, this album has a lot of basic Nilsson, in a slightly new dimension -- NILSSON SCHMILSSON-RCA-LSP-4515.

With the surge in sales of Carole King's style of music of late, the critics have begun to look around for female artists with a similar appeal. One of the true "sleeper" albums of 1971 has rightly been excavated from the stale albums grooveyard, in the form of Valerie Simpson's EXPOSED album.

If Carole King's music appealed to the Motowners ("Will You Still Love Me Tomorrow") then Valerie is a natural -- she's pure Motown, and she does it all. Her piano accompaniments on all of her tunes are those to be expected from a seasoned studio musician, as Miss King surely was, but her composing doesn't give a thing away to any female writer. She begins the album with a solo voice intro on "I Don't Need No Help" -- and she surely proves she doesn't, sustaining the melody just on the sheer beauty of her voice, but when the accompaniment comes in after several minutes of pure Valerie, the effect is strikingly similar to the piano flavour created on Carole King's Tapestry album.

"Love Woke Me Up This Morning" weaves the voice of Valerie, with those of Joshie Armstead and Nickolas Ashford, who co-produced the album with Valerie. The effect is as perfect as the background to the Aretha Franklin classic "I Say A Little Prayer". The advent of such a stunning talent as Miss Simpson's is given added impetus on EXPOSED in light of the fact that only the top of the Detroit musicians are featured here. On electric piano, there is Johnny Griffith; on lead guitar is Dennis Coffey, who works with the Temptations and the other Motown monsters; and Uriel Jones is aided on percussion by the King of Motown bongo players Eddie Brown, and everyone's percussionist, Jack Ashford.

Valerie shows her own writing to best advantage with "Back To Nowhere" and "Now That There's You", and displays an imaginative rendering of "We Can Work It Out", the only one of these ten exposures she didn't create herself. To quote Diana Ross' liner notes (a Motowner of some considerable import) "The only word for this album is fantastic!" VALERIE SIMPSON--EXPOSED- Tamla Motown TS-311 by Ampex.

One of the greatest musical impressions made on this campus in any year within memory has to be that left by the Delta Lady, Rita Coolidge. Her surprise appearance with the Kristofferson show, and her subsequent concert as the star, backed by Marc Benno's Dixie Flyers, is proof positive that she is in demand as one in the vanguard of the female artist's attempts to dent the framework of male performing artists who generally dominate the rock scene.

As well as a soulful singer in person, Miss Coolidge cuts a mean swath with a record album -- her latest (and only her second such) is titled NICE FEELIN', A & M SP4325, and the title is descriptive of the general effect that her two sides leave a listener with. The tune from which the session's title is taken was composed by Marc Benno, who handles the guitar and harmony vocals on this set, and who incidentally recently released a solo album of his own.

Rita's ensemble includes the other Flyers -- Tommy McClure on bass, Charlie Freeman on guitar, and Sammy Creason on drums. Mike Utley, who handles the keyboards, is the same musician who accompanied Rita on "Journey Through the Night" during her first concert at Queen's. Rita herself does a sure-fingered job on the piano work to the number here, on this album, but it was Utley's flourishes on the tune, and on "I Believe In You", that identified his status as a studio pro when he joined Rita on stage at Grant Hall.

Rita, Marc, and the Flyers perform the Dave Mason tune which graces a lot of albums lately -- "Only You Know And I Know", and again Utley's keyboard mastery is evidenced in some raunchy organ phrases. Rita excels on "I'll Be Here", s soulful, plaintive blues lament, and on the very pretty "Better Days" from the pen of Graham Nash. This second album full of nice feeling's from Rita Coolidge will lead her many fans to wish that she will be able to take time from her hectic concert schedule to slip back into the studios to lay down the tracks for yet a third album from this talented lady.

A nation's income CAN be distributed equally

"There has never been a society in which there was no poverty, and it is foolish to think that the rich and well-off will ever give up their comfortable position just to help those who are poor. Any talk about overcoming poverty is just a waste of time."

That, basically, was the comment of one student at Thursday's Awareness '72 panel, at which Brian Hill and Ian Adams, two of the authors of The Real Poverty Report, spoke. And that same type of scepticism about whether it was really possible to overcome poverty, or to lessen inequalities in income distribution, seemed to pervade the whole question period which followed the panel discussion.

Whether of nor one is justified in being sceptical about the likelihood that income inequalities will be reduced in Canada, one certainly is not justified in thinking that it is impossible. Numerous countries, including the Scandinavian countries, Germany, the Netherlands and Britain, among others, have sought to create a more equal distribution of national income and have succeeded, at least to an extent.

A method which has been used to measure the quality of income distribution in a country is the following: calculate the ratio of the top income among the poorest fifth of the population to the lowest income among the richest fifth of the population. The higher the ratio, the more equal the distribution of income. As an example, in the United States in 1960-1961, $2,575 was the top income earned by the poorest fifth of the population; $8,596 was the lowest income earned by a family in the richest fifth of the population. The ratio of the first figure to the second is about 0.30. Canada's ratio was between 0.30 and 0.35; Germany's was about 0.36; Britain's was about 0.48; and Sweden's was about 0.57. In other words, a Swede whose income placed him among the poorest fifth of his population would still generally earn at least half of what all but the richest fifth of the population received.

(A common characteristic of these countries which have moved towards narrowing income inequality is the presence of a very strong labour party, often as the government, politics professor Ned Franks noted Thursday.)

So it is possible to distribute a nation's income more equally than Canada does.

It is well that that be understood, because to allow oneself to become resigned to a belief that poverty is insurmountable or that it won't be overcome until everyone suddenly becomes altruistic, which is never going to happen, is to opt for the status quo just as much as the apathetic majority, who don't give a damn, do.

INCO- business as usual

About a week ago, International Nickel Co. of Canada (INCO) announced that it was laying off 725 mine workers immediately and that it would lay off another 1,240 workers over the next three months.

Last week, a report in the Globe and Mail Report on Business stated that INCO's 1971 profit was $94 million (U.S. funds, no doubt.) The Globe noted that this was a decline from 1970's profit of $208; part of this decline was attributed to the costs incurred in closing down some operations, in suspending others and in laying off workers.

The reason for the recent layoffs, according to a company spokesman, was "the need to avoid a further build-up of inventories."

It's an old story; management errs in performing a management function (inventory control) and the workers pay the price of the error.

The workers pay, and the taxpayers pay, since there is little work in Sudbury outside of the INCO works, and little available for the laid off INCO men this winter, so the men will have to live on Unemployment Insurance or Welfare.

But INCO managers won't lose their jobs over this. And INCO probably won't suffer too much. Once they iron out this inventory problem, and with payroll costs reduced, their profit should be back up to "normal" levels by this time next year.

Off the record off the track

Dear Editors;

I thoroughly enjoyed George Carlin's performance at the Snowball Concert. His explique of the various uses of the word "shit" however, left out one very important aspect. Much to my gratification Dick Loney was able to illustrate this very graphically in your last issue. Brown journalism is not quite the same as yellow journalism, but the two are similar enough that they often crop up together; and indeed they did.

I do not wish to take exception to Mr. Loney's contention that the audience was ripped off or that Edgar Winter put on a sub-standard performance. That was evident to anyone in attendance. However, our Champion of Justice, Defender of the Silent Majority (actually there weren't too many of them) and Outspoken firebrand neglected some very important facts which should have been included in fairness (that's on page 511 in the Random House dictionary, Dick) to Edgar Winter.

Point one: Mr. Loney's knowledge of music (one thing that I will not dispute) must have had him wondering why two groups (Cotton and Winter) that boasted such divergent styles and sound should come one after the other. The entire crowd had been brought to a peak by the driving blues of Cotton & Co. and the switch to driving rock had to be difficult if not impossible.

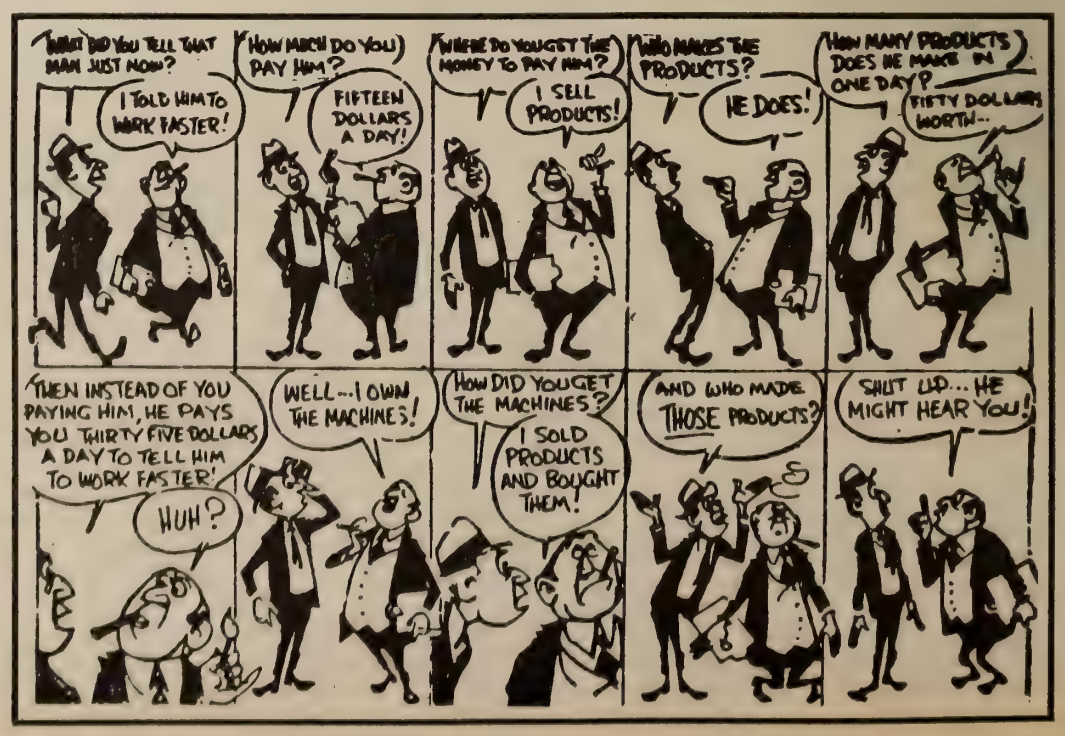
Blame that on the Concert Committee, but don't be too critical. They should have had provisions for someone not showing as in the case of Holmes; a local group in the wings just in case. It may sound like an undue expense, but it would have been a more professional way of handling it, and for the budget involved a little insurance would have been a sound investment (sorry).

At the same time remember that the Concert Committee is a rookie organization, doing their best to get top flight entertainment for the students at reasonable cost. Their lack of experience cannot be faulted and in following an old Queen's concert tradition they have run into some amazing foul ups; not to mention some of the unsavoury characters in the music business. And some of them must be dealt with to be believed.(Ask Dave Merrick).

Has the quality of the concerts improved? One has only to check the record to realize that it has.

At any rate the concert was slated to begin with Cotton, followed by Carlin, Holmes and then the feature attraction, Edgar Winter. With Carlin and Holmes acting as a buffer, I feel that the concert would have gone over much differently. By 8:15, when Carlin was the only person that had arrived and was ready to go on, the order of performance obviously had to be changed, and it was. This effectively doomed the concert and Winter before the show even started.

Point 2: All of White Trash were not present; there were several new faces. But Winter had a commitment to fill and he did just that. A set of circumstances beyond his control had put him up "Carlin Creek" without a paddle. He did his best but couldn't put it together. A few flashes of his greatness did come across. Admittedly they were not often enough nor sustained for a long enough time, but to compare Winter to "an anemic, bleached Tiny Tim, with a voice a few times weaker than Tiny's" has me wondering whether I am right in not disputing Mr. Loney's knowledge of music.



Point 3: Anyone who was present at the December 30 concert of White Trash in Ottawa will remember the reception accorded them. The ovation they received as they trooped onto the stage was larger than anything that I have ever heard at Queen's. And they responded with a concert that can be best described by several adjectival forms of some of George's "Magnificent Seven" succeeded by unbelievable.

But for a show like that you need a receptive audience with a slight amount of attentiveness and awareness, willing to give something a chance. Edgar didn't get that, and from the first moment that he stepped on stage it was obvious that he wasn't going to get any help from the audience.

Sure you can say "They are pros and they should be able to get the audience up anyway." But as an example, anyone who has done anything so common as telling one or two of their better jokes and looked around at a row of stoney faces after delivering the punchlines, can tell you that it does an effective job of dampening one's spirits. After that the next joke is a somewhat uncomfortable experience, and they quickly look for a hasty exit.

Mr. Winter was playing with an unfamiliar group and was visibly uneasy. Their timing was not on, and the smoothness was not there. A little boost from the audience would have gone a long way. But Queen's audiences have long been known for their cool receptions and overly discerning nature. (fussy sums it all up) This could be making things more difficult for Dave Merrick than one realizes. Musicians don't play just for the money, they have to enjoy their work; And who wants to play for a brick wall? The audience completely alienated Winter and his performance reflected this. He left as soon as he could, pissed off with his performance and not too impressed with the "Queen's Own Highhanders". I think he showed more tolerance than the audience by sticking it out as long as he did.

The Snowball Concert 1972 was not the overwhelming success that it could have been with a few breaks in the right places. But it certainly did not have to come off as it did. One has only to check the names to see that we got top flight performers (and not necessarily just for a change).

Perhaps it is time to take a critical look at the student body. I have yet to see a really great concert at Queen's. We've had some excellent groups come in but they never seem to be able to get the crowd going. By this time I think it is being a little bit nearsighted to pin the blame on the groups themselves. It has happened just too many times. Do the audiences expect a little too much? Can you expect to just sit back and automatically get swept into the show? Why should you show appreciation even if the offering was not that good? (Is it hypocrisy or plain courtesy?)

In closing I will suggest, "You only get out what you put in", and a sincere thanks to Dick Loney. We ran out of toilet paper in residence on Sunday, and if it had not been for his article....., SHHIIIT!!

Heffalump

Dear Editors;

In a recent issue of the Queen's Journal, it was reported that The Heffalump Craft Shop was not as yet making a profit. This statement (occuring in a story concerning an AMS meeting) reflects a view of The Heffalump which is held by many people, but which was not part of the original purpose in establishing The Heffalump. This view would have it that it is only a matter of time before The Heffalump would start turning a profit, and that this profit would be poured into the coffers of the AMS to support some of the other activities of the Society.

I would like to state the objectives of The Heffalump Craft Shop as I was given to understand them when the project was begun, and when I accepted the job of manager.

The first objective of The Heffalump was to provide an outlet for student crafts, giving students a place to market the goods they produce and at the same time earn some money. The second objective was to provide some students with in-store jobs, in such positions as sales, management, buying, and bookkeeping. The third objective was to provide an outlet for crafts from the Kingston community. These three objectives have been met, with over 200 craftsmen using The Heffalump as a crafts outlet, and with five people employed part time in the store. These job-oriented objectives were largely a response to the tighter summer job situation last summer.

In line with the above three objectives, the store developed a policy by which the producer of the goods would receive two-thirds of the selling price and the store would receive one-third. This is a relatively high proportion to go to the craftsman, but this was seen as necessary to give him the best incentive to keep producing goods, and to give the customer a good value on the goods. The amount the store took, the one-third of the selling price, was to cover overhead and salaries. If any profit were to be made, it would be returned to the AMS. However, operating on such a relatively low "mark-up" of one-third, the making of profit was not seen as very likely, and really only incidental at best.

The intent of the store was to provide a place where students could sell goods they have made without the hassles of avaricous merchants. We wanted to allow students to make some money without having to worry too much about the ethics of the market place, and who is ripping them off, etc.

We hope that the summer tourist season will place the Heffalump on a break-even basis, in that it will give us sufficient profit to make up for the deficit that all stores incur during the late winter months. We don't expect to make great piles of money, and if we do we will pay our sales people a little better, and maybe even try to give our craftsmen a better percentage on their goods. We will try to pay our debts to the AMS.

But we don't really expect to make a profit, and be a generator of income for the AMS. Somehow, that doesn't seem to be the kind of thing a Heffalump should do.

After the panel discussion on poverty Thursday night, Brian Hill was asked if, in his many visits to speak at university campuses since the publication of The Real Poverty Report (which he, Ian Adams, William Cameron and Peter Penz wrote), he had found students as unsympathetic to or cynical about their suggestions for overcoming poverty as it seemed the Queen's audience was that night.

No, he said, the reaction is usually either one of outright hostility to their ideas, or else it is one of total apathy, when no one in the audiences asks any questions at all. At least on Thursday, he said, there were a lot of questions.

"I don't have much faith in university students," he concluded. "I never had."

the Dormouse

- by Alan Broadbent -

Just the other day we all got together and elected our student government. You may have noticed. At any rate, forty percent of us did, and we may have noticed.

After seeing quite a bit of campaigning, we elected our Alma Mater Society president and vice-president, and our faculty society representatives.

Perhaps the most interesting aspect of the whole thing was the AMS presidential and vice-presidential election campaign, because it was the most visible. Four teams of candidates were in the running, and there was a variety of appeals made.

The winning team, Greg Lablanc and Wallance Palmer, ran one of the "bread and circus" campaigns, promising that the control of the AMS would be returned to the hands of the average student in the street. Mr. Leblanc proved himself to be solid on the drinking issue, having been manager of the parliamentary pubs on campus, and Mr. Palmer showed to be an entertaining chap, having been this past year's AMS man in charge of organizing concerts through the offices of the Queen's Entertainment Agency. These credentials skyrocketed their bearers to a massive victory.

The second place team of Andy Jordan and Jim Bradley combined both the "bread and circus" style and the "grit" style. Mr. Jordan's attempt to join the club was to have been abetted by his experience of organizing clubs for the AMS, and he succeeded in gaining the co-operative spirit of Mr. Bradley, a cog in the Science '44 Co-op machine.

The third place team consisted of AMS "heavies", a now traditional appellation connoting significant AMS experience, Victor Bradley and Marney Cousins. Mr. Bradley eschewed the "bread and circus" approach with a casual "I've been through that trip", and embraced the "grit" issues. Miss Cousins participated in this naivete of assuming that the AMS should have a role in the educational objectives of the University.

The fourth place team, Michael Simpson and Anthony Layton, ran a capitalist campaign, turning out the now famous and non-negotiable Q-bucks. They were to be seen ambulating around the campus, generally raising the level of absurdity surrounding the student government.

The results of the election have now been subjected to severe analysis by the faculty and students of the Political Studies Department, in a search for "trends". One analysis has emerged which seems to have general credibility, and has been tabbed as the "hair syndrome rationale".

Essentially, this is how it goes. Presence of hair was the deciding factor in the election. As a glance at the last decade will indicate, there has been a general swing to the left among younger parts of the population, and this has been accompanied by an increase in the amount of hair about the person. There is a loose correlation between the amount of hair on the person, and the degree to which one leans to the left. Lots of hair indicates movement to the left, "popular hair length" indicates a moderate, and a relative absence of hair indicates a tendency to the right.

The Queen's student body, in relation to other student bodies in the country, tends to be moderate, perhaps slightly to the right. Thus, the Queen's student body would tend to support those who are like themselves, slightly to the right of moderate. Thus, they would vote for those who sport just slightly less than "popular hair length".

The winning team of Messrs. Leblanc and Palmer have this kind of hair presence. Mr. Leblanc has "popular hair length", but is completely devoid of facial hair, thus putting him slightly to the right of moderate. His mate, Mr. Palmer, has a moustache, bringing the team closer to moderate, thereby precisely filling the Queen's bill.

Mr. Jordan has a beard. Need anymore be said. Despite the valiant attempt of his running mate to save the day by remaining clean shaven, the handicap of Mr. Jordan's beard was severe.

Mr. V. Bradley is perhaps the hairiest person around. He exudes hair. Miss Cousins had the shortest hair of all the candididates, but she could not overcome Mr. Bradley's hair in the attempt to trim the opposition.

This of course leaves the Simpson-Layton team. On first glance, it would seem that they should be the logical winners, for their hair quotients appear to be perfect. Unfortunately, their campaign had an over-abundance of hair, and that spelled defeat for them.

It will be interesting to keep an eye on Mr. Leblanc and Mr. Palmer during the next year to see if they acquire greater amounts of hair. This is a sure way of tabulating the radicalization process, a matter of some historical concern at this University.

Queen stops Vietnam bombing

BANGKOK — Bombing raids on targets in Laos and Vietnam from the U.S. Air Force Base at Utapao in southern Thailand were temporarily suspended Thursday as Queen Elizabeth flew in for a week-long state visit.

The giant B-52 bombers of the U.S. Air Force, which run 24-hour bombing missions over Indochina, were silent as the Queen's plane touched down.

Perhaps the Queen could take up temporary residence in Vietnam, just until Mr. Nixon finishes "winding down" his war, to keep those B-52's grounded.

Turnaround Gaels Dumping Gee-Gees

By Chris Boon

You ever have a really bleah day? Queen's Basketball Gaels did Friday night, as they stretched a 27-31 half-time deficit to 31-51 slaughter early in the fourth quarter. This amazing feat of basketball wizardry came at the hands of the Carleton Ravens in Ottawa.

Final score was 79-56. The really remarkable thing about the loss was how it came about. The Gaels got 18 points and 17 rebounds from Paul Howard, 16 and 11 from Andy Daugulis, and 11 and 10 from Rob Smart. Fine performances for any starting front three. Unfortunately, guards Peter Gordon and Dave Smith were atrocious, netting just 7 points between them, and throwing the ball away repeatedly.

The Gaels took just 48 shots, hitting on 40 per cent. Carleton took 36 shots in the second half along (making an amazing 51 per cent at that).

What were the causes? Gordon went 1-for-10 from the floor, throwing up poor shots and gunning even after it was obvious that he wasn't on. He and Daugulis dribbled the ball into trouble several times each, and lost control to Carleton's aggressive guards. People made stupid mistakes, like travelling, blowing 3-on-1 breaks, and wearing blinders.

There were maybe, just maybe, two good feeds made all night. The rest of the time, it was ho-hum, let's not hurry fellas. In a word, shitty.

The next day promised to be even worse. Ottawa U. had trimmed Carleton by 20 points Tuesday nights, and are a much more physical team. Gordon had departed to Kingston to write a set of law entrance examinations, so Frank Tindall gave soph Dave Wright a birthday present by starting him at the other guard spot. And the difference was amazing.

The Gaels stopped taking bad shots. They played good defence. And they hung in, 30-29 at the half, on the strength of some tough inside work by Howard, Smart and Daugulis, a couple of fast-break hoops that were a pleasure to see, and good, steady outside shooting from Dave Smith. What a difference a day makes!

Impressed by the strength of Ottawa's front wall, the Gaels made one important change at half-time; they inserted back-up centre Bruce Hemming, who is probably the most improved player on the team, into the line-up, shifting Paul Howard out to forward (at last, at last), and swinging Rob Smart back to guard. Sparked by Hemming's 7 points, 9 rebounds and tough, flailing defense, the Gaels shook up Ottawa, moving out to a 7-point lead with about 6:50 to go.

The Gee-Gee's closed to three, but could never quite make up the deficit, as both Vic Chandler and Vince Likenda fouled out late in the quarter. Rob Smart, revelling in the lighter traffic of his guard spot, produced the Gael's first real drives of the year, scoring two hoops himself and setting up several others, as well as dribbling and passing out of the Ottawa U. press. And Dave Smith had his most productive night as a Gael, hitting for 14 points and picking off 4 rebounds. Howard led all Gael scorers with 17 points (and 15 rebounds) while Daugulis had 14 points and 13 boards. Rob Smart added 7 points.

This game was the best Queen's has played all season, in terms of team play and the quality of shots taken; the Gaels put up 53 attempts, made 24 of them, and played aggressively for the first time since the Laurentian game.

Unfortunately, the effort came about one day late. It will be interesting to see if Tindall will continue to go with two big men against York, another tall, meaty crew that makes its points inside.

This observer, for one, hopes so. If the Gaels beat York, they will have knocked off each of the top three teams in the east -- and that, at least, is something to be proud of.

Badminton Men Take O.U.A.A. East

The powerful Queen's Men's Badminton team swept the OUAA "East" title over the weekend. In the contest at Ryerson, Queen's earned 16 out of a possible 18 points for their matches played, losing only two matches in the two-day meet. Their closest competition came, as expected, from York who finished with 13 points. Carleton and Ryerson had totals of 4 and 3 respectively at the end of the competition.

First Singles, James Lim won 2 of his 3 matches and will compete with three others for individual honours in the Finals to be held at Queen's. Henry Fei, Gerry Glover and Boon Ong; Second, Third and Fourth Singles; all won all three of their matches.

The First Doubles team of Lim-Fei won 2 of 3 matches and will meet three other pairs for pairs championships in the Finals. For team honours Queen's will compete against Toronto. Queen's finished second to Western in the finals last year after sweeping their division then also.

Versatile?!?

Utility forward Al Dresser extended his versatility beyond all previous expectations Saturday when he snared a thief in the Queen's dressing room during the Ottawa U. game. Dresser, who had gone looking for a missing water bottle, collared the culprit and turned him over to Ottawa police. The suspect had walked off with about $9.00 in cash and Stu Bridgeman's white uniform top.

Gymnasts 'Not Happy'

The QUEEN'S Men's Gymnastics team was not pleased with their second place finish in the "East" championships at York last weekend. They earned 177.95 points, compared to 210.95 for York, for their worst performance yet. Ottawa U. and Carleton also competed in the meet.

Tom Kinsman and Dave Hunter of York took 1st and 2nd places individually with 46.15 and 45.15 points respectively. Drew Strickland of Queen's locked up 3rd with 41.10 points. Colin Puffer and Larry Bialogrecki, both of York, took 4th and 5th places; and Dave Ross of Queen's came in 6th with 38.25 points.

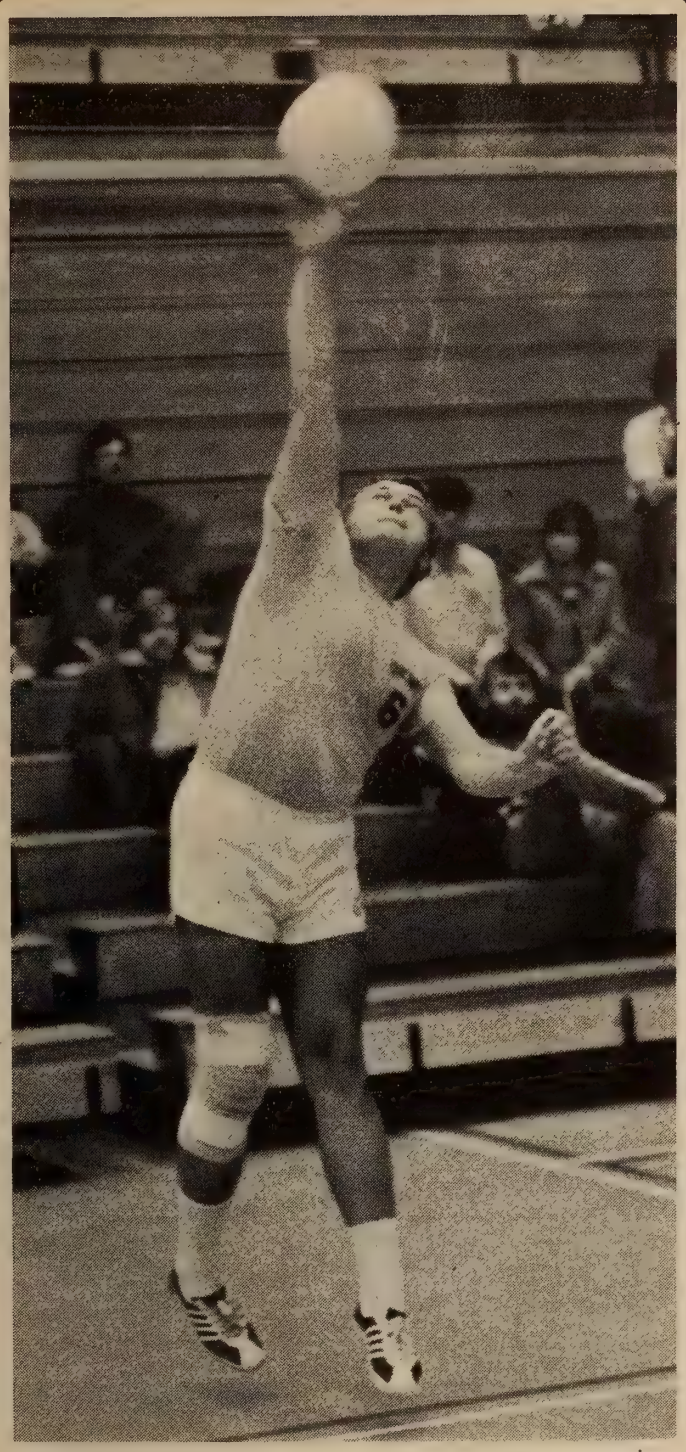
The finals will be held Feb. 26 in the Bartlett gym at Queen's with Queen's, U. of Toronto, McMaster and York.

CURLING ENDS

Gals Just Miss Title ...

Queen's curling Gals just missed the OWIAA title in McMaster Saturday. The Queen's team was tied with Waterloo after the six-team round-robin; each school had 4 wins and 1 loss. Waterloo took the playoff, and the title, 8-5.

...But Men Not So Close



Meanwhile, the men were in competition at Kingston's Cataraquie G. & C.C. in a four-team round-robin. Brock captured its first OUAA crown by sweeping all three games, downing Queen's 13-3, Waterloo 8-7 in an extra end, and Carleton 15-4. The Gaels also lost to Waterloo 10-5 and beat the Ravens 10-9.

Volleyball Men On Way to Nationals

Queen's held an Invitational Men's Volleyball Meet at McArthur Hall on Feb. 12 against an Ottawa Sr. A team and Toronto Plast. In the double round robin tournament Queen's defeated the Toronto team 15-13 and 15-13 in one match and 5-15, 15-13 and 15-12 in the second. Queen's lost one match to the Ottawa team 16-14 and 16-14; but won the second one 15-13 and 15-12.

Queen's Volleyball team will be representing Ontario at the Intercollegiate Championships to be held at Laval University in Quebec City on Feb. 25, 26. There will be four teams in the competition with only Queen's as a known competitor as yet. Other possible competitors are Dalhousie and Manitoba. Coach George Rada of Queen's feels that his team has an excellent chance at the title.

Milligan, Becke 1,2 at C.O.T.F.

Gael longjumpers placed 1-2 in the Central Ontario Track and Field Junior Championships in Toronto this Saturday. Glen Milligan was first with a leap of 21'3", while Axel Becke took second, a scant ¼" behind. Milligan also took 3rd spot in the 50-yard dash with a time of 6.0 sec.

Later in the afternoon, Milligan and Becke combined with Archer Guy and Bill Bryden for another 3rd in the 4 x 220-yd sprint relay.

A women's contingent also made the trip to Toronto, but Queen's top competitor, Irene Harris, had flu problems. Irene managed to qualify for the 50-metre final, winning her heat in a time of 6.6 seconds, but was unable to compete in the final sprint. Janey O'Rourke recorded a personal-best time of 7.1, just missing the 50-m cutoff, while Sue Foster and Barb Platt had 7th-place finishes in the 1500 and 800 metre runs.

Gaels Drop Two In Costly Weekend

Bob Carnegie's Hockey Gaels dropped two games in what was probably the costliest weekend swing in recent history. York came from behind with two late goals to edge the Gaels 5-4, and a hot Laurentian squad bombed an injury-riddled Gold contingent 10-2.

The loss to York was an exciting contest marred only by three serious injuries to Queen's stalwarts. Winger Murray Douglas broke an arm, rookie standout Steve Gross suffered a twisted knee with probable ligament damage, and Dave Melloy received a concussion when hit on the head by a York player's stick; Melloy kept playing until he was nailed with an elbow to the head, aggravating the condition.

Bill White opened the scoring for Queen's, but three quick York goals gave the Yeomen an early lead. Doug Barton brought the Gaels back with two goals in a span of 15 seconds and Queen's took the lead 4-3 on Dave Nuttall's goal early in the third period. The effects of the injuries began to tell midway through the final stanza, especially that to Gross, and York was able to tie, the go ahead as the undermanned Gael defense started to sag.

Saturday's game with Laurentian was something of a letdown. The Voyageurs were hot, and the Gaels, still coming out of shell-shock, were icy-cold. The final tally was 10-2, with Colin Loudin and Bruce Kindon potting the only Gael markers. After a weekend like that it is one hell of a long ride back to Kingston.

W.I.C. News

The pace of the W.I.C. schedule slows down this -- last week having been one of the busiest of the season.

The swim meet saw Arts '73 take first place and Rehab and P.H.E. tie for second, followed by Meds and Arts '74. The archery tournament was also held last week, but the whereabouts of the results eludes us. Hopefully, they'll be found by next week.

The main activities this week are volleyball, indoor softball and curling. A squash tournament is under way, as well.

The volleyball schedule is:

7:15	Meds vs P.H.E.	Bews Gym
7:15	Nursing vs Arts '73	Bews Gym
7:30	Law vs Arts '74	Ross Gym
8:15	Law vs Meds	Bews Gym
8:15	Rehab vs Arts '74	Bews Gym

(Arts '75 is no longer eligable to play volleyball).

In softball on Thursday, P.H.E. meets Arts '73, and Arts '75 takes up the bat against Rehab.

Wrestlers 2nd at Ryerson

Saturday the Queen's Wrestling team travelled to Ryerson along with R.M.C., York and U. of Toronto.

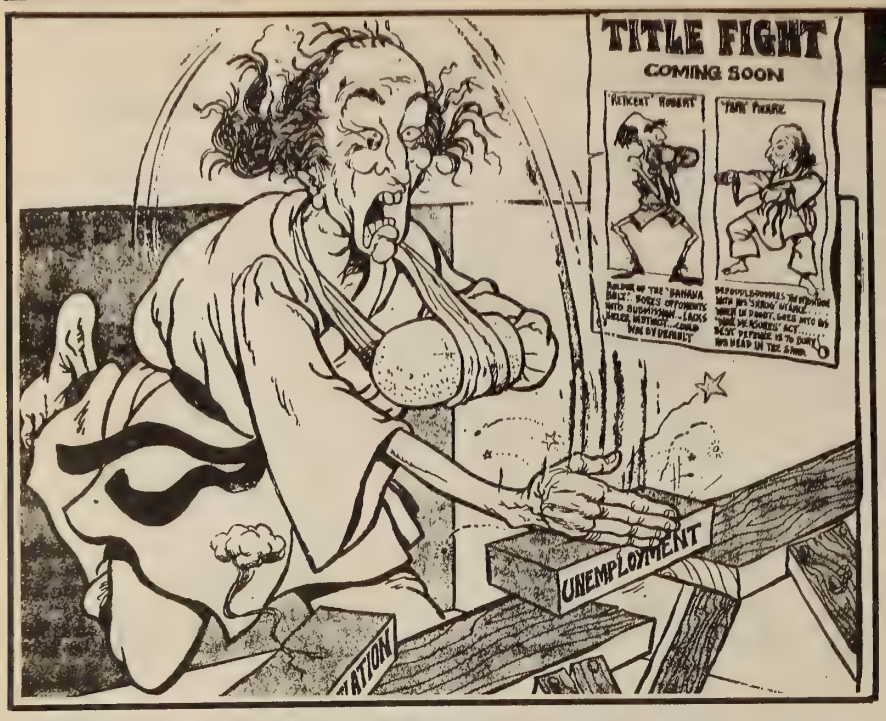
Garry Brown (142 pound class) and Mike Dwhytie (150) both won their weight classes. Steve Brown (118), Dana Thompson (158) and John Johnson (167) did very well, all placing second.

Queen's was missing a few wrestlers and managed only a second place team finish to R.M.C. Queen's travels to the O.U.A.A. finals in Guelph next weekend for two days of wrestling. It will be a short but hard week of Practices, dieting to make weight, and pressure. In spite of this it is expected that at least two Queen's wrestlers will make the Canadian finals.

Skigals Take Close Second

The O.W.I.A.A. Alpine Ski Championships were held at Blue Mountain on Feb. 10, 11 with Queen's emerging in second place. Western captured the title by earning 106.9 points in the Slalom event and 104.5 in the Giant Slalom, edging Queen's by a scant 5.3 pts -- 211.4 to 216.7 for the Skigals.

Queen's gained their placing the hard way as they were only fifth at the end of Thursday's competition and had little hope of improving greatly on their ranking.



Perhaps it was this realization that took some of the pressure off the girls and helped them come back with totals of 108.7 in the Slalom and 108.0 in the Giant Slalom.

A major factor in Queen's good showing was Marg Chaput, who placed second all-round with a second in Slalom and a third in Giant Slalom. Cindy Cisk of Western took the over-all honours in the meet.

Also placing for Queen's was Sue Honeyman with a seventh in Giant Slalom. This gives the team a win and a place in season competition.

TORONTO — Canada should stop trying to imitate the U.S. economy and concentrate instead on a "Canadian goal of improving the quality of life for our people," says Liberal MP Eric Kierans.

If this were done, he says, federal and provincial governments automatically, "will emphasize more single-mindedly than today the objectives of eliminating poverty, reducing the burdens on the sick and aged and financing the technology that will control and roll back the pollution of the environment and improve housing, school and hospital facilities."

To provide jobs for a fast-growing labour force and for people now unemployed, Kierans advises a "strongly expansionary policy" of low interest and abundant credit.

Kierans views were contained in a special issue of Canadian Forum magazine which appeared on newsstands Thursday.

TORONTO — John White, former minister of colleges and universities, said Friday he supports a proposal to establish in Ontario an open university that would offer instruction by television, radio and mail to anyone who applied.

White, now minister of trade and development, tourism and information, said in an interview that he was in England examining the British open university when he learned of its new job in last week's cabinet shuffle.

White said he liked what he saw in Britain "and I thought we might attempt something like it.".

As well as offering correspondence courses, it should also act as a clearing house, the commission said, to test and award degrees and diplomas to persons for educational achievements attained from diverse sources.

WASHINGTON — The United States and Canada have failed to reach agreement on a package of trade concessions which the U.S. Government has been demanding in negotiations since last summer.

U.S. officials revealed this Wednesday night while announcing that the U.S. Government will ask Congress to devalue the U.S. dollar because of trade concessions gained from the United States' two other major trading partners -- Japan and the European Economic Community.

U.S. officials deliberately raised the spectre of unilateral action against Canadian imports by either the Government or Congress if Canadian-U.S. trade negotiations do not resume and result in a settlement.

Although U.S. officials told a press conference last night that they hoped negotiations will resume a publicly released letter from Tresasury Secretary John Connally to President Richard Nixon made it clear that the United States will act on its own if Canada does not come to terms.

MONTREAL — La Presse introduced a new style of newsroom management when it resumed publication Thursday after a three-month shutdown.

The owners of the French-language daily agreed to share some of their management prerogatives with the union representing 170 editorial employees.

The company and union will have equal representation on two decision-making committees. One panel will hear grievances over the handling of news copy, the second will draft a set of qualifications for each job classification.

The settlement came last weekend after a bitter six-month dispute over the paper's political orientation. The journalists accused the editors of censoring and distorting the news, while owner Paul Desmarais vowed that he would prevent left-wing separatists from seizing control of the paper.

OTTAWA — An internal federal government report prepared earlier this week sharply criticizes Michelin Tire Manufacturing Co. Ltd. for preventing employee interviews by analysts working for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

The report says the French tire company, which has received $50 million in loans and grants from the federal and Nova Scotia governments, denied interviewers access to its Bridgewater, N.S. plant.

The interviewers were attempting to determine the impact of the giant tire complex on the community and to discover how many of the almost 1,000 plant employees were hired locally.

Michelin also refused to release a list of its employees.

The report concentrates its criticism on alleged lack of obligation felt by the company after accepting government money.

"It appears that Michelin feels no responsibility or commitment to its funding agency -- a situation which would certainly not be tolerated had a citizens group received a similar grant.

"Is it not strange that the strict accountability procedures utilized in transferring public monies to voluntary agences are not mirrored in the transfer of public monies into private pockets?"

The recently announced layoffs of International Nickel Co. of Canada Ltd. employees is going to come under the scrutiny of the Ontario Government's Select Committee on Economic and Cultural Nationalism

Committee chairman Russell Rowe (PC, Northumberland) announced Wednesday the committee will go to Sudbury next Tuesday and attempt to discover whether the layoff is related to the fact that the company has centres of operation and management in several countries.

Mr. Rowe said that the committee has to prepare an interim report by March 1, so not everyone in Sudbury who might wish to give evidence will be able to do so.

OTTAWA — An agency to screen foreign investment and divert it to regions of Canada which need foreign capital will be a key feature of the government's policy on foreign ownership, sources here said Friday.

The long-awaited policy statement will be made in about 10 days, when stock markets are closed, they said.

The sources said, however, that the agency's function as conceived by the government would not be to restrict foreign capital but to divert it to the less developed regions of the country.

The sources said cabinet is now united on the policy mainly because it does not aim to severely restrict foreign investment, or "buy Canada back" from foreign owners of resources and manufacturing industries.

OTTAWA — The federal government will publish a French translation of a recent study of Acadian education in Nova Scotia following complaints by the province's Francophone federation that only English copies are available.

Managing director of the federation, Paul Gaudet, said, "How are the Francophones (Acadians) of Nova Scotia to react? Are they forced to take second place as usual and content themselves with studying a question that interests them greatly in a second language?"

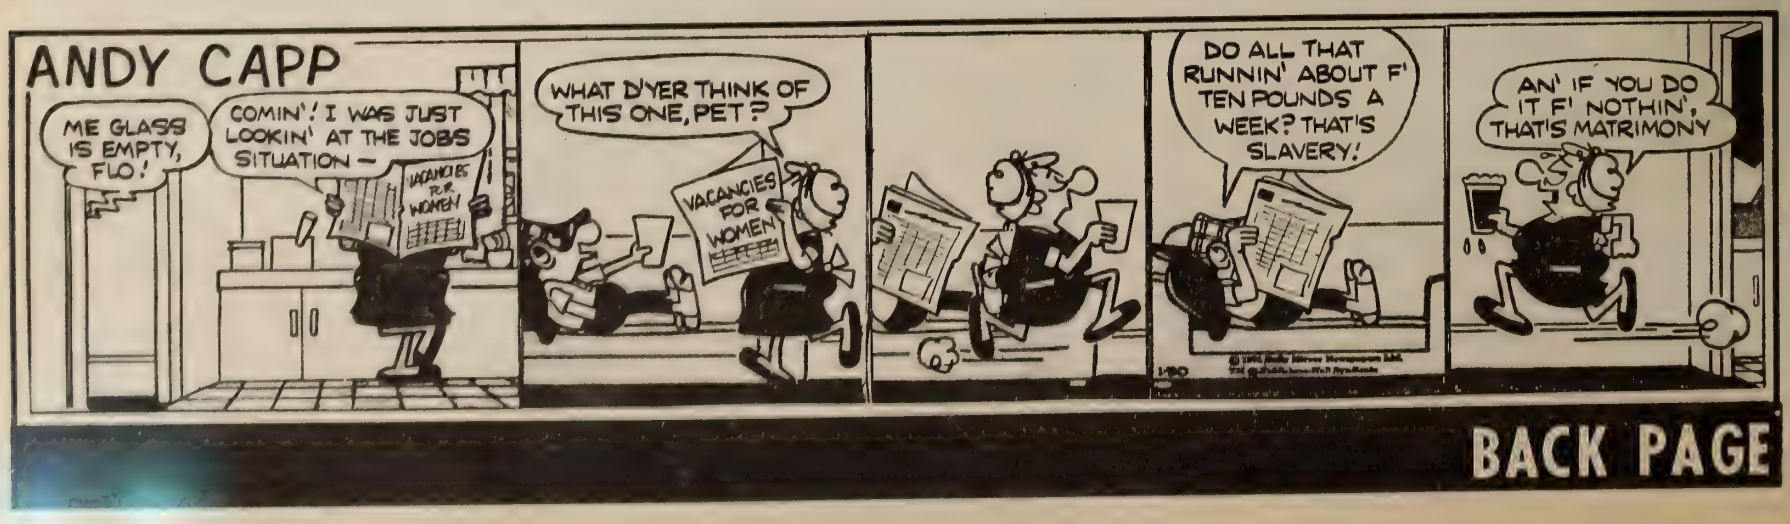
The study was commissioned by the Commission of Bilingualism and Biculturalism.

OTTAWA — Canada is "in the midst of the most serious crisis in our history" and must have a new constitution which hands over more power to the provinces, according to a two-year study by a parliamentary committee.

The report by the 30-member Special Parliamentary Committee on the Constitution says federal-provincial jurisdiction must be completely overhauled, with Ottawa giving the provinces control over their own cultural and social policies.

Only in this way can "substantial discontent" which exists all across the country, but especially in Quebec, be mollified, says the confidential report scheduled to be tabled when the House of Commons reconvenes next Wednesday.

QUEBEC — The Quebec Government will give in to Ottawa in the current federal-provincial dispute on unemployment insurance.



Labor Minister Jean Cournoyer indicated during a news conference Wednesday that Quebec will drop its challenge to the new federal program following a day-long meeting with leaders of Quebec's major unions.

Two weeks ago the province advised 310,000 public service employees and other employees working for Crown corporations to withhold unemployment incurance contributions for the duration of the dispute.

OTTAWA — Secretary of State Gerard Pelletier Friday unveiled a $1.7-million package of programs to support the Canadian publishing industry.

They include transfer to private publishers of books that would, in the past, have been produced by the federal Government itself, increased individual grants to aid the publication of Canadian works, an expanded budget for translation of books published in Canada, and increased Government buying and sales promotion of Canadian works here and abroad.

"I personally believe," Mr. Pelletier said, "that Canadians have clearly grasped the fact that a people cannot abandon its basic cultural resources to foreigners, however friendly and well-meaning, unless it has first agreed to renounce its collective personality."

Journal gets to fifty

Journal co-editor Bill Johnston stunned staff members Tuesday night with the announcement that today's paper is number 50.

"It's a nice round number," he pointed out, and well above the previous record for Journal issues in one academic year.

Mathematical wizards on the staff confirmed his statement. In honour of the occasion, some staffers wandered up to the House of Commons to look for more 50. Others counted quietly to 50 and wondered about their blood pressure.

There will be a paper tomorrow as usual; next week only one Journal, probably on Friday; and after reading week we will resume regular schedule.

Queen's joins student league

Queen's will be a founding member of the Ontario Federation of Students, the AMS executive decided on Monday night.

The OFS proposal was brought to the council by AMS president Patrick Riley, who has been a leader, together with student presidents from the University of Toronto and the University of Western Ontario, in planning the existence of an OFS.

The new federation will include student bodies from Ontario universities, community colleges, and other "post-secondary institutions" which choose to join.

Riley said it will supplant the old Ontario Union of Students, of which Queen's is a member, but which has become inactive in the past year. The OUS cannot be revived, he said, chiefly because the Students' Administrative Council at the University of Toronto is constitutionally forbidden to join it.

By the AMS constitution, Queen's still pays an annual fee of 25 cents per student in OUS, but this money is returned to the AMS at once to be used in financing its dealings with other universities. This could include OFS activities, Riley said.

"We always deal in legal fictions around here," Riley commented on the OUS financing arrangement.

He said there were two "touchy issues" involved in setting up a provincial student federation: its permanent office, or secretariat, and its funding.

Queen's led the move to disband the secretariat of the Ontario Union of Students last year, Riley remarked. The political direction of the central office was also an issue in the collapse of the Canadian Union of Students in 1970. (Queen's withdrew from CUS membership in a referendum the previous year.)

No decision has been made about an OFS secretariat, Riley said. A draft OFS constitution distributed at Monday's meeting does provide for permanent paid officers.

Nor are the financial details fixed, Riley told the council. Budgeting is likely to be on a prject-by-project basis, he suggested.

The draft constitution, however, says that each member should be expected to pay an annual fee of 15 cents per student. For Queen's this would come to about $1245 per year.

A cover letter with the draft constitution says, "It is hoped that as many student associations as possible will come to the founding conference of the Ontario Federation of Students prepared to join in and make the organization work and make a financial commitment of at least 15 cents per member student."

That founding conference is scheduled for March 9 through 11 in Toronto.

The cover letter is signed by Bob Spencer, who is president of the Students' Administrative Council at the University of Toronto, "for the Ontario Union of Students' Councils", the ad hoc body which has coordinated a number of meetings this year among student council officers, discussing such topics as curriculum and student financing.

The Ontario Union of Students' Councils is not the same as OUS, nor is it the same as the Association of Student Councils (AOSC) which sponsors student charter flights.

The Ontario Student Federation (Federation Ontarienne des Etudiants) will thus be the fourth league of post-secondary student councils existing in Ontario.

Riley told the AMS council that cooperation with students at other Ontario universities is important so that a student opinion on such matters as government financing and the structure of university education can be expressed at a provincial level.

He said the informal cooperation which has existed through OUSC this year has been successful, but that a structure would be useful in future.

The OFS constitution gives its chief power to a members' conference at which each institution would have one vote.

It gives the purposes of the OFS as liaison, information gathering, lobbying for student representation on government committees, generating employment and aid schemes for students, and "to do whatever the member institutions decide it should do."

Apathy shows itself at Awareness

"Queen's, a hotbed of apathy" was the topic of the seminar which was supposed to take place Monday night.

Only 25 students came to the meeting, sponsored by the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society as the fourth in a series of Awareness 72 discussions.

Stanley Burke, former CBC newscaster, was scheduled to speak but did not appear -- reportedly he was snowed in at his Georgian Bay cottage.

Regarding the turnout, John Munday, one of the student coordinators, commented, "It turned out to be a very fitting title."

But the event went on as planned, with nine discussion leaders and a guest speaker, Dunning Trust lecturer Dr. R. P. Baffour, on hand to talk with students about social, economic and cultural problems.

Baffour discussed the effect of modern technology on the poverty level of agricultural economics. The primary problems involved in such an economic transformation, he suggested, were psychological. "The most horrifying form of poverty is poverty of the spirit."

There is also much pressure applied by outside industrialists, to thrust technology on underdeveloped nations for their own advantage, he said. "This must be controlled."

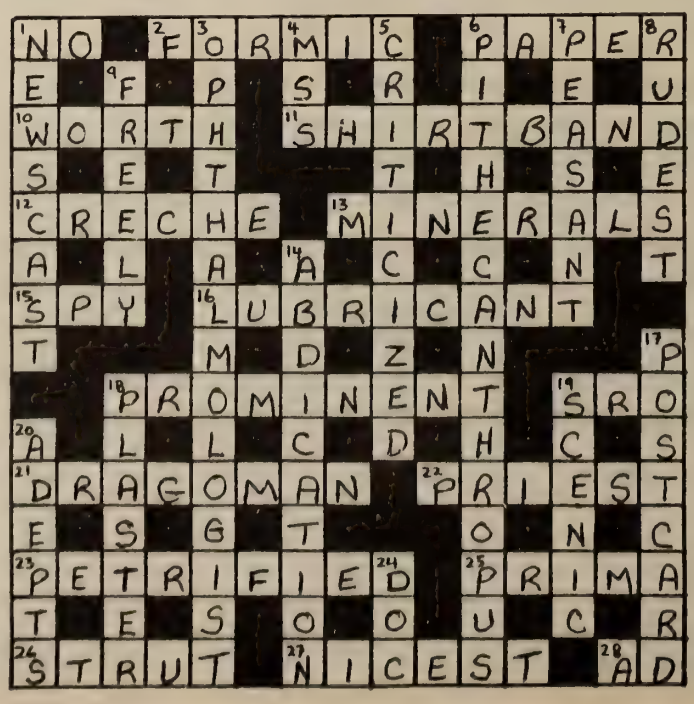
Baffour expressed concern for underdeveloped nations which are strangled by developed countries in international markets. Fluctuations in the price of commodities is often artificially controlled, he said. The cocoa crisis of 1945 in Ghana, Baffour's homeland, testifies to the defencelessness of underdeveloped nations against this form of manipulation, he said.

In spite of all the drawbacks, Baffour said, "technology is desperately needed in backward countries today."

He summarized the state of his own country of Ghana: "There is plenty of food, but transportation and processing facilities are lacking."

Key playwright's work to be performed

The Queen's Department of Drama opened its second major production of the year last night -- What The Butler Saw. This play, written by the late British playwright Joe Orton, is a strange combination of hillarity and horror. In the tradition of the French and English farce, Orton has depicted the vicious humour resulting from his outrage against the hypocrisy which stems from the absurd absolutes of truth, sanity, and authority. He recognized the qualities in people which constitute the makings of true farce. "People," the playwright observed, "are profoundly bad but irresistibly funny." It comes as no surprise to people who are familiar with his writings that Orton was murdered by his homosexual lover at the age of 34, for along with sex and insanity, violence was always a prominent theme in all his works.



What The Butler Saw, the last work of the playwright, and unrevised at the time of his death in 1967, is considered to be his finest work. In this play, Orton completes the destruction of accepted and established pillars of society that he began in his earlier plays. Butler presents a disturbingly farcical expose' on psychiatry.

Set in an asylum, the roles of the sane and insane are freely interchanged. The end result is that sanity is certainly not a quality to be wished. A most unlikely group of characters come together on stage in very logical ways, although the play offers no logical solution for the resultant chaos. The action moves at an incredibly fast pace during which identities (not to mention clothes) are exchanged, disguises are constantly being destroyed, and the characters become more and more unreal. Although hysterically funny, the play has, under all the glitter and comic situation, an everpresent ugliness -- the desire of people (and Orton) to desecrate sacred cows.

When, in 1969, the play was first presented in London, it was almost shouted off the stage. Since then, audiences in Winnipeg, Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal, and Halifax have proved that at least Canada is ready for Orton's sacrilege.

Solution to Tuesday's puzzle

AMS does this and that, argues club grants and city buses

By Chris Redmond

The AMS executive met for two hours Monday night to limp and quack its way through mostly routine business. High point of the evening came when desk-banging members unanimously passed a motion congratulating speaker Paul Kennedy on his performance as the Master of Ceremonies in the Queen's Musical Theatre presentation "Cabaret" which played last week.

The longest debate centered around approval of minutes from meetings of the inner council (cabinet), which makes routine decisions for the outer council to overturn. Among the decisions presented this time were some increases in club grants, notably to the Chinese Club to pay for the China Bowl, an athletic meet for Chinese students across Ontario, to be held at Queen's next month.

Graduate rep Graham Millington took exception to this, repeating his frequent claim that the AMS gives money freely to anyone who asks for it. He expressed scepticism with the system by which inner council gives away money and does not provide to outer council the information on which its decision was based.

Asked whether he was suggesting a lack of confidence in inner council and internal affairs commissioner Jim Richardson, Millington said, "I don't want to say that that was my intent, but it could definitely be construed that way."

AMS president Patrick Riley said he trusted inner council and favoured the Chinese Club's project. Other members expressed opinions on the club grant system, notably education rep Anne Merrick, who took Richardson to task for what she said was an inadequate grant to the Curling Club. (This is not a new subject of conversation for Mrs. Merrick). After a good deal of discussion, the suggested grants were approved.

Kingston poor people's organizer Mrs. Bobbi Spark appeared to ask for AMS support in her campaign to have evening city bus service expanded. She told the council that the Public Utilities Commission will be holding a hearing on the subject, but said submissions can only be made under restrictive conditions: "The whole point is that it's a railroad job."

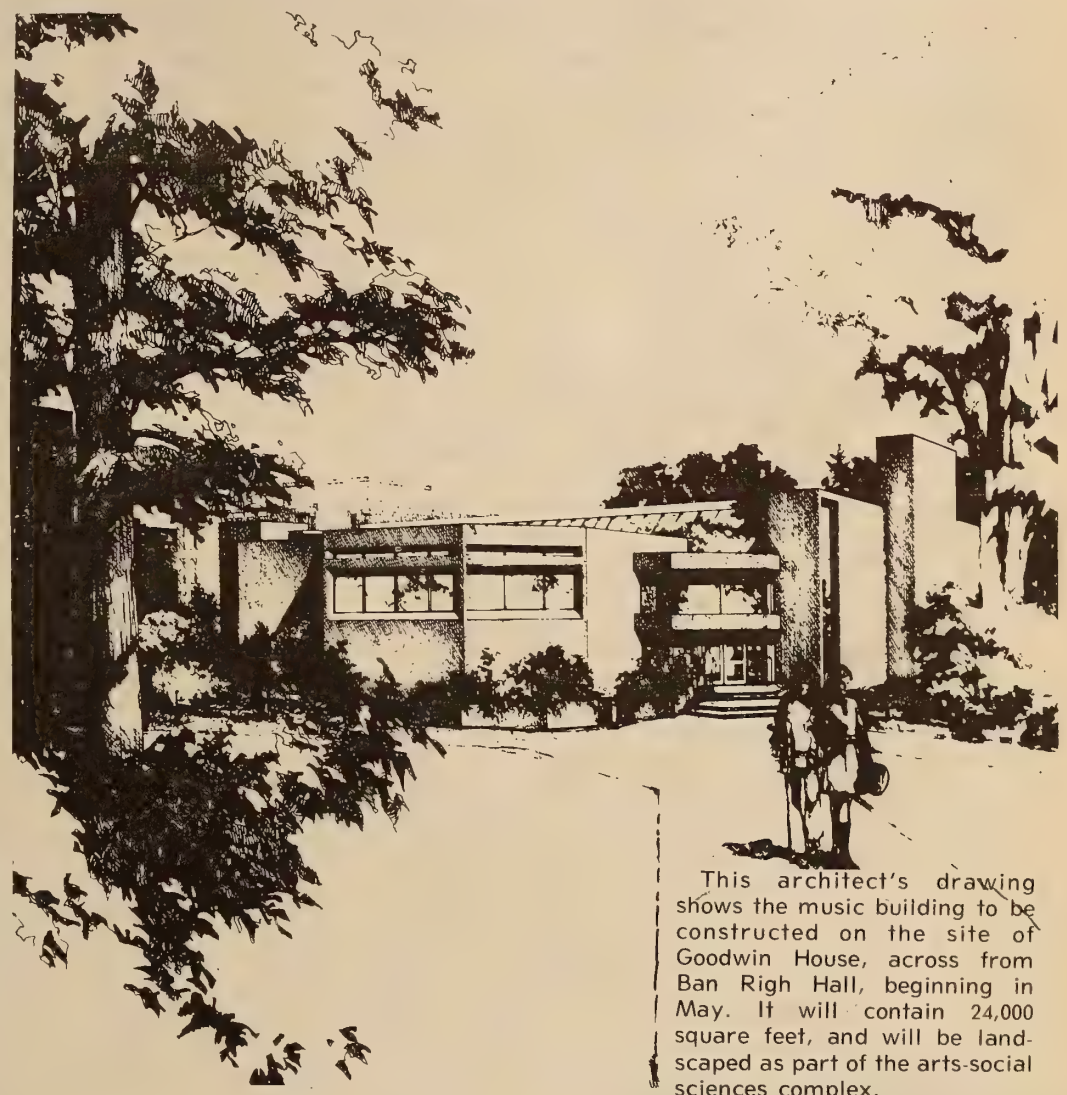
Council members generally agreed with her that it would be nice to have more extensive bus service in the evenings, and agreed that an AMS brief to this effect would be submitted to the Public Utilities Commission at the appropriate time.

Next guest to appear was Doug Fletcher, a former engineering rep to council and now spearheading a campaign to organize a telephone distress centre at Queen's for next fall.

A preliminary request for $200 of AMS money was rejected by the council two weeks ago, and Fletcher appeared to back up a renewed request with explanations of what the service would do. It will provide an all-night number students can phone for confidential comfort, conversation and referral, he said, and will be run by trained students backed up by professionals in counselling, medicine and other fields.

The $200 grant will pay for training, Fletcher said, to provide a core of volunteers qualified "to get to the gut feeling of what this kid must be going through", not just to refer her or him to a clinical specialist or other professional in every case.

He said Dr. J. R. Handforth, who is director of psychiatry for the student health service, felt there is a need for such a service at Queen's.



The council agreed to make the $200 grant after hearing the details of Fletcher's proposal and being told of the success of a similar project at the University of Waterloo. Fletcher indicated that the project's organizers would approach the AMS later for an additional grant to operate the service next fall.

Commerce rep Jim Dinning presented the report of a committee which he chaired, studying the effects on the AMS of the university's new discipline policy. The report included a number of structural changes in the AMS constable system, and one policy change: a requirement that constables be posted at all Queen's social events, not just those where the chief constable considers that they are needed.

There was a good deal of discussion of this, featuring Ian Nordheimer (inter-residence chairman and candidate for chief constable) being sceptical of such a broad proposal. Eventually the by-law changes in Dinning's report were given "first reading" -- the first of three votes which must be taken before they go into effect -- and various people expressed their intention of planning some detailed changes to bring up next time.

Grad rep Graham Millington and grad president-elect Doug Pritchard put through a motion calling on the constitutional review committee, which has not been exactly active, to write a by-law defining the structure of the concert committee. Everybody agreed this was desirable, and assured concert committee chairman John Green that he would be consulted in the writing.

Other business done included a routine motion to pay spring honoraria to those AMS officers who are supposed to receive them, and an adjournment motion sponsored, as usual, but arts and science reps Kathy McSweeney and Alison Allan.

This architect's drawing shows the music building to be constructed on the site of Goodwin House, across from Ban Righ Hall, beginning in May. It will contain 24,000 square feet, and will be landscaped as part of the arts-social sciences complex.

Who showed up when the AMS met

The representatives who were present at the AMS meeting at starting time, seven o'clock, Monday night, asked The Journal to tell the world who did and didn't bother to show up.

Those present:

From arts and science -- Jim Richardson, Barbara Slater, Alison Allan, Kathy McSweeney, Glenn Hall.

From law -- Wally Palmer, Paul Herbert.

From grads -- Graham Millington, Doug Pritchard.

From meds -- Gord Francis.

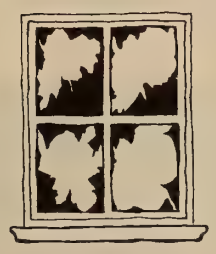
From nursing -- Rotha Groom.

From education - Anne Merrick.

From residence -- Ian Nordheimer.

From theology -- Doug Powell.

President Patrick Riley; speaker Paul Kennedy; secretary Nancy Shurtleff.



Artsci rep Gary Gannage arrived at 7:22, providing a quorum for the meeting. A few other members trickled in later.

A final exam for AMS representatives

Poverty law: meeting the legal needs of the poo

By Bernie McCashin

It has become fashionable recently in legal circles and particularly in law schools to speak of "poverty law" in the same sense that in the past areas of the law have been labelled "criminal law", "property law", "taxation" and so on. Indeed, many law schools in Canada are now offering what are called poverty law seminars. These seminars emphasize the relationship of the law to the portion of our society that is difficult to accurately number but easily recognizable as unable to command more than a small share of the gross national product. There is little doubt that a majority of the poor view the legal system as another series of obstacles prohibiting or regulating conduct or denying real needs. However, there is a dawning realization that the law contains remedial and compensatory measures that can be used to advantage in redressing grievances.

The study and practice of poverty law have been the result of a growing awareness among students and lawyers and the poor themselves that the law has a part to play in the alleviation of poverty. There is an awareness that laws reflect the values of the people that make them. A legal system is not distinct from, but an integral part of, the society in which it operates. It determines to a large extent the way in which people live together and processes by which an individual's conduct is prohibited or made to conform or disputes are settled. If it is or should be a value of our society that there be a more even distribution of wealth, then any legal rights that have existed in the past and which may be used to achieve that end must now be implemented.

There are three aspects of poverty law: first, the kinds of laws that are available as remedies for the poor;second, the accessibility of legal services to the poor; and third, the organization of self-help community groups to provide the poor with more power and a louder voice in making their demands heard.

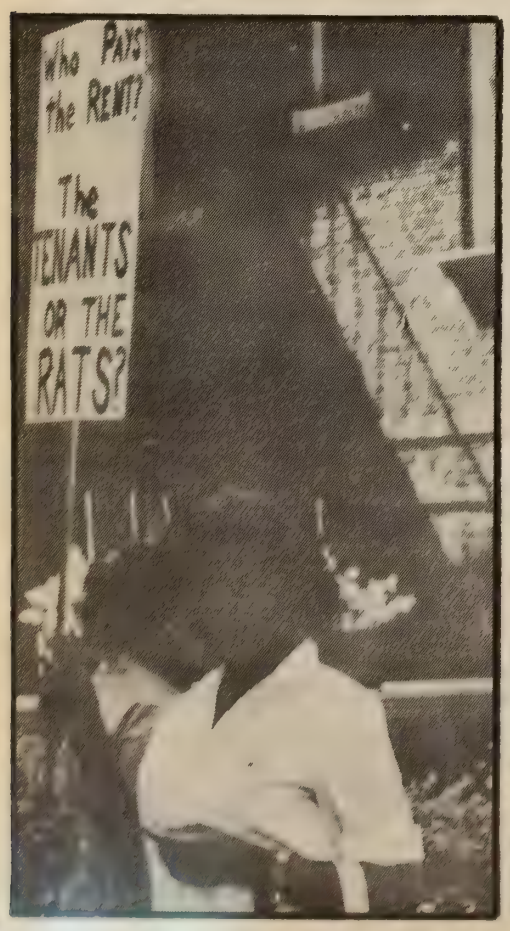
The first aspect mentioned above has to do with legislation passed to help strengthen the bargaining position of those in society who do not have the economic power to trade effectively in the market place: consumer protection, public housing, landlord and tenant laws, welfare assistance, unemployment insurance and the like. While few knowledgeable people would state that present social welfare legislation is adequate, the practicing lawyer has a limited role in bringing about new legislation. At the same time, to the extent that law reform commissions and bar association study committees affect public policy and considering that politicians are often lawyers in disguise, the opportunity for lawyers to influence public policy is not as limited as is often claimed by the legal profession.

However, the concept of poverty law is not as concerned with implementing new legislation as it is with making available the existing remedies and rights. There is an increasing realization that poor people are not simply rich people without money. The rich client - lawyer relationship usually involves assistance with a temporary legal problem that once solved allows the client to return to his way of life, unhindered by legal intervention. The poor person is continually faced with legal or quasi-legal obstacles: obtaining or retaining government assistance, being hounded by creditors, disputes with the landlord, paying inflated prices at the local supermarket, family conflict. There are legal remedies for some of these problems but they have not been available for two major reasons: first, what are in fact legal problems are often not recognized as such by the poor; and second, if the problem were recognized as a legal one, it is the rare poor person who for reasons of time, money and uneasiness would approach a richly furnished downtown law office inhabited by busy upper-class professionals.

The implementation of the Ontario Legal Aid Plan covering criminal and civil matters was meant to provide the client with the lawyer of his choice in serious legal matters with little or no legal fees as long as the client passed the needs test. The plan is fully funded by the province and administered by the Law Society of Upper Canada. There is a Provincial Director assisted at the local level by 46 Area Directors, practicing lawyers administering legal aid on a part-time basis. Each Area Director hears applications for legal aid and after determining whether a sufficiently serious legal problem exists, calculates the approximate cost of the aid sought. An officer of the Department of Social and Family Services assesses how much, if any, of the estimated cost the applicant can pay. The Area Director then makes a decision on whether to issue a certificate. If a lawyer wishes to participate in the program, he places his name on a panel. Once a certificate is obtained by an applicant, he is shown the panels and selects the lawyer of his choice. The lawyer selected is not obligated to take the case.

While the plan reduces the financial requirements for obtaining a lawyer for those who cannot afford to pay the usual rates, there is still a serious doubt as to whether it solves the problem of accessibility to legal services. It is still dependent on the person recognizing that he has a legal problem and it still entails travelling to a downtown law office for a qualification test and perhaps a legal aid certificate. The alternative proposal is for legal aid offices situated in the poor communities, funded by government and staffed by full-time lawyers who over a period of time become familiar with the particular problems of the poor in the community in which they work. However, the legal profession is deeply committeed to the present legal aid plan mainly because once a client qualifies, it allows the client to choose the lawyer that he feels will best represent his interests. It may be noted that it is often a process of running a finger down a list of unknown names and therefore the choice is probably more apparent than real.

While a community legal aid clinic may offer little choice of lawyers and still require financial eligibility, it does provide specialists in the field of poverty law and geographic proximity as well as lawyers who have a chance to establish themselves in positions of trust in the community. If the poor are going to be provided with a full range of legal services in the same way that a middle-class community is, it is important that lawyers practice poverty law on a more than part-time basis. That practice ought to include anticipation and avoidance of legal problems by discussing with individuals and groups the legal and other consequences of actions they contemplate. Lawyers can create and develop mechanisms which can assist the poor in achieving desired ends - co-operatives which might be used to lower food prices, standard-form contracts, advisory committees to public housing authorities or welfare officials and enforcement mechanisms to assist in policying housing standards or weights and measures in local supermarkets. Where it is appropriate, legal problems may have to be settled in court - such things as criminal charges, and debtor-creditor law.



One of the significant problems of the poor person is that he often finds himself subject to the dictates of a public administrator whether it be the welfare administrator, the public housing authority or the Children's Aid Society. For example, social assistance legislation in Ontario states that under certain conditions a person has a legal right to receive welfare, that is, he is entitled to demand and receive assistance in the form of monthly cash payments. However, the legislation which outlines the conditions under which a recipient qualifies and determines the amount of allowance is extremely complex and often ambiguous. Each locality in the Province has a welfare administrator whose task it is to interpret the legislation, decide if the applicant qualifies for assistance and, if he does, the amount to be paid. In order to contradict the administrator on either issue or to carry a dispute to a higher authority, if necessary to the courts, a sophisticated knowledge of welfare legislation is required. Lawyers can advantageously represent poor people in challenging arbitrary administrative action.

It is difficult not to conclude that poverty exists in Canada because some people who are not poor believe that it is a good thing to have some poor people around. In other words, poor people are not poor by chance, or through lack of personal merit or because it is inevitable that someone be poor. Consequently, if poverty is to be alleviated, it is likely that the poor themselves are going to have to do it by working at it together in organized groups. "It is a fact that man, by nature, is not lazy, but on the contrary suffers from the results of inactivity. People might prefer not to work for one or two months, but the vast majority would beg for work, even if they were not paid for it."

-Erich Fromm

Most people have quite mixed feelings about the issue of welfare. On the basis of occasional remarks made by philosophers and politicians, some persons believe that most human beings would not work and would become freeloaders if the society provided everything free. Is this really true - would people become freeloaders if someone handed them the things they wanted? In an effort to answer this complex question, we planned a series of experiments with children and animals.

First we tested children to find whether they would prefer to obtain marbles free, or by working. We built a big plywood box and painted it black with a white top. An experimenter sat inside the box and dispensed marbles through a metal tube into plastic cups at each end of the box. A peephole allowed him to observe each child's behaviour.

In the work condition, a child sat on one side of the box and pressed a level ten times to receive on marble. In the freeloading condition, he sat before the cup on the other side of the box, with no lever, and waited for the machine to dispense marbles. We told each child to try for as many marbles as possible from the machine. He could keep all the marbles, or trade them for one of the toys displayed outside the experimental room.

In preliminary training we divided the subjects into two groups. Half of the children got free marbles first, and then learned to press the bar. The other half worked first, and then got free marbles. (If the child began on the no-work side, he recieved one marble every three seconds. If he already had work experience, the rate at which he received marbles on the no-work side was based on the average rate established on the work side.) For the preliminary training, each child obtained five marbles from the work side, and five marbles from the no-work side.

We then told the child that he could get marbles from either side and that he could switch from one side to another as many times as he wished, or not switch if he preferred one side over the other. The only requirement was that he must sit in one of the chairs in order for the machine to function. We then tested each child for five minutes a day for two days and recorded the number of marbles obtained on each side.

Both boys and girls got significantly more marbles by working than they did by freeloading. We did not find a significant difference between the number of marbles the girls got, and the number the boys got in the work condition. In addition, we compared the number of marbles obtained by the subjects with the scores they made on the California Short-Form Test of Mental Maturity. We did not find a significant relationship between I.Q. and number of marbles obtained.

Why do children prefer to work to get marbles when they could get them free? Could it be that they find bar-pressing in itself lots of fun, and thus were merely playing? Apparently not, because when bar-pressing produces no marbles, none of the children presses the bar; they obtain marbles from the free side. Likewise, children's preference for working cannot be explained by assuming that bar-pressing is a problem-solving situation and hence more interesting. First of all, the preliminary training eliminated the problem-solving aspect of the work side. Second, if the work side had indeed been more interesting, the second day of testing should have produced an outcome different from the first day's, since it can safely be assumed that by the end of the first day the child had solved the problem. The outcome of the second day of testing was not significantly different from the first day's.

It might be argued that the preference to get marbles by bar-pressing - a more laborious process than waiting for them to drop unbidden into a cup - might be the result of cultural upbringing. The Protestant Ethic stresses that a person should labor against the sloth that is presumed to be natural to man. Children reared in this tradition learn the virtue of work from their parents and they therefore prefer to work in spite of the fact that they can obtain identical rewards without working. If this argument is correct, children from a culture that does not adhere to the Protestant Ethic should show less preference for work.

To explore this alternative, we repeated our experiment with 40 white and 40 American-Indian school children from grades two through six. We attempted to match the groups in socioeconomic status.

Though many of these children had similar backgrounds, socially and economically, there were marked differences in parental influences and training between the two groups. David McClelland has shown that different child-rearing practices affect one's need for achievement, a factor that might also account for the preference for work.

To counteract the effect of poor reading ability, we used nonverbal tests such as the Porteus Maze Test to measure intelligence. We used the French's Test of Insight (FIT) to measure need-achievement, altering names and phrases in the statements for our child population.

Both groups obtained significantly more marbles by working. Although Indian children scored significantly lower than white children on need-achievement, we did not find a significant relationship between the scores on the FIT and numbers of marbles any group got by working. Nor did we find a significant relationship between I.Q. and the number of marbles the children got by working.

The findings from this experiment revealed that children, regardless of their culture, sex, I.Q., and need-achievement prefer to get their rewards by working. The similar preference for working shown by Indian and white children, along with findings from animal studies, refute the explanation that children learn from their families that there is virtue in work.

Our work with the children resoundingly confirmed the earlier work we had done with rats - and it seems most doubtful that the rats we worked with had ever been exposed to a New England preacher or any other exponent of the Protestant Ethic.

Why do rats work? The rewards were equal, yet the rats chose the more laborious method to obtain food.

Psychologists have postulated that every motivated behavior has some underlying tissue need. If a rat is hungry, it will seek food. When the need is fulfilled, the activity ceases.

Robert W. White first challenged this idea in 1959. On the basis of the then-available research, White suggested that all organisms are primarily motivated to control and modify their environment, regardless of the effort involved. Recent animal studies seem to support White's hypothesis. J. Lee Kavanau raised wild deer mice in an environment in which the creatures could, by pressing a bar, obtain food and water, start an activity wheel, or regulate light in the home cage. He found that the mice readily engaged in activities that allowed them to manipulate or alter "any susceptible environmental feature." Allen J. Neuringer reported that pigeons and rats prefer to work for their food, even in the presence of freely available food.

In a series of experiments I found that rats prefer to obtain food by pressing bars, even if the amount of work needed to obtain the food is increased. In the first experiment, we divided rats into three groups. We trained the first group to expect food every time they pressed a bar, the second group to expect food after three bar-presses, and the third group after 11 bar-presses. To expose the rats to freeloading, we divided the sample into two further groups. One half of the rats worked in a white chamber, while the second half worked in a black chamber. On no-work days, the rats that had worked in one chamber received free food in the opposite chamber. A partition separated the two chambers so that, on a given day, the rats received food either in the work condition or the no-work condition, but never in both.

The results showed that, regardless of the amount of work it took to obtain food, the rats preferred working over freeloading. Each group obtained significantly more food on the work side each day than on the nowork side. On each day of testing, more than 70 percent of each group received 51 percent or more of their food by working.

Unfortunately, these results do not constitute valid general evidence that rats prefer working to freeloading. It is possible that training and testing procedures introduced a bias for working. Specifically, the rats received free food on the basis of previous work performance. The subject could obtain food only at a fixed interval on the no-work side, while it could obtain food much faster on the work side by simply working harder. (It should be pointed out, however, that by the end of the training period, most of the rats had developed table response rates.)

To rule out the possibility of a conflict between experimental free enterprise and welfare, we conducted a second experiment in which we trained the animals on a fixed-interval schedule of a food pellet every 30 seconds, if the rat had pressed the lever at least once since the last pellet was delivered. On the no-work side, a pellet appeared every 30 seconds, regardless of the behaviour of the rat.

Again we found that animals preferred to obtain more of their food through work than through freeloading.

A further experiment found that the preference for work can be reduced by altering incentive properties associated with freeloading. Neuringer found that rats reduced bar-pressing and began freeloading if the bar-pressing did not produce food pellets. Every rat has its price, and if we make the temptation attractive enough, or the rewards small enough, it will begin to freeload.

It appears that the desire to work for a living is quite widespread. An organism likes to be active and control its environment. Further, it appears that the behaviour directed toward controlling the environment continues even when the goal is already at hand. Kavanau reported that his captive deer mice would take apart and rebuild the nest provided in the cage by the experimenters. This may explain why many of the young people in our society today are dissatisfied, in spite of the abundance of food and the basic comforts of life. Many persons on welfare probably would rather work than accept handouts if they had the training and opportunity to engage in work that would be satisfying.

The important thing appears to be not that human beings get food, water and shelter, but that they get these things in ways that convey to the individual the sense that he is important, that he does control what happens to him. To achieve this goal, it will be essential to provide educational opportunities so that each member of the society can choose the work that will be satisfying instead of being forced to accept work that merely fulfills the biological needs, or take handouts. Otherwise, a person may feel compelled to seek satisfaction for this basic need, the need to control the environment, in ways that may be neither beneficial to, nor approved by, society.

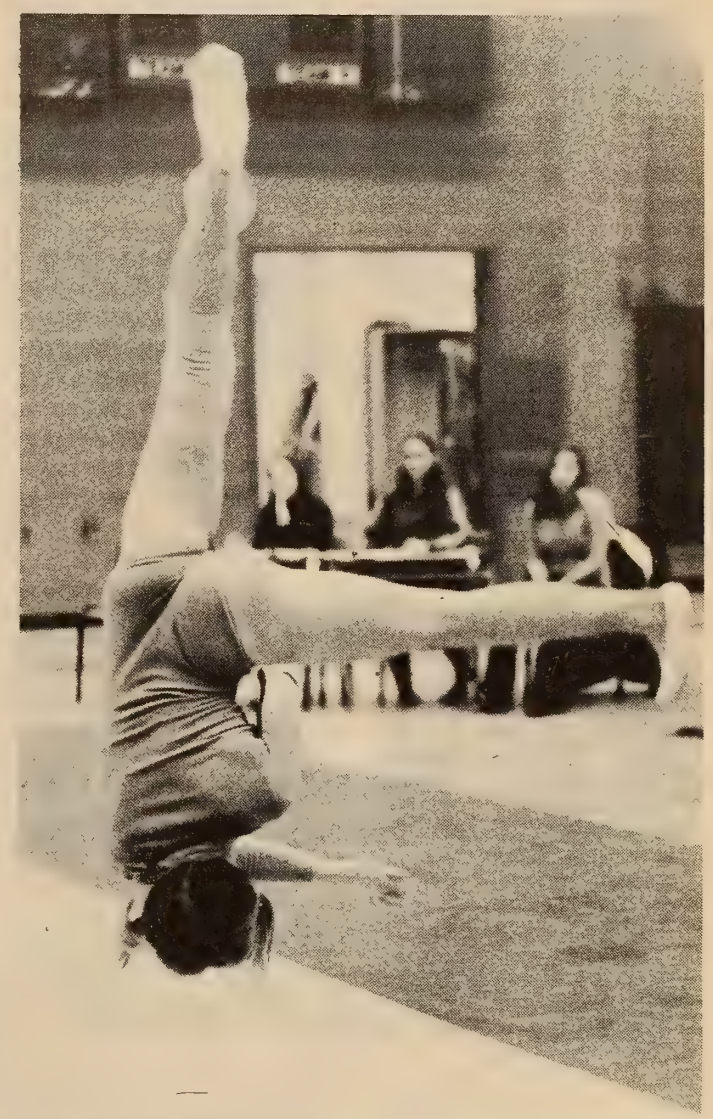
York Dominates OWIAA Gymnastics



Penny Smith-1st in Floor Exercise, Beam at Jr. Level

A York University squad led by former National Team competitor Sue Buchanan rolled up Division titles at the Junior and Senior levels on their way to capturing the O.W.I.A.A. tem championships here Saturday. U. of T. was second and Queen's third.

The Queen's team got a strong performance out of Penny Smith, a graduate of Kingston's Loyalist Collegiate, who took first place in both Balance Beam and Floor Exercises in the Junior competition. Sue Roberts, one of four veterans on the team, collected a second in Uneven Bars and a third in Vaulting to account for Queen's other Junior-division points.

Another first-year competitor, Chris Goodbrand, picked up Queen's only Intermediate points with a 3rd-place finish on the Beam.

Vivien Symington, who competed at the Junior level last year, jumped directly to senior competition, and managed to pick up third place in All-Around, and an invitation, for the 2nd straight year, to the Canadian College Championships to be held this year in Edmonton March 3, 4, and 5th. Vivien had two thirds, in Floor Exercises and Uneven Parallels, and just missed placing in Beam. Her usually strong Beam routine had been hampered by a broken contact lens, which curtailed practices in the week prior to the final competition.

BEWS NEWS: Arts Back to Year System

By Ross Feldman

The big Bews News of the week comes from off the playing field as the annual Expansion Committee report under the chairmanship of Nick Gudewill was brought to the council, and was passed in total.

The biggest change, to be implemented in September was the realignment of the Arts teams back to the year system. For Arts this will mean a return of the old structure that was passed out two years ago in favour of the "vertical" unit divisions organized along discipline lines.

A parallel proposal to re-adopt the old year structure for English was defeated.

Three new sports were added to the lineup: broomball, inner tube waterpolo and monsterball (a variation of 43-man Squamish with a 300 lb. ball). Five-pin bowling, wrestling and gymnastics were dropped from the Bews programme, due to generally poor participation from all the units.

In another major proposal, the points system was revised to put greater emphasis on the team sports and hopefully to make next year's Bews race more than a competition for second place.

With the Bews going into its last few weeks of competition there's still a lot of activity going on. The hockey playoffs are at the semi-final stage with Chem. Eng. facing off against Meds and Commerce '72 facing Mining in two-game total point series. The waterpolo season is still only at the half-way mark but the early season favourites-Meds are still the team to beat - leading the A division with a 4-0 record.

The individual sports are still going strong with Doubles Handball, table tennis, Free Throwing and Doubles and Singles Badminton all in various stages of completion.

The standings to date show PHE on top and still pulling away but this week Mining has moved back into second spot by virtue of their team victory in last week's skiing meet.

PHE 27315; Mining 229000; Commerce '73 22802; Commerce '74 19461; Chem 16 960; Commerce '72 16538; Law '72 1587 0; Mech. Eng. 14925; Law '74 13135; MBA 12638.

letters:

A.M.S. court

Dear Editors:

In your issue of Friday, 11 February, Mr. Robert Smith wrote a letter in this column inquiring about the present status and functions of the A.M.S. Court. There was a misconception apparent throughout that letter which confuses the functions of a prosecuting as opposed to an adjudicating body.

It is not and should not be the function of any judicial body, be it high court, government tribunal, or student court, to both prosecute and adjudge the same matter. So it is with the A.M.S. Court. Careful reading of the A.M.S. Constitution will show that there is a prosecutor who brings cases before the Court. The prosecutor is responsible to the Internal Affairs Commissioner and to Outer Council. It is to one of these persons or bodies that any questions regarding prosecutions should be brought. Therefore neither myself, nor my puisne judges have any knowledge of any prosecutions pending.

The A.M.S. Court has heard no cases. We have considered, however, one constitutional question regarding eligibility to vote in the A.M.S. election of February 8-10.

In the Spring of 1971, the Senate Report on Grievance, Discipline, and Related Matters was handed down. Since that time, the A.M.S. Outer Council has been investigating that report and in their investigations, I have served in a minor, unofficial, advisory capacity. Pursuant to this, a second A.M.S. report has proposed several amendments for By-law 11.

The Court has faced a problem of definition this year. We have spent much time investigating the procedure of the Court and the recommendations of the Watts Report. Our aim in this endeavour is to leave a written code of procedure which we hope will guide subsequent courts. Hampering us in this project is the fact that the Court files, when existent, were totally disorganized. It is our thought that in writing a code, any subsequent Courts will not be impeded as we have been by lack of files.

The A.M.S. Court has not heard any disciplinary cases, but we have, we believe, served some purpose. When it is settled how the Court should act, it may perform a more visible service. We are prepared to sit this year if an urgent matter of student discipline should arise, however, if that should not happen, we have done more than circulate in a "select society" and have attempted reform from within.

Chief Justice, A.M.S. Court.

The University Centre

Dear Editors:

The recent letter in the Journal by Chris Redmond and Alan Broadbent's last Dormouse have prompted me to write in and express my opinions on the University Centre, Queen's University itself and the state of the world in general.

I agree with both Redmond and Broadbent in their questioning of the whole idea as to the need for a University Centre as such on this campus, and I agree in particular with Broadbent's comments on the administration's role in the university. All it would be run to watch if it were not so disgusting.

Some days ago the Journal informed us, by quoting a university official, that more trees are being planted on campus than are being cut down. I understand that the administration has planted new trees on the West Campus but I have seen no replacements for the trees cut down on the main campus. And yet a week ago I watched an industrious crew cut down those large poplars between John Watson and Ellis to make room, presumably, for the new Arts-Scocial Science Complex. But, if I remember completely, these same trees were included in the architect's drawings of the buildings! At a time when we are having to cut down diseased elms, thereby removing most of the trees on this campus, why are we destroying healthy trees?

It is also fascinating to look at the style (?) of the new Mathers and Haldenby concrete blocks which are surfacing about the campus- most notably the Mining Department's soaring monolith and the Miller Hall extension- abortion. The only redeeming factor in either building is that of utility. They are unimaginative rectangles. Now I hardly propose that we have limestone arches and buttresses everywhere, but it would be nice to see some sensitivity by our planners to the physical unity of our campus. Surely the great discovery that modern architects were supposed to have stumbled upon was that buildings are are forms; creations to live with and enjoy and not just things to work in and ignore.

Now as to the proposed University Centre, it can be argued that with the increasing size of the university the present Student Union will not be sufficient to answer the needs of the campus. Well perhaps.

And it is stated that a new building would allow us to centralize the offices of various student and university organizations. Not a bad idea, but hardly necessary to the continued survival of the university.

And further it is maintained that such a centre would provide all the services that students need, i.e., food, haircuts, laundries, etc.. This is ridiculous. In a time when many of the most vocal elements of this university are claiming that we should involve ourselves with the problems of society at large and the problems of the Kingston community in general, why are we proposing to build ourselves a university centre to provide all the services and goods that form one of our few links with the Kingston community at present? The ultimate ivory tower- a completed self-contained self-sufficient university community within the city of Kingston. And, if the present food in the Union or the handling of the university's buildings by Graham Thomson is any indication as to what we can expect from the new centre and its management, then we're better off without it in any form.

Besides, it will probably be ugly.

Who opposes Women's Liberation?

The media suggest that women's liberation has declared man as the natural enemy but Judith and Leonard Worell believe the real enemy is the psychological makeup of all those who oppose the movement- men or women. By administering four tests of personality and behaviour to University of Kentucky students, they came up with psychological portraits of opposing and supporting groups of both sexes.

"The opposing male," say the Worells, "is more concerned with social status, with being proper and respectful. He tends to be controlled by opinions of others and has lower confidence in his ability to guide his own destiny. In dealings with other people, he is likely to be rigid, conforming, inflexible and submissive to authority."

The male who supports women's lib, in contrast, "is the independent, capable, thoughtful, self-determined man who considers the world from a logical point of view. Because he is secure in his own capabilities and less dependent on the opinion of others, he does not fear social change. Therefore he feels free to accept competition from women and welcomes them as equals."

The opposing female, like the opposing male, scores high in authoritarianism and external control and is conforming, fearful, excessively neat and inflexible.

On the other side, the Worells report: "Given the extensive negative publicity on what kinds of women support the liberation movement- that perhaps they are deviant, that they are kooks, that they are not really female- it is both refreshing and encouraging to find that in almost every respect they resemble the average American girl." According to the Worells, the one compelling characteristic that sets these women off is a strong desire for autonomy- to be independent, self- sufficient and free from external control.

Both male and female opponents of women's liberation were considerably influenced by that long-forgotten figure in psychological studies- the father. While there were no significant differences in the mothers' patterns of behaviour among all groups, the father was the prime shaper of emotional dependence and attitudes in both male and female opposing groups. To quote the Worells, "He comes through as the unwitting culprit. He is apparently the agent responsible for developing cohesive attitudinal styles which provide the basis for a negative response to women's liberation. Moreover, given the constancy of our finding across a number of personality variables, it seems probably that these motivational and cognitive systems extend to other behavioural patterns."

In the beginning

Trudeau is my shepherd

he endeth my doubt

he guideth me in the

Ye, though I walk through for his Liberal party's sake

I shall be hungry. I fear evil for they are against me.

My expenses over-run

Surely poverty and hard living shall follow me all

Glad that I am free

"Let's celebrate our differences"; people before paper -- Burke

By Rachael Edwards

"We live in a printing press society administered on paper, with paper, for paper, and by paper men," Stanley Burke told the audience at the People Before Paper Session on Tuesday in Grant Hall.

Burke is perhaps best known for his part in the CBC National News several years ago. Last year he was Director of Media Studies at York University, and he has recently been involved with Action Pakistan.

He is concerned with communications and the need to de-centralize society, making smaller groups to which people can more easily relate.

"The basic realization of someone in communications is how little we communicate and how difficult it is to communicate," he said.

He said that most people are guilty of "culture blindness" and not understanding and respecting the culture of other people. He used as examples his experiences in France and England when he was a correspondent in those countries.

The whole English society is based on the "responsible citizen", he said. If one does what is "not done", the whole society could collapse.

But in France the emphasis is placed on individuality, he said, and the French tend to regard the English as "une nation des moutons"!

Burke pointed out that this difference and others are basic to the cultures of the two countries.

The French believe that a mono-cultural society is the only type that works, he said, and the relations between France and her former empire are quite close.

He said the British Commonwealth is "the most lethal invention since the gas chamber" and is largely responsible for many of the current problems in the world.

To try to form a multicultural federation usually ends up in total failure, he pointed out. Canada is the only multicultural federation left in the Commonwealth that is not besieged by major problems, he added.

Burke said French-English differences become slightly blurred as they come across the Atlantic, but the basic reality remains.

The North American idea of integrating with the group and becoming a cog in the wheel does not allow for culture differences, he said.

As a result, North America is the most boring place -- where else could one drive 4,000 miles and find exactly the same service stations, houses, stores, and laudromats? he asked.

Burke described the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism as having put forth some "Byzantine recommendations on how to perpetuate the system". If people had really been sincere in wanting to solve the problem, he said, they would have looked for the cause. The French are basically afraid of losing their culture to the uniformity that seems to be expected in Canada, he added.

Burke suggestted that the broadcasting system would be a good place to begin to break down the printing press society. The $200 million now spent on commercial programming in Canada could be used to finance more creative programmes produced by groups or individuals, he suggested.

He said there is a revolution underway in the cable T.V. system at the moment, which is trying to make the sytem into a dialogue instead of a one-way communication.

He described an experiment held in Barrie, Ontario, where a T.V. phone-in provided dialogue between citizens and the organizers of a youth hostel. As a result a lot of the misconceptions were cleared up and the hostel was opened, despite previous objections to it.

Portable video equipment could also be a step towards decentralization and the formation of smaller groups, he said. Portable video equipment was given to a group of Indians at Sandy Lake and it encouraged the people to discuss the important things pertaining to their way of life. These systems allow the average guy to make himself heard, he said.

When asked about the student role in Canada, Burke replied that the most valuable thing a student can do is to become more culturally aware.

"Monotony is the worst thing in North America today," he said, "Let's celebrate our differences."

He suggested that the best way for an English Canadian to start a friendship with a French Canadian is by saying "we will never understand each other". In this way, he shows his repsect for the culture differences between the two.

"Let's put people before paper" by forming smaller groups and giving people more living space, he said. "The smaller, the better."

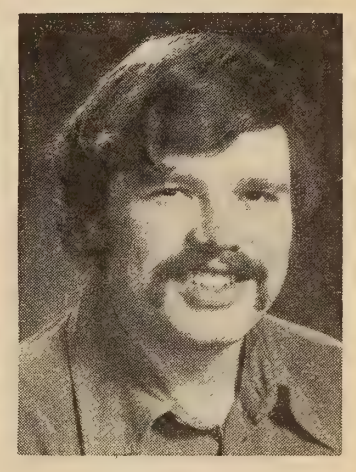
7 get top awards

A woman and six men are new members of the Tricolor Society this year.

Tricolor Awards -- as Tricolor Society memberships are popularly called -- are, according to the AMS constitution, the highest award Queen's offers for extracurricular, nonathletic service to the university.

This year's winners, pictured below, include four politicians, two journalists, and a crusader. Or, breaking them down another way, there are three engineers, three arts and science students, and a grad student in chemistry.



Plaques symbolic of Tricolor Society membership will be presented to them at convocations in May.

"How do you safeguard English in Quebec?"

By Susan Bourbonniere

Dr. Frank R. Scott, poet, law professor, and a founding member of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (now the New Democratic Party), spoke Tuesday at Queen's about education under the Canadian constitution.

Education and the language situation are closely related, Scott indicated. "Why is the language problem emerging now, instead of in 1760?" he asked. "I know of no example in the world where six million people lose their lenguage." He cited the Iroquois Indians of Canada, who now number four thousand and still have preserved their language.

Even before confederation there was a duality of language in Quebec education, Scott said: Catholics taught in French and Protestants in English, largely independent of one another.

Last year's Bill 63 brought about a major change in Quebec education, he said: all programmes of study generally are in French, with English being an exception when parents request it. All English students must also acquire competence in French. The new policy has caused great concern among English-speaking Quebeckers, Scott said, and there has been great pressure to repeal the bill.

Another change is the proposed unification of French and English school boards to reduce their number; this change has been opposed by English teachers, Scott said, since they would be a minority in decision-making.

Due in March is the report of the Gendron Commission on the use of French in industry and business in Quebec. One company studied, Scott said, was the General Motors plant at St. Therese, where 70 per cent of the workers cannot speak English. But any worker who moves up to a higher position in the company must learn English to deal with executives in other provinces and other countries, he pointed out.

Hydro-electric companies in the province have all been amalgamated into Hydro-Quebec -- "so we get French electricity in my home in Westmount," Scott said.

He said the Gendron Commission includes only one representative on English Quebec, an immigrant from Australia.

One question asked of Scott was, "How do you safeguard English in Quebec?" He said it is surprising that so many French-speaking parents send their children to English-speaking schools. Protestant schools still can teach in English, he pointed out.

"Will the opposition to Bill 63 prevail?" he was asked. "No," was his answer. When Manitoba ruled that French was not an official language there, only 12,000 French Canadians lost their language rights, Scott said, but there are now in Quebec one million English Canadians whose language rights would be lost.

Older English Canadians can maintain their English schools, he said, but new Canadians arriving in Quebec will have to go to French schools. This could create hatred of the French, Scott said, or a virtual end to immigration into Quebec.

Scott said that during the 1970 October crisis, the Front de Liberation de Quebec had control of the news media. '("I hope I'm not being reported here," he interjected.) He said the FLQ idea is pretty well dead in Quebec, because of the great decline in interest among people who are not strictly FLQ supporters. "Strong opinions go through phases," he added.

As far as preserving French in Quebec is concerned, the problem is " the anguish of the elites", he said, and the vast majority of people don't really care.

Law professor W. R. Lederman said he thought the flow of immigrants to Quebec will not help preserve French; Scott said he agreed, since immigrants usually want to educate their children in English. Besides, he added, the French Canadian birth rate has fallen.

But, he said, "We have to turn out of our schools bilingual children. It's our duty." French Canadians are drowning in an English world, he said, "and they want to stop it right now!"

Concerning Quebec economic development, Scott commented, "We lack economic imagination in this country."

"It's a gloomy prospect, and i'm not called upon to solve it," Scott said.

There are many people like Pierre Vallieres, Scott said, who want to overthrow capitalism; and he himself is still an NDP member. But "you can't say that there is nothing in the capitalist system that we can't use in the next system.

"I don't think the system is broken down to that extent".

And as for change, "we should go about it in a democratic way."

He likened freedom of speech and thought to the fruit on a tree: if the tree falls, the fruit will fall too. That, he said, explains why 86 per cent of people in Quebec approved the invoking of the War Measures Act in 1970.

Something like the 14 killings on the recent "Bloody Sunday" in Ireland could have happened in Quebec then, he said, but for once French and English Canadians were united against violence and in favour of the government.

Squirrel finds papers for archives

A Belleville couple cleaning the attic of their century-old home stumbled across a valuable collection of Canadian historical papers, and the skeleton of a squirrel.

The papers, now at Queen's, have been identified by Queen's archivist Ian Wilson, and histroy professor Donald Swainson, as those of Canada's fifth Prime Minister, Sir Mackenzie Bowell (1894-96).

More than half of the 2,000 papers -- some badly chewed, presumably by the squirrel -- are of significant historical value, and include many papers from Sir John A. Macdonald and his cabinet colleagues. Swainson, an expert in late nineteenth-century Canadian history, commented that they provide revealing new material about Bowell and the Conservative Party. "Nineteenth century parties relied very heavily on patronage, and this collection provides a revealing insight into how patronage was used."

Before becoming Prime Minister, Bowell was an influential Orangeman, and for many years was the Grand Master of the Orange Association in British North America. The association played an important role in Ontario's life, but, Swainson said, "the Order has never been easy to understand because of its secrecy."

Bowell was fully embroiled in the controversies of his day. He led the verbal attack on Louis Riel in the House of Commons following the 1970 Red River uprising and moved Riel's expulsion from the Commons. In this, Bowell had the strong support of the Orange lodges. A number of letters in the Bowell Papers refer to "that brutal murderer, Riel" (1873) and express approval of "the course you are fearlessly pursuing in the Riel Affair, and hope that no murderer will be shielded by our House of Commons, even though he be both Papist and Frenchman." (1874).

Bowell later was a member of the cabinets of John A. Macdonald, John Abbott and John Thompson. After the early death of Thompson, Bowell, a Senator, was called upon to form a government in December 1894. The Conservative Party was in rapid decline and the problems arising out of the Manitoba schools question proved insoluable to him. He resigned in April 1896, making way for Sir Charles Tupper. Bowell died in Belleville in 1917.

The mound of decaying papers, without the squirrel's sleleton, was purchased by Queen's. They are now being cleaned and restored in the Douglas Library Archives, where they will be available to all researchers of Canadian history. The Belleville couple wish to remain anonymous.

Mr. Wilson and Prof. Swainson agreed that "the discovery of the Bowell Papers also empasizes the importance of attics as the 'treasure chests of Canadian history.' Filing things away in the attic is a dying Canadian tradition. As older homes disappear these treasure chests are often destroyed and much of the flavor of Canada's historical heritage is lost forever."

Queen's has one of the most outstanding collections of Canadiana outside the Public Archives in Ottawa. "The collection, although insured for approximately $1,000,000 would have a fair market value today of approximately several times that figure," Wilson stated.

Marital friction is far from dry

"I just can't seem to get turned on here."

Those were the opening words Tuesday night when the Chernicks, an American husband-and-wife team of doctors who specialize in marital counselling, spoke on "friction in marriage, or the dry vagina".

They spoke in Dunning Hall at the annual Aesculapian Society lecture.

The Chernicks use an elaborate pattern of role-playing to empasize their points. "Mrs. Smith", one character, had failed to reach a climax in more than two years. Asked by Dr. Chernick (male) whether she had ever tried self-stimulation, she replied, in horror, "Isn't that what's called -- masturbation?"

"Mrs. Smith" said she was often dry during intercourse. Her husband's solution had been vaseline. But according to the Chernicks, "Vaseline belongs on the doorknob, to keep the children out."

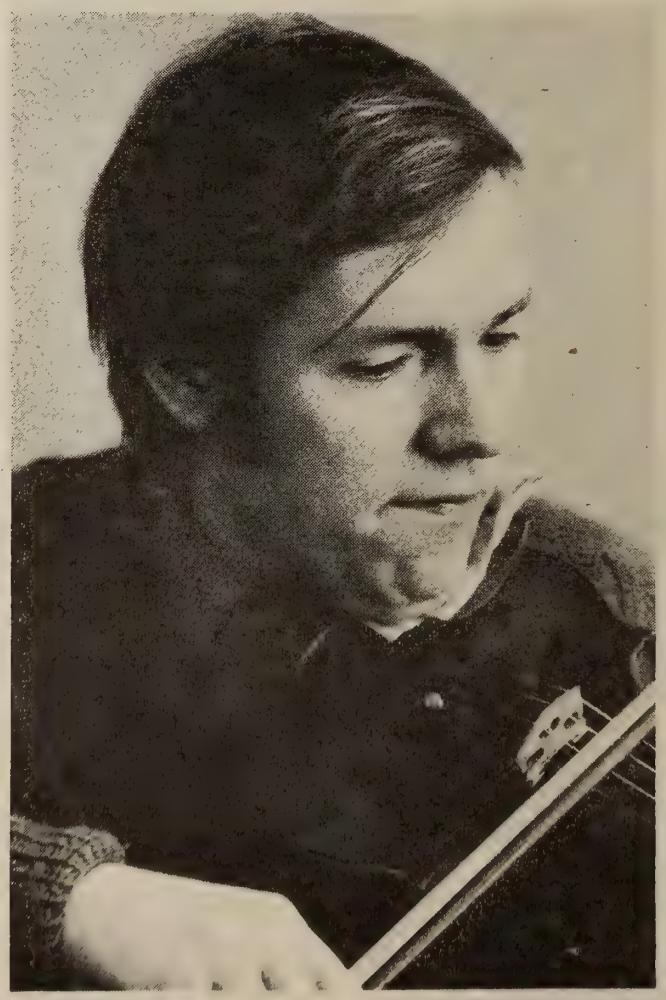
There is a basic inability among physicians to deal with sexual problems, the audience was told.

"Engineers and lawyers were out practising while I was studying Gray's Anatomy.

"Do you realize there isn't one picture of an erect penis in Gray's Anatomy?"

Related, the Chernicks said, is the inability of some marriage partners to discuss their sexual inadequacies with each other. As "marital and sex counsellors", the Chernicks try to deal with such problems.

The male role is supposed to be that of the aggressor, they said, but a man's knowledge is often faulty. Why, then doesn't he ask for advice? "A guy's supposed to know. If you ask, you don't know. And if you don't know, you're not a guy."



The spirit of the artist is that art becomes an inner compelling necessity . . .

An interview with DAVID GEORGE

SECOND IN A SERIES

The members of the VAGHY STRING QUARTET have been musicians-in-residence at Queen's since the fall of 1968. They have given concerts throughout the United States and Canada, and in April will be making a tour of Europe, including Ireland, Iceland, Norway, Poland, Germany and Audstria. The Journal recently intereviewed each of the members of the quartet, and the second of these intervies, with David George, appears today.

DAVID GEORGE, second violinist of the quartet, was born in Wichita, Kansas, and studied with Dorothy Delay at the Juilliard School of Music in New York. He plays an Antonio Stradivarius violin made in 1717.

Journal; what has been the most important influence on your approach to string quarted playing?

The other three individuals of the string quartet that I'm in are the ones that are definitely the most influential in my work with them and myself, and outside of that, there are particular groups which I admire very much. The quartet has had a good deal of experience personally with the Amadeus String Quartet, the Hungarian String Quartet, and the Juilliard String Quarted, and these are all examples of great string quartets which have achieved in various fields of the string quartet literature very high standards, not only technically but musically.

They represent a tradition to us, what might be called a classical tradition. I hesitate to use the word classical, because then that makes people think that you're old-fashioned, but I think the best way to qualify it is to think of it as that which represents a high achievement in any age, first of all the great technical standard which is required by the repertoire. Beyond that there is the great musical or artistic tradition, which pervades and surrounds the whole framework of the string quartet.

Journal: What would you say personally has been the most challenging work you've played?

Every work is challenging and brings the unique thought of each composer to it. When you play Schubert, Schubert becomes tremendously difficult, because no one else composes like Schubert. The techniques and devices for string playing which he uses are totally unique to him, so you must learn the vocabulary of Schubert to do Schubert beautifully.

I would say for Bartok and Beethoven the same thing. However, I think that some of the most challenging pieces in the quartet literature are late Beethoven string quartets and Bartok quartets. I think that the Bartoks especially are the most challenging works I've ever worked on from a sheer technical standpoint. No one requires more of the four instrumentalists than Bartok does.

Journal: Can you think of any recent works by contemporary composers which rival the achievement of the best that has been done in the string quartet medium in the past?

That's a hard question, because what is being done now is not terribly well known. We receive new works all the time, and many are not up to the quality of what is now known as good twentieth century music. We all know that the Bartok string quartets are masterpieces, but it took years for them to become known even among musicians. In all eras of music there may be a good deal of work going on, but very little of it will come down as being the greatest work of that era. We're always on the lookout for good new works, and some will be masterpieces, others will not.

I think the medium is definitely of great interest to modern composers, as it has been in the past. Bartok poured some of his profoundest feelings into the string quartet, just as Beethoven did, and both advanced the technique and heightened the musical expression that was possible with such a medium. And because the possibilities are so great in the string quartet for expression and for a fine degree of tuning, plus the satisfying combination of four stringed instruments together, I feel sure that it will continue to inspire the best composers. We will be playing a work very soon: the Ives Second String Quartet, and undoubtedly this is a very fine twentieth century work, very advanced for when it was written but only recently really known. I think it will be interesting for you here, since we'll play it next concert. It's full of many of the ragtime influences and jazz influences that have contributed very much to North American twentieth century music.

Journal: How do audiences differ in their responses to the programs you've presented on tour?

It depends on who the audience is: on if there are young people present or if its a mixed audience. It also depends on where you are playing the concert. Most small communities which are far away from larger centres are not as prone to accept immediately more advanced twentieth century works.

Journal: Then in that situation Bartok would be a large step for the audience to take?

Bartok is different sometimes. We ran into a community recently in Little Rock, Arkansas, and they loved Bartok, and they have a chamber music society there. It is not an extremely large organization, but it has devoted membership, and they specifically requested Bartok over the Debussy string quartet. But then we went on to another community in Montgomery Alabama, and we played the Debussy and they thought that was advanced. Young people usually love the rhythmic vitality and energy of Bartok. It communicates immediately and usually the younger children like it the best.

It doesn't matter to them that it sounds not quite as tonal as the classical era music. It's not really that dissonant compared with Schoenberg, Berg and Webern and is not as challenging in that respect. Bartok is really not that inaccessible once you have acquired a taste for it. If modern music is well performed, there's no problem of it being accepted. I have yet to see a good work played well that doesn't communicate. Too much of the time though, musicians have neglected the fine performance which these works demand. I think contemporary artists owe it to a modern composition to give it even better than the best performance. This hasn't always been the case and that's one reason why some communities have such a bad taste from performances of twentieth century works. They just haven't been given a good performance.

What are your opinions on twelve-tone and aleatoric (ie. chance) music?

Cabaret: A Poor Choice

By Sandy Naiman

Frankly, Cabaret has never been much of a play, either musically or dramatically. Only the title song is particularly memorable, and only the character of the Emcee is at all engaging, but he doesn't even figure in the plot, of this bitter-sweet confection set in pre-Nazi Berlin.

The Queen's Musical Theatre took little of this into consideration when deciding to stage the show, and last week we saw the fruits of their three months labour.

To begin Paul Kennedy burst onto the stage with a rowdy rendition of "Wilkommen", an international welcome to the Kit Kat Klub, to Berlin and to a tense political pot pourri of people and situations. Here, he bellows, you forget your troubles and have a wonderful time. Mr. Kennedy begins these festivities with charm, life and excitement as a vivacious and jocose clown, but unfortunately, from then on, things go down hill, only to ascend sporadically when Mr. Kennedy makes an appearance on stage.

The more traditional musicals typified by the writings of Frank Loesser, Lionel Bart, Jerome Kerne, Jule Styne and the teams of Rogers and Hart, Comden and Greene, Rogers and Hammerstein and Lerner and Loew have comic appeal written into the texture of the music and lyrics as well as integrated musical numbers which further the plot and songs somehow bespeaking the atmosphere in which they are set. The creators of Cabaret have failed to do so. Messrs. Ebb and Kander, who wrote the music and lyrics for Cabaret (and whose names, incidentally were carelessly omitted from the programme) have penned tunes which feel, as well as sound like, Broadway transplanted or transported to Berlin. The two environments are incompatible.

I am the first to agree that the soppy sweet slices of trivia can be overdone; like "Sound of Music" for example. I doubt many of us could sit through an admittedly amateur production of My Fair Lady, Hello Dolly, Finian's Rainbow or Oliver, when Warner Brothers and MGM have obliged us with stereophonic or quadraphonic sound as well as, ultravision or panavision or wondacolour or some other concoction to blow your ears and eyes.

And what about that rash of Rogers and Hammerstein musicals like Oklahoma, South Pacific, Carousel and Flower Drum Song. These musicals which follow a prescribed pattern have been exploited to the point of losing what charm they might have once possessed. But you can catch them almost any night of the week on the late show or at a theatre which offers one of them on the lame side of a double bill.

There are a few shows which have escaped this tragic end. Take "Kiss Me Kate" a Cole Porter musical, made into a movie about twelve years ago but rarely aired on television, about a troupe of players who are staging a production of the Taming of the Shrew. In his libretto, Mr. Porter included some good familiar hummable tunes, some great opportunities for choreography and a chance to dice and bait about with Shakespeare.

Another musical, from the early part of the century and one which I doubt was ever filmed is a Jerome Kerne creation called Showboat, set in the deep south and from which the song "Old Man River" originates.

Peter Pan or the Wizard of Oz could be ideal for the Queen's Musical Theatre to stage because those old familiar stereotypes can be recreated when adults and not children are cast in them. Remember the Munchkins and the lost boys from Never Never Land. This past summer, the Musical Theatre class of the Banff School of Fine Arts had a fabulous time with the Wizard of Oz, and a six footer played the Mayor of the Munchkins. These shows work beautifully on stage and getting the rights to produce them is far less costly, because they are older productions.

Unfortunately though, Cabaret does not lend itself to the frivolity or economy of such shows. Its story, a rather familiar one, seems weighted down by the political and ethnic overtones of an oncoming war and holocaust. There is no traditional 'happy ending' to the story which begins with love and dissolves into dissolutionment, nor is there even a satisfactory resolution. We are left in almost the exact position at which we arrived and only the year has changed. But that happens anyway, so what's the difference.

Mr. Kennedy, in the Queen's production is the best the show has to offer. Lee David as Herr Schultz, the old Jewish man is a fine actor and the chorus numbers are enjoyable if one overlooks an impossible collection of dowdy costumes, an almost non-existent set, a barrage of sloppy lighting cues and several very long and uncomfortable set changes.

Tony Keenleyside and Andrea Howard, as the two lovers, Cliff and Sally, were stiff, unrelaxed and unable to enjoy the songs they sung. (However, first night nervousness could have been the cause of this.)

The Queen's Orchestra, conducted by Duane Bates, was excellent but it is too bad that no pit was available in KCVI, since at times, the singers seemed to be fighting to project their voices over the music, instead of being able to compliment their singing with it.

Why wasn't Cabaret staged in the McArthur Hall Auditorium? It is clearly a more desirable setting for this big bustling musical. The stage has more depth than the one at KCVI, it is available for two full weeks in November and a full month in February, when the McArthur students are out practise teaching. The acoustics and the seating capacity surpass those of KCVI and the stage seems far more adaptable. Furthermore, there is no Kingston School Board to bargain with.

Director Jill Hodkinson stated on the CKWS T.V. mid-day programme "Spotlight" that she liked this show because the characters were "real people". If true drama is what the Musical Theatre is after, then why bother doing musicals at all, why not attempt "Ghosts" or "The Cherry Orchard"?

As with the dramatic tradition, the musical tradition has a certain heritage and format. It isn't a rigid one. Hair, the first tribal rock musical proved that, as did Dames At Sea, which spoofs itself, as did Oh Calcutta, which puts music to sex, as did Company which uses music and dance, superbly, to enliven a montage on marriage.

A musical theatre is chaging all the time, but when attempting to stage a production, one main prerequisite, I would assume, is an interest in the music and how it figures in the story, how it enhances the story line, how adaptable it is to chorus work and how it will effect the audience. I cannot understand doing a musical if it's the characters that are what intrigues you. That's like going to the movies because you love pop corn.

It seems to me that the Queen's Musical Theatre, which for the past two years, has done the perverbial cliched musical comedy (Pyjama Game and The Boy Friend) was aching to do something with a little more fibre and dramatic texture, and I can't blame them for that. Their attempt at Cabaret was an excellent one. The actors had energy and vitality in most cases and hopefully they had a good time on stage, too.

Only the choice of play is my major criticism. Even on Broadway, with Joel Grey, Cabaret seems contrived and in poor taste. It spotlights the Emcee, who has all the best numbers and without whom the show would fall flat.

Perhaps next year, the Musical Theatre will dig up some old thirties or forties piece, which hasn't been exaggerated on the silver screen and parody, play and spoof it, in an original and creative manner.

By the way, Cabaret opens this week in Toronto with a cast of millions, including Liza Minelli, Marissa Berenson and the inimitable Joel Grey.

I wonder if the transition from stage to screen has improved it any.

Gaels face Crucial games

by Bruce McLeod

Queen's hockey team is down, but not yet out as they await the final three games of their schedule. Fifth place Laurentian is only three points behind the Gaels with two games in hand, while Queen's faces three determined teams in its bid to stay alive and in the playoffs.

The Gaels came out of the last weekend of play hurt in crucial areas by injuries. Right winger Murray Douglas is out for the season with a badly broken arm, as is the Gaels' promising rookie defenceman, Steve Gross, out with damaged knee ligaments.

In addition, winger John Smith, another one of Queen's more productive players, is out at least until next weekend recovering from a shoulder separation.

Friday night, the Gaels play host to Guelph in an 8:00 game. Guelph is locked in the tight western division playoff race, that has only three points separating first and sixth place, so they will be particularly anxious for a win.

The next night, again at eight o'clock, Toronto Blues are in town, still smarting from being tied by the Gaels in front of their home fans. And next weekend Queen's plays at Western, against the team that is currently and precariously on top in the west.

But wait! a voice cries. There is still hope! Two of Laurentian's remaining games are against Toronto and York, and the Gaels can legitmately hope that they will lose at least one of those games. At the least playing against York, they should lose two or three of their players.

Furthermore, the remainder of the Gaels' lineup is far from anemic. Clyde Harris is recovering nicely from his bad ankle bruise, and the rest of the players are disgustingly healthy.

Queen's has lost the core of a great hockey team, but their depth will still allow them to ice a solid contender. Colin Loudon, now the Gaels' most prolific scorer, is still present and accounted for.

It is not yet known whether Morris Mott, who seems to have a magical effect on the Gaels' play, will feel able to join the team for its two home games this weekend. He is now right in the middle of his comprehensives.

But if he can, and granted the return of John Smith for next week's game, Queen's still has a fighting chance to hold their playoff spot.

To realistically expect to do so, however, they must win these last three games, which will be by no means an easy task.

It must be remembered that a tie with Laurentian for fourth place would give the playoff spot to the Voyageurs, as they beat us by more than we beat them. (The defaulted game is considered a 1-0 win for Queen's.)

But it was only last year that the Gaels faced a similar situation, and came through with the necessary points. It's a young tradition; let's hope it dies hard.

B-Ball Gaels May Make Playoffs

Queen's Basketball Gaels may yet make the playoffs. This shining light appeared when the OUAA, in its wisdom, apparently decided that, if Queen's and Carleton end up in a TWO-way tie for the fourth and final playoff spot, then there will be a game between them to see who gets it, in spite of the Raven's two victories over the Gaels.

For this to happen, the Gaels must beat York here Friday night (Game time is 8:15--lets see some FANS, for a change) while Laurentian dumps the Ravens in Ottawa. The Voyageurs will probably co-operate, so the real pressure is on Queen's.

Meanwhile we have U. of T., who at last count were 4-6, after a Thursday loss to Laurentian. Varsity plays York Wednesday night (results not available at press time); if T.O. wins, we are, in all probability, out, since, sayeth the OUAA, a 3-way tie means no playoff, and therefore Carleton gets in. (Toronto has one other game to play, but it's with Ryerson...)

However, if York comes through, then we have to beat York and Laurentian must beat Carleton, and, EGAD, we have a playoff with Carleton to see who gets the number 4 spot. If.....

Alert passing and aggressive play is what the Gaels will need against York Friday. Here Paul Howard awaits a feed from guard Dave Smith.

from the Silhouette, MacMaster

It's NOT like that in Kingston

There can be little doubt that birth control is preferable to abortion as a method of preventing unwanted births. However, for those who want and need an abortion, it is good to know that in Kingston, at least, there is no great difficulty in obtaining information, non-moralizing guidance and abortions.

A number of Kingston obstetricians and gynaecologists perform abortions (see below). Contact one of the following organizations for more information:

The AMS Birth Control and Abortion Information and Referral Service, which is open every day from 3 p.m. till 11 p.m. at 165 University Ave. (547-2806). Run by students it has information on which doctors are doing abortions, and which ones are not booked solid and can see you; the prices and types of birth control; where to get an abortion outside of Kingston; and they will get in touch with Birthright for you if you don't want an abortion and want to keep your baby.

Information Kingston at 549-1073;

The gynaecology clinic at the Kingston General Hospital;

The Community Health Agency at 200 Montreal St. or call 542-7339;

Planned Parenthood, which is establishing an office at 114 Wellington St.

All of these will provide you with information and advice on where to turn for help, with the AMS service probably being as good or better than any of the others, as well as being close at hand for Queen's students.

Finally, for those uncertain about abortion, there is Birthright, which offers psychological and maternal support through pregnancy to women who decide not to abort. They can be reached at 546-5433.

Most of the information around the cartoon on this page is from Nancy Cooper's excellent article on abortion in last Friday's Whig-Standard.

As we stop, temporarily, for reading week, we noticed that we neglected to note that issue 46 a week or so ago was a record, the most issues of the Journal ever in a single year. Of course, so were issues 47, 48, 49, 50 and this one, 51. Ho hum.

Having an abortion here

In 1971, 479 therapeutic abortions were performed at the Kingston General Hospital. The Criminal Code of Canada states that "therapeutic abortions may be performed in an accredited or approved hospital if a board consisting of no less than three doctors decides that the continuation of a pregnancy will endanger the life or health of the pregnant woman."

On Tuesdays, three members of the KGH abortion committee, the only such committee in Kingston (serving an area extending from Cornwall to Trenton to Smiths Falls), meet to approve applications for abortions. The Committee is composed of Dr. D. S. Alexander, pediatrician, Dr. T. J. Boag, psychiatrist, Dr. W. F. Connell, cardiologist, Dr. R. W. Dingwall, general practitioner, Dr. J. A. Low, gynecologist, and Dr. D. L. Wilson, internist.

An application for an abortion is signed by the gynecologist or obstetrician who will do the abortion (none of the members of the committee can do abortions) stating why he feels the pregnancy should be terminated. It then goes to the committee for approval. Only two applications were turned down last year, and those were sent back to the doctor for review with his patient.

The primary concern of the abortion committee is the woman's mental health, although abortions are also done if the doctor is afraid the fetus is defective. Prenatal defects such an mongoloidism and other genetic defects can be detected by an amniotic tap, whereby a long needle is inserted through the mother's abdomen and into the placenta, and amniotic fluid is drawn off and tested. If the mother contracted rubella during the pregnancy an abortion might be recommended.

Hotel Dieu, the Roman Catholic hospital, does not have an abortion committee, and no abortions are done there. However, several of its gynecologists do do abortions at KGH.

Please remember that an abortion is surgery, and surgery always entails some risk. Most unwanted pregnancies are caused by people not being careful about their birth control methods. See your doctor about the best contraception for you. Don't pretend you won't get sexually involved. It happens to almost everybody. Be prepared when it does.

CANADA

Low-income families are subsidizing the cost of higher education for students in upper income groups, according to a study released Wednesday on the costs and benefits of higher education in Ontario.

The study was made by Systems Research Group Inc., a consulting firm, for the Commission on Post-Secondary Education in Ontario, which was established to set guidelines for higher education over the next 20 years.

The researchers found that a greater proportion of children from higher-income families attend university than do those from low-income homes, and that they also tend to choose courses such as medicine and law which are among the most costly to provide.

But higher-income families, in total, contribute less tax money to support the colleges because there are fewer of them.

The study revealed that 34 per cent of students in universities and community colleges were from families earning $10,000 or more but this income group paid only 28 per cent of education costs. (At least 66.1 per cent of Queen's students come from families making more than $10,000).

The $7,000-to-$9,000 income group had 24 per cent of the students and paid 22 per cent of the cost.

Contributing more than they got back were families in the $5,000-to-$7,000 income group, with 20 per cent of the students and 24 per cent of the cost; and the $3,000-to-$5,000 group, with 12 per cent of the students and 16 per cent of the cost share.

The poorest families, earning less than $3,000, got an even break: They paid 8.86 per cent and provided 8.98 per cent of the students.

The study found that almost 50 per cent of students in law courses were from the upper income groups which paid only 29 per cent of the costs. More than 40 per cent of those in medicine were from upper income groups.

In computing costs, the researchers took into account student fees, taxes and financial assistance in loans and grants.

OTTAWA — Five men are contenders for the Ontario Liberal leadership which is about to be vacated by Robert Nixon.

The five whose names emerged at the party's annual meetings here are Murray Gaunt from Huron Bruce, Donald Deacon from York Centre, James Bullbrook from Sarnia, Philip Givens of York-Forest Hill and Vernon Singer of Downsview.

Mr. Nixon, who announced on Saturday that he would be giving up the party leadership, said he had talked to four or five men in his caucus who are possible candidates and that any one of them would make a good leader.

BATHURST, N.B. — Police ended a sit-in at the Unemployment Insurance Commission branch here Tuesday night when they carried 13 protesters out of offices occupied since Monday morning. More than 40 other protesters were escorted from the building.

Bathurst Police Chief J. J. O'Neil said late last night the "13 persons who had to be removed from the building have been charged."

The sit-in in the building in the centre of the city of 12,000, was prompted by alleged delays in payment of benefit claims.

Two hundred unemployed persons from the economically depressed north shore of New Brunswick participated in the sit in when it began Monday.

Seventy five persons stayed all of Monday night.

TORONTO — The Ontario Anti-Poverty Organization will start a campaign this week to collect 2,000,000 signatures on a petition calling for a guaranteed annual income.

The organization, a coalition of 150 Ontario low-income groups, also hopes to be endorsed by municipal councils, labor councils, church and community groups.

The petition, which the organization plans to present to Premier William Davis in May, also calls for the creation of a Canadian auto industry. It recommends that a plant give a year's notice before it closes. And it asks for a year-long moratorium on consumer debts and mortgage payments for those who become unemployed.

OTTAWA — Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau, concerned about the effects of the proposed Rhodesian settlement, has sent his special assistant, Ivan Head, to three African countries to study the situation.

Sources in the Prime Minister's office said Monday that Mr. Head also carried personal requests from Mr. Trudeau that none of the three countries -- Nigeria, Tanzania and Zambia -- would walk out of the Commonwealth over a Rhodesian settlement.

TORONTO — People on welfare want jobs, but they're not always willing to accept "any job that is going," says a provincial task-force report released Friday.

The report says single or unattached welfare recipients should be willing to take any "reasonable job" even if it is considered "demeaning, exploitive, distasteful or counter to one's lifestyle."

Failure to take the job, the report continues, should be considered grounds for cutting off welfare payments. However, welfare should not be refused before the welfare administrator has had a chance to find out from the recipient why the job was turned down.

BURLINGTON — The Skyway taking the Queen Elizabeth Way across Hamilton harbor here is crowded to capacity at peak times and a second bridge or tunnel must be built in the next few years, a government official told town council's work committee last Wednesday.

S. C. Radbone, senior feasibility planner with the Department of Transportation and Communications, said the department will consult local ratepayer groups in the next two weeks to find out which of the alternatives will have least impact on the area.

In an interview Thursday, Radbone said the skyway was built in the 1950s at a cost of about $19 million.

LONDON — Britain's coal strike and the resulting power shortage sent the unemployment total above 2.5 million Wednesday, the highest since 1933, but the Trades Union Congress (TUC) rejected a back-to-work appeal by Prime Minister Edward Heath.

With industry reduced to a three-day work week because power stations can't get coal to run their generators, the employment department said 1.2 million people, or 5 per cent of the work force, had been laid off because of the strike.

Before that 1,023,000 were out of work. There are 280,000 miners on strike.

With the walkout in its sixth week, 10 power plants shut down and 70 more reduced their output. The power cuts were increased 50 per cent Wednesday, blacking out homes, factories and offices for three three-hour periods.

WASHINGTON — President Richard Nixon opened the door a bit wider Monday for trade with China, putting it on an equal footing with the Soviet Union.

The relaxing of trade barriers and the special courtesies of the Chinese were announced three days before Mr. Nixon's departure for China.

BONN — Chancellor Willy Brandt's government is smarting from a tactical defeat suffered Wednesday when the Bundesrat (upper house) objected in an initial vote to West Germany's controversial non-aggression treaties with the Soviet Union and Poland.

The treaties under which West Germany pledges to acknowledge all existing frontiers in Europe, will be presented to the Bundestag (lower house) for ratification on Feb. 23.

The opposition Christian Democrats and the Bavarian Christian Social Union used their one-vote majority in the Bundesrat, which represents the federal states, to carry a motion yesterday expressing "grave political and legal objections" to the pacts in their present form.

The first vote in the long process of ratification was only a tactical defeat for the government and does not necessarily imperil the future of the 1970 treaties.

UGANDS — Soldiers who fled to nearby Tanzania have now revealed the full horror of the systematic slaughter of thousands of troops in the Ugandan army.

The soldiers, all Langi and Acholi tribesmen, had formed about half of the African country's 10,000-man army before a purge began which has left nearly all of them dead.

The soldiers only crime seems to have been their tribal connections with Dr. Milton Obote, who was overthrown as Uganda's President 13 months ago in a coup d'etat led by Gen. Idi Amin. The slaughter of the nearly 5,000 soldiers was part of an attempt to consolidate Amin's position.

SAPPORO — The Winter Olympics in Japan ended Sunday, with the Russians leading the world in both number of medals won and on the unofficial scoring system (it's considered unsportsmanlike in the Olympics to keep scores for national teams.)

Canada finished 16th on the unofficial scoring, and 17th on the medal standing. Karen Magnuson won our only medal, a silver in figure skating.

WASHINGTON — The National Security Council is proposing tougher regulations to keep classified information out of the hands of government officials, defence contractors and the public. It suggests that President Richard Nixon may want to go as far as seeking legislation similar to British Official Secrets Act, which would have the effect of imposing stiff criminal penalties on anyone who receives classified information, as well as on those who disclose it.

Jack McClelland

Jack McClelland

"Canadian nationalism is not evil but of a protective nature," Jack McClelland, publisher of McClelland & Stewart and founding member of the Committee for an Independent Canada, said last Wednesday night.

In response to the comment that Canadian nationalism as the CIC defines it is designed "to sell books and improve careers", McClelland admitted, "Yes, well that's fine."

Though Canadians are becoming more aware of the extent of American influence, he commented, "they still do not seem to realize that the problem of foreign ownership must be solved first."

McClelland supported government action to break American control, and reiterated the need for an agency to screen future investments and set up guidelines for American subsidaries here.

He added that a stepped up system of government loans was necessary to protect Canadian Companies. McClelland & Stewart Ltd. received a five year loan of $9000 from the Canadian Development Corporation just last fall.

McClelland did not agree that the process of buying back Canada would result in higher taxation and a lower standard of living. He said, "there is likely to be a slight slowing up in GNP but there is no indication that this will lower the standard of living."

He expressed concern that Canada as a total satellite of the United States would have no voice in international affairs. But when Canada is master of its economic situation, he said. "its voice will be recognized."

"Some areas of the economy should be nationalized in the interests of the country," he said. However, Canada's biggest publisher concluded "publishing is definitely out of this league."

Dr. Thomas Sasz

By Dr. Thomas Szasz

"Psychiatrists are a menace to society," Dr. Thomas Szasz, a psychiatrist and psychoanalyst, told astonished students at Queen's last week during the taping of CTV television programme Under Attack.

By labelling someone mentally ill, a psychiatrist may cause that person to lose his freedom. He may also deprive him of his rightful possessions by declaring him incompetent, Szasz stated.

His book, The Myth of Mental Illness, comments that it is a magnificient lie that mental illness is an illness at all. His response to a question concerning what to do with those people who exhibit what society calls 'abnormal behaviour' indicated this attitude: "People should have the right to remain unrehabilitated," he said.

In those terms, then, the only proper moral object of a psychiatrist is "to help people to do what they want." When it was suggested that a psychiatrist has a responsibility to prevent suicide, Szasz simply declared, "This is not the way I see the problem."

He added that he was not opposed to voluntary psychiatry, only to involuntary psychiatry.

Szasz noted that 90 per cent of the people in mental institutions are there involuntarily.

However, a student in the audience commented that the New York state statistics show only 26 per cent imprisoned. "This discrepancy arises because many people sign voluntarily only after being threatened that they will be committed anyway," Szasz angrily replied, adding "involuntary hospitalization is like negro slavery."

Szasz told the audience that as long as mental patients are free of crime, then they should be free to live where they wish. But he noted that mental illness is often used as a cop-out. Criminals use it to escape punishment. "If someone commits a crime, he should be punished, no matter how crazy he is," Szasz loudly declared.

Jay Parker

Jay Parker, national president of the Friends of the FBI said in his opening remarks on CTV's Under Attack, "those people who think that their telephones are being tapped by the FBI are paranoid."

His organization was started in 1971 to demonstrate public concern for law and order. One of its key members, Efron Zimbalist Jr. TV personality for the serial the FBI.

A Washington Post Poll indicates that 55 per cent of all congressmen believe their phones have been tapped at some time. Parker however, replied that there was no evidence to support this charge. He added "this is indicative of the wrong impression that the general public have of the FBI". This misconception he blamed on the media and the public's failure to take time to discuss and discover the service that the FBI provides.

A study, costing $70,000 is presently being done on the FBI and its activities since its establishment.

Much of the organizations negative image is said to rest on the shoulders of its director, J. Edgar Hoover.

Parker however, argued that actually an overwhelming majority of Americans supported the FBI. "Its negative image is merely a conception of the press," he added.

Residence applications for next year

By Bob Mutrie

Upper-class men's and women's application forms for rooms in men's and women's residence for 1972-1973 have been received.

There were 698 applications from men alone for the 409 places, excluding the West Campus residences, and 563 from women for the 469 places available to them.

Morris Hall proved to be the biggest problem, as 196 applications were received from upper-classmen for the 34 positions available to them.

S. R. Hanright, manager of men's residences, stated that 88 of the 196 applications received were from the present residents of Morris itself. "This may be attributed to the fact that many that are in Morris desire to return whether or not it is co-ed," he said.

Hanright stated that 34 rooms in Morris will be allotted in a proportional system, based on the present enrollment of each residence on Leonard Field, so that everyone has an equal chance of being accepted. Accordingly, only seven men from McNeill, six from Morris, nine from Leonard, six from Donald Gordon and six from Brockington will be accepted, he said.

Women's residence, however, has been having trouble finding women willing to move to Morris. Only 31 applications have been received from upper-class women for the 34 places, S. Mason, assistant to the Dean of Women, stated.

Mason noted that women's residence would probably be accepting all of the 563 applicants, despite the fact that there are only 469 places available.

"Because of the large numbers who change their minds between now and May, and the number who cancel in the fall, we will probably be able to place those remaining," she said. However, Mason said that not everyone will be guaranteed their choice of building.

Excluding Morris Hall, there were 382 applications for the remaining 302 places on Leonard Field. Of these, 37 places are reserved for transfer students and students coming in from off-campus housing, Hanright said. The remaining places will be divided proportionately among the residences according to the number of students presently in each, as well as by faculty.

At present, 110 applications have been received from upper-classmen for the Earl Street residence, of which 73 will be accepted.

There have only been six applications from Leonard Field and two from outside for the West Campus residence.

Hanright stated that those turned down from Leonard Field will be offered residence at West Campus, which will be offering 576 rooms next year.

For fifty dollars, Pirate Papers will write that five thousand word essay for you.

Essay-writing is a business for Pirate Papers, started in January in Toronto and aimed at students in universities across Canada.

Larry van Zwamen, head of the enterprise and a student himself, told The Journal that a "fair number" of orders had been received already. Representatives of the project were at Queen's Wednesday to begin advertising.

Pirate Papers will research, write and type papers on any subject at rates ranging from $15 plus typing for 1000 words to $75 plus typing for 7500 words.

Van Zwamen would not say who actually wrote the essays Pirate Papers sells, but the project's publicity says that "all our writers have at least one degree. Many are writing masters and doctoral degrees." Pirate promises footnotes and bibliography with all essays.

Disciplinary regulations at Queen's provide penalties for "academic dishonesty" ranging from probation to expulsion.

About 80 members of Artsci 75 attended its annual meeting Monday to take part in the election. The meeting also discussed the marathon dance it recently sponsored at a cost of $600, leaving a bank balance of about $700, and its year crests, which have been delayed in arriving.

91 withdrawals from residence this year

"We were able to refill rooms in residence as fast as students left this year," S. R. Hanright, manager of men's residences, stated. Of 1,300 total beds including the Earl St. and West Campus Residences, only nine beds are at present vacant.

S. Mason, assistant to the Dean of Women, said that at present there are 13 vacancies in women's residences, which have a total capacity of about 1,200.

Hanright told The Journal that there have been 58 withdrawals from men's residences since September, and that they had a waiting list of 300 upper-classmen alone from last year.

"December and January are the months in which most vacancies occur, and vacancies around that time usually total from 10 to 15," he said.

Hanright also noted that this was the most difficult time to find students who are willing to move into residence, due to lease and other commitments.

"Our waiting list is usually exhausted by the end of January," he commented. "Most waiting students desire single rooms which are not often available and further complications arise with students requesting specific residences."

Mason commented that there were 33 withdrawals from women's residences this year, of which 20 were filled. "Most withdraw to find places in off campus housing," she said. Other reasons included financial and health problems, as well as people leaving university altogether.

There were 43 withdrawals of which 36 were replaced last year, she added.

Women's residences has adopted a policy of accepting more students than there are beds for, due to the number of cancellations that occur in September.

As a result, 10 freshettes were temporarily assigned to the TV and sewing rooms, and another 10 to various other rooms this year, she said. In addition, three were placed with sisters and friends, and seven in temporary off-campus housing. By October 15, all but two had permanent rooms in residence and those two as well as six others have since been placed.

PEKING — After a correct but cool beginning, President Richard Nixon held an earlier-than-expected meeting with Chairman Mao Tse-tung Monday. And later, in a banquet toast, Premier Chou En-lai looked forward to the resumption of normal relations between the two states.

The 60-minute meeting with the 78-year-old father of the Chinese revolution came only 3½ hours after Mr. Nixon stepped from his presidential jet to an honor guard reception at Peking airport. No other state visitor in recent times has been ushered in to meet the Chairman so fast.

President Richard Nixon and Premier Chou En-lai talked from mid-afternoon to dusk Monday in an atmosphere that surprised China experts with its warmth and friendliness.

Nothing was revealed about what was discussed at the meeting, which lasted three hours and 50 minutes. But photographs taken as the session got under way showed both men smiling broadly, obviously sharing a joke.

ATHENS— Three western powers - the United States, Britain, and France - are vying for a multi-million-dollar order to supply sophisticated warplanes to the military-backed Government of Greece.

The Greek order is linked to a contract for a $50-million Greek aerospace industry, to be awarded soon. The Greek Government is considering offers from U.S. and French bidders for the factory, but the final decision will likely be influenced by the choice of warplanes.

Qualified foreign sources said Sunday the Greek regime was on the market for two squadrons - about 36 to 40 planes - of the latest supersonic jets. This costly decision was prompted by two considerations:

—reasons of prestige. The Athens regime boasts that unlike any other Greek government before it, it is expanding the nation's defence aresenal without depending on foreign help.

—As a precaution for an emergency unrelated to the Atlantic alliance - such as a flareup over Cyprus, the bone of contention between alliance partners Greece and Turkey.

SANTIAGO — President Salvador Allende said Sunday he will veto a constitutional amendment passed by Congress to block his plans for socializing the economy. He said he will not call for a plebiscite on the issue.

Congress voted overwhelmingly Saturday a series of constitutional amendments to block Marxist President Salvador Allende's efforts to give Chile a Socialist economy.

The amendments prohibit Allende from expropriating private property without specific legislation by Congress.

Allende has 60 days to promulgate or veto the move. If he vetoes it, Congress can overrule him with a two-thirds majority but the president then can order a plebiscite.

"Look! Lickin' poverty and unemployment still doesn't make it an advanced society. I mean, where are the casinos and race tracks and..."

CYPRUS — Week-long demonstrations of loyalty have immensely strengthened the position of President Makarios in the face of Greek pressure to shake up his Government and turn over recent arms imports to the United Nations peacekeeping force, observers here said Sunday.

The President's warnings that veteran Greek General George Grivas plans to overthrow the republic and declare Enosis (Union with Greece) have marshalled behind him most Greek Cypriots.

They know that any violent campaign for Enosis would provoke intervention by Turkey and risk partition of the island.

The Cyprus Government believes that Gen. Grivas could not have returned to the island without the approval of the Greek regime. It fears that the 1,300 Greek officers who train the Cyprus National Guard are stoking the fires of Enosis among the 10,000 conscripts and campaigning among them against Cypriot leftwingers, who support Makarios.

WASHINGTON — The French are the world's biggest drinkers, consuming more than one and a half times as much alcohol as their nearest rivals, the Italians, a U.S. Government report said Friday.

The Swiss come next, closely followed by the West Germans, Australians and Belgians.

Americans rank seventh in alcohol consumption, with about 70 per cent of the population classified as drinkers and nine million having a drinking problem or classified as alcoholics.

It is the wine consumption of the French and the Italians that places them at the top of the list. When it comes to hard liquor, the French are still first but the Americans run them a very close second.

The top seven in per capita alcohol consumption are followed in order by: New Zealand, Czechoslovakia, Canada, Denmark, Britain, Sweden, Japan and Holland.

CANADA

KINGSTON — Sixty-eight prisoners at Collins' Bay Penitentiary reported sick and refused to work last Wednesday to protest against curtailment of an open cell experiment.

Director John Meers said normally only about 20 prisoners report sick each day. He met the prisoners' grievance committee to discuss the situation.

John Moloney, Ontario regional superintendent of the federal penitentiary service, said there had been "a larger-than-usual sick parade" at the medium-security institution Wednesday and members of the inmates' council had indicated that it was a protest against the prison administration.

Mr. Moloney said that since last September television sets and card tables had been set up in the corridors outside the cells for evening recreation and more recently the cell doors had been left unlocked during the period, allowing inmates to go in and out as they pleased.

The intention was to avoid having all the 436 inmates crowding into one area during the recreation break.

However, he said, there had been a great deal of abuse of the system. Men had been congregating in their cells to sniff glue and take illicit pills.

A few days ago, Mr. Meers ordered the cell doors locked during the recreation period while the men were in the corridors.

KINGSTON — A cut-back in service in an effort to reduce a transit deficit resulted in about 30,000 fewer passengers riding Kingston buses in 1971 than in 1970, the public utilities commission found. Now the total deficit for 1971 is estimated at $424,166, about $40,000 more than predicted last spring.

OTTAWA — From the bouquet-filled Speech from the Throne opening the fourth session of the 28th Parliament yesterday, it appears the Trudeau Government will spend what time it has before the next election emphasizing bread-and-butter issues rather than waving the flag as expected.

"Major changes" to make housing cheaper and more available to middle-income as well as lower-income buyers will be given higher priority in the legislative timetable than restrictive proposals on foreign investment.

TORONTO — Imperial Oil Ltd., one of the largest US-controlled companies in Canada, called Friday on foreign-owned firms in Canada to sell more of their shares to Canadians, and to put more Canadians on their boards of directors.

At the same time, it warned against what it termed "negative nationalism" based on emotional argument rather than economic facts.

EDMONTON — In an experiment that may set a model for the rest of the country, Edmonton courts are reaching out to help drinking drivers instead of just punishing them.

Over the last 18 months, the courts have ordered more than 1,000 convicted drinking drivers back to school to learn at first hand the shocking carnage they cause on city streets every year.

In the course of four two-hour sessions, they see shock films of the mangled victims of the drinking driver. Medical experts indicate what alcohol does to the body and senses and an insurance agent explains in terms of hard cash what a drinking conviction does to a driver's coverage rate.

Police officers and judges attend the sessions to explain the law's provisions for the drinking driver. The convicted drivers also are persuaded to talk about their problem.

OTTAWA — The sloth slate was outdistanced by conservative candidates in Carleton University's student elections.

Fifteen candidates for the student council had campaigned under the anti-council sloth banner - all had promised to resign when their term in office commenced March 15, thus eliminating Carleton's student government. Only four of the 15 sloth candidates were victorious on Tuesday.

The sloth defeat does not, however, mean Carleton students are vigorously defending their right to representation - only 17 per cent of those eligible voted in the two-day election.

OTTAWA — A Criminal Code amendment that would make air hijacking a specific offence, subject to life in prison, was introduced in the Commons Monday.

Another new provision would extend the jurisdiction of the courts to aircraft that are in flight or "in service" on the ground. Anyone who committed an offence aboard a Canadian aircraft outside Canada would be subject to the jurisdiction of Canadian courts.

The Criminal Code bill spells out two types of offence, both carrying a maximum of a life sentence:

—Air hijacking, which includes seizing control of an aircraft; holding anyone on board for ransom or forcing diversion of the flight for reasons including transport of another passenger to a place other than the next scheduled stop.

—Endangering the safety of an aircraft in flight by an assault on board; actual damage to the aircraft; bringing aboard anything likely to endanger the flight: damaging any air navigation facility or giving false information.

Bringing on board any civil aircraft a firearm or an "explosive substance" without permission of the owner or pilot would be an offence subject to 14 years in prison.

Under the proposed new law, the pilot would have the status of a peace officer and any interference with him while he is on duty could result in a two-year jail sentence.

Universities must stay independent, Deutsch declares

by Bill Johnston

Government intervention in the operation of Ontario universities must be kept to an absolute minimum, Dr. John J. Deutsch, Queen's principal and a member of the Commission on Post-Secondary Education in Ontario (popularly called the Wright Commission), told the Queen's Senate at its February meeting last Thursday.

Deutsch was commenting in response to a question by Dr. N.J. Brown about certain recommendations contained in the Draft Report of the Wright Commission, which Brown felt could lead to a great deal of government interference in the operating of a university.

Specifically, Brown was referring to Recommendation 52 of the Draft Report, which would establish a Co-ordinating Board for Universities, composed of 13 people appointed by the Minister of Colleges and Universities, which would have the power to "establish new faculties and programmes and discontinue unnecessary faculties and programmes, at both the graduate and undergraduate level," among other functions.

Deutsch noted that it was impossible for him to say exactly what the final form of the recommendation would be, emphasizing that this Draft Report could change substantially, because of presentations various groups may make to the Commission over the next two months, before the final report on post-secondary education is made to the government, probably this summer.

He added, however, that it was not the intention of the Commission that the Co-ordinating Board should interfere with the operations of universities, and emphasized that it was a basic aim of the Commission "to preserve the maximum autonomy of the university." However, he noted that this preservation must be "consistent with the realities of the methods of financing" post-secondary education.

"For all practical purposes," the universities are now almost 100 percent financed by the government, Deutsch said. Universities gain their operating funds entirely from government grants (86 percent) and tuition fees, and can seek private sources of financing only for their capital (ie. building) budgets.

Because of its heavy financial commitment to education, the government is going to insist on having greater control of how the money is spent and on laying down limits to the proliferation of departments, faculties and educational facilities. It is already feeling some public pressure "to intervene in areas in which the universities feel they should be autonomous," Deutsch said.

If the government wished to, Deutsch noted, "there is no aspect of our operation in which they could not intervene." He added that they have not, as yet, sought to do this, but they could.

In one area, however, the field of graduate studies, the government has stepped in recently in an effort to lessen the amount of money being spent, and to try to "get better use of resources." Through steps to 'rationalize' graduate programmes across the province and by other methods, the government has sought and obtained extremely detailed information about all aspects of operations within grad schools, Deutsch said, "and if that's not intervention, I don't know what is."

Because the government will continue to feel justified in intervening in university operations as long as it finances such a large proportion of university costs, Deutsch said, the Commission "has sought ways to reduce the dependence of universities on government financing" in order to increase the autonomy of universities.

We must draw the line at some point on government intervention, Deutsch emphasized, and, though some of the recommendations of the Draft Report may suggest the opposite, it is the intention of the Commission "to draw the line so as to give maximum autonomy to the university."

Speaker rebuts abortion opponents: "victory for whom?"

Dr. R. Bruce Sloane, "no respecter of sacred cows", told medical staff and students in Etherington Hall last week that he once thought abortions to be "vile, and one should never have one", but has completely reversed his thinking.

Sloane was a psychiatry professor here from 1957 to 1964.

Speaking on "the dogmas of abortion", he presented familiar arguments against abortion and gave a rebuttal for each of them. He rejected the theory that abortion frequently causes psychiatric disturbance, commenting that in a study only one percent of 500 aborted women were upset about it afterwards.

He also suggested that a child could be hurt if the mother did not have an abortion, but did not want the child either. Adoption is no solution to this, he said: there are five hundred thousand children in institutions now.

"A live birth is a victory," he quoted, but asked, for whom? Not for the mother who has too many children and an unemployed husband, he answered.

Psychiatrists cannot predict any better than gynaecologists what the effect of an abortion will be, he said, and in places where a woman can have an abortion on request, psychiatrists need not even be consulted.

Sloane said abortion really cannot be classed as right or wrong, but must remain a matter of individual choice. He denied that making abortion widely available would increase immorality.

He also pointed out a recent statement from a leader of the Royal College of Physicians: "British women can have an abortion like washing their hair."

The conflict between psychological and medical views on abortion is a false dichotomy, Sloane said; the decision belongs to the woman, not to any sort of doctor.

He said psychological reasons for abortion range from possible psychoses -- puerperal, schizophrenic or depressive -- to the possibility of suicide.

"Sometimes all you have to do is tell the psychiatrist that you will kill yourself and you will receive permission for an abortion."

He said another possible reason for abortion is foetal abnormality, and mentioned the case of an American woman, Sherry Finkbein, who had taken thalidomide but could not legally get an abortion.

Sloane compared the mortality rates of New York and Britain -- both places where abortion is legal. In Britain, he said, 30 of every hundred thousand babies are stillborn; in New York the figure is 5.3.

He claimed the higher British figure relects greater opposition to abortion by British doctors, who are discouraging women from have such operations.

Concluding, Sloane quoted a statement made by a Roman Catholic priest: "The rights of all segments of society should be preserved, including the foetus, but in society, those who don't agree with this should be able to act as they please."

Not a vigilante, Imperiale tells Under Attack panel

by Mary O'Rourke

Anthony Imperiale, New Jersey State Assemblyman, said February 17 at Queen's that "Communists have infiltrated every level of our society," the conspiracy evidently having insinuated itself "in schools, religion and politics in order to destroy our youth and our society."

Imperiale is the founder of the North Ward Citizens' Committee of Newark, New Jersey, a group formed to protect citizens from all sorts of menace, including the racial conflicts which came to a head in the riots of 1967. The Committee's activities include providing karate lessons and patrolling neighbourhoods to avert or correct local problems. Imperiale was a guest for Under Attack, which taped several shows at Queen's two weeks ago.

When asked what he thought of the comment by the mayor of Newark that his group were "vigilantes", Imperiale said he had little respect for mayor Hughes' inability to deal with the city's problems, and for his failure to realize that his (Imperiale's) group was constituted to help citizens. "My use of the word (vigilantes) isn't nice neither." Moderator Fred Davis then asked him if he would be ashamed of being called a John Bircher. Imperiale protested that freedom to be what one wants is one of America's great virtues, and admitted that although he had no direct association with the Birchers, "I have a few friends amongst them".

Imperiale supported George Wallace in the 1968 elections; Davis asked why he did so if he maintains that he is not a racist: "He had the answers to a lot of problems. I don't like being a politician; politicians lie a lot instead of saying things they really feel. But we gotta make a tough choice just like everybody else.The trouble with us is that we're anticipating the fall like in Rome; we spread ourselves too wide."

"Some say the Citizens' Committee is infiltrated by the police -- Why? We got nothing to conceal, we speak the truth. It's too bad they don't put their time into stopping the guys who are mugging little old ladies."

Davis asked if Imperiale thought that reports of corruption and graft in the New York City Police Force were true: "I don't like that any more than I like Communists. But it took a long time to grow, it's nothing new. But there are still good policemen. I've seen some good arrests. I just saw a guy get caught with the hard stuff, the big H. If I catch anyone selling that to my kids, he's going to need a hospital bed before a prison cell!"

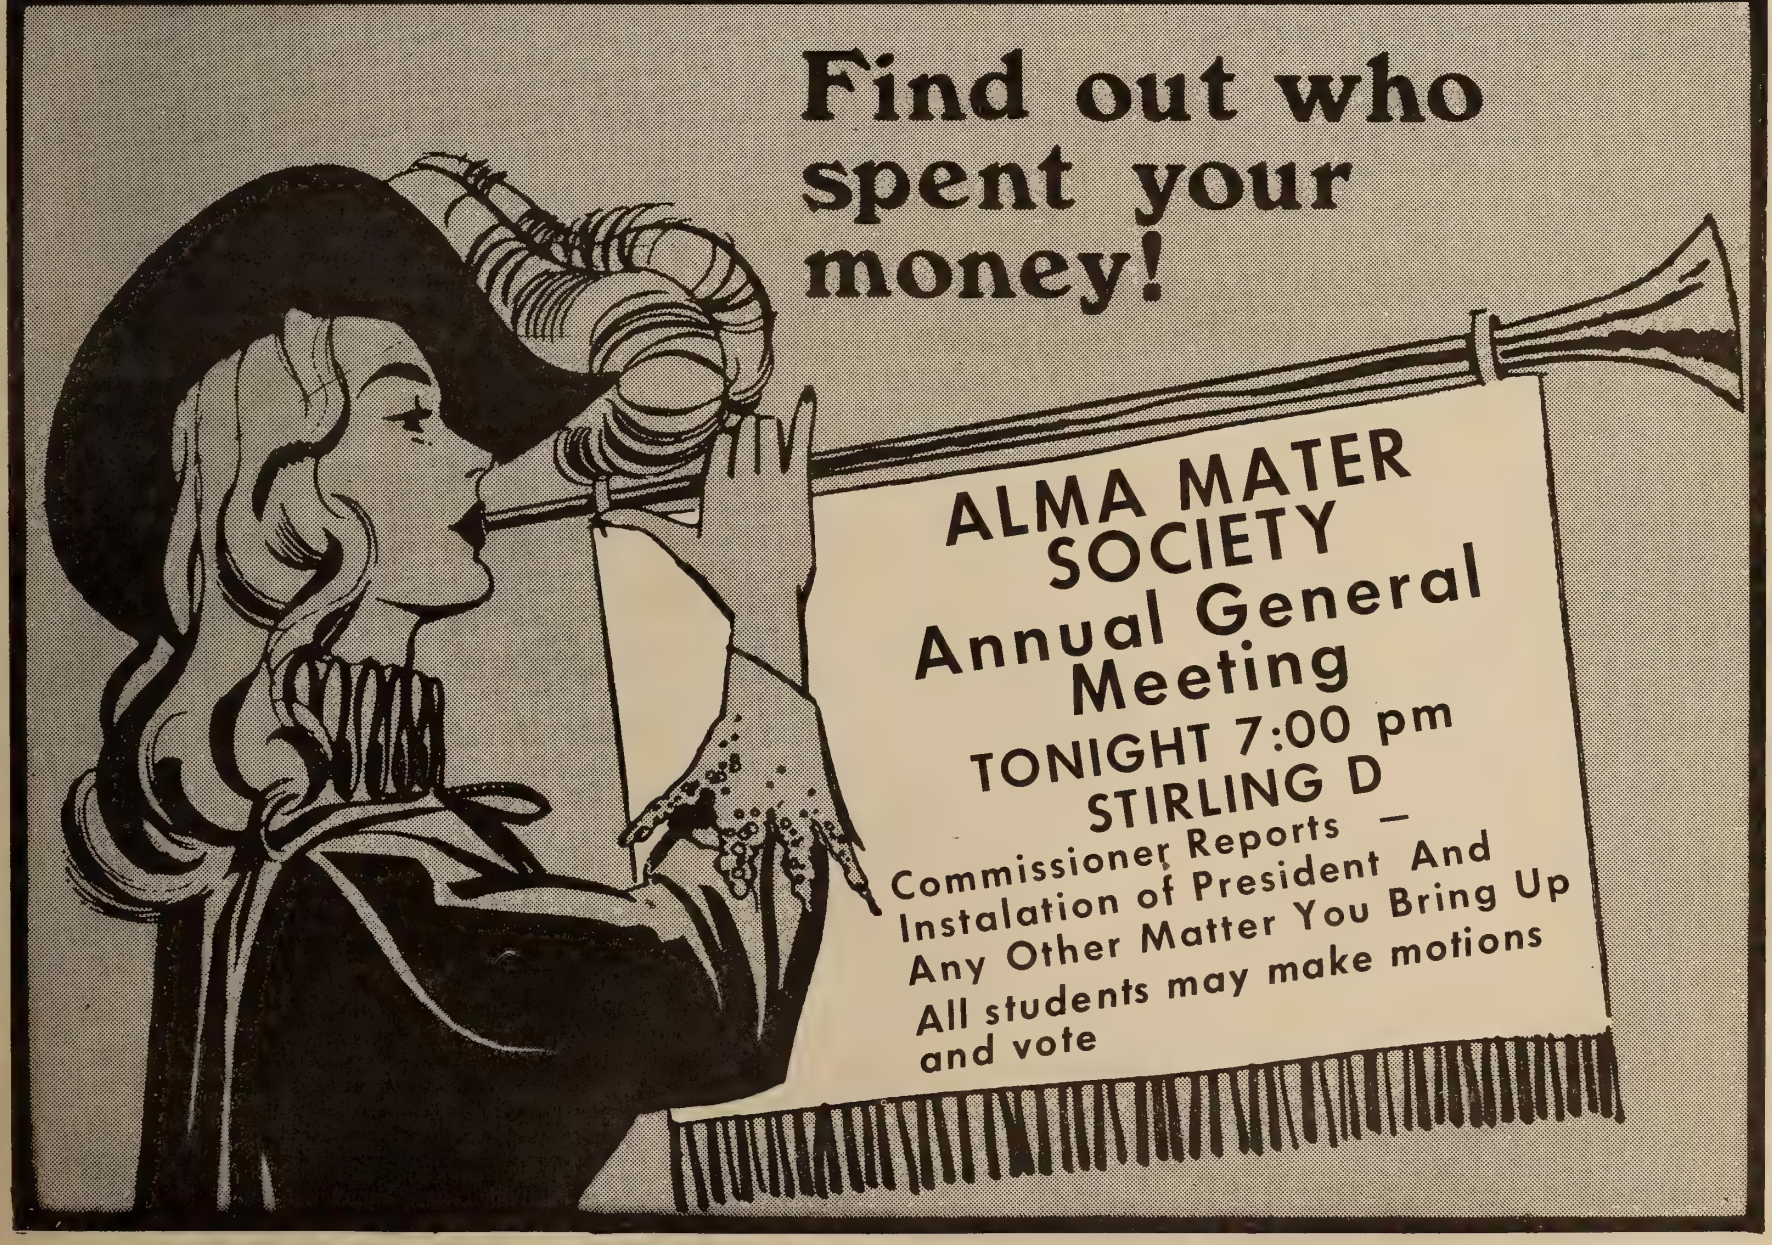
A student on the panel challenged Imperiale, asking if it was true that he had said, "I've never made a racist statement, I've never told anyone to kill a nigger." Surely, said the panelist, the word "nigger" itself is racist. "They call me a wop!" replied Imperiale. "If your heart is pure and your intentions good, it don't matter what they call you."

Another panelist inquired if it were true that there were black citizens' groups in Newark parallel to Imperiale's, and if so, why weren't they integrated? "We live on different sides of town."

"Do you respect authority?" another panelist asked. "Yes." "Then why didn't you disband when Hughes asked you to?" "He suggested we were like the Cosa Nostra -- I don't have to take that from nobody," replied Imperiale. "And he didn't ask anybody else to disband their citizens' groups." "But isn't it also true that you've been subject to numerous investigations?" persisted the panelist.

"You see," said Imperiale: "They forgot to tell you about the service aspect of our organization. I'm not a politician; I like to consider myself a statesman."

The programme then turned to questions from the audience. The first, pipe-smoking questioner asked, "If you call yourself a Social Service organization, why the two gentlemen with the bulges under the left armpit?" (referring to Mr. Imperiale's rather imposing companions who were lurking at the back of Grant Hall.) "Do you promise to eat that pipe if I prove to you that they don't have anything under their coats?" The student declined, but the two men flashed open their expensive suit lapels in support of Imperiale's statement. They were then introduced as his legislative aide, and a sheriff's deputy, not without a certain amount of incredulous laughter from the general audience.



Another question: "You say you're not a racist, yet you align yourself with Wallace?" "Listen," said Imperiale. "My wife's Irish, but I love her. I just happen to like certain things Wallace says; I don't want to go to bed with him!"

"What social service does your organization provide?" Amongst others, there's an ambulance corps, an escort service, and a blood bank. "Why can't the municipal government look after these things?" "That's a good question," said Imperiale.

"Do you have any affiliation with the Mafia?" "No, nor with the Cosa Nostra or anyone. There's no place for any race's organized crime here."

Some else asked if it were not violent and inconsistent with his belief in justice to strike a drug pusher who tried to sell to his kids. "Sure, but's it's an emotional thing. I love my kids, and I bet none of you out there could stand by and let that happen to your kids any more than I could."

Imperiale received a good-natured round of applause. Moderator Davis then reported that it is always a pleasure for him to come to Queen's campus, because Under Attack can rely upon "a provocative reaction" and good shows. He thanked the audience again for their cooperation, and particularly for sticking out Imperiale's delay, due to difficulties at Watertown Municipal Airport.

ONE WAY FLIGHTS AVAILABLE

Scholarships vary between departments, senate is told

A person's chances of winning a scholarship in the faculty of arts and science depend, to a great extent, on which department he or she is in.

This was revealed in a report of the senate committee on scholarships and student aid, which was presented to the Queen's senate last Thursday. The report contains the revised terms of award of the roughly 120 scholarships which are available to students enrolled in arts and science departments. The revision was necessitated by the implementation, in 1971, of the Report on Structure of Degree Programmes, ; Regulations and Academic Standards for Degrees, which changed many of the requirements for obtaining an Arts degree.

The report reveals that the number of scholarships available in any department varies greatly, from a low of one in drama, film and music to a high of 18 in English.

As well, the total amount of scholarship money available in the departments varies greatly. This ranges from $50 in drama and film to a total of $7,440 for students taking geological sciences.

Some members of Senate asked whether it was possible that more money could be made available to those departments which offered few scholarships. It was suggested that this could perhaps be accomplished by giving preference to students in departments like drama or film in selecting the winners of scholarships which are available to all arts students, regardless of department. It was noted, however, that this would be impossible, since such awards must, by their terms of award, be open to all arts students, and applicants must be judged on the basis of merit alone.

It was also noted by the principal, Dr. John Deutsch, that the university does try to encourage alumni and others to offer scholarships in departments in which few are available. He noted, however, that most scholarships are offered unsolicited, with the donor having decided the terms of the award, and the university is thus in the position of either accepting the award as offered or rejecting it. (Awards have been rejected, but usually only when the terms are discriminatory and in violation of the Human Rights Code.)

Thus, the problem remains that some department, especially some of the newer ones, are able to offer few awards.

The number of scholarships available and the total amount available, by department, is as follows:

arts history - 2 scholarships, total value $105;
biology - 7 scholarships, total value $1,565;
chemistry - 14 scholarships, total value $4,950;
drama - 1 scholarship, value $50;
economics - 6 scholarships, total value $655 (excluding the Dunning award, for which no value was given);
English - 18 scholarships, total value $4,120;
film - 1 scholarship, value $50;
French - 6 scholarships, total value $720;
geography - 4 scholarships, total value $360;
geological sciences - 8 scholarships, total value $7,440;
German - 5 scholarships, total value $365;
Hebrew - 2 scholarships, total value $145;
history - 10 scholarships, total value $1,710;
mathematics - 6 scholarships, total value $579;
music - 1 scholarship, value $500;
philosophy - 2 scholarships, total value $320;
physics - 9 scholarships, total value $1,890;
political science - 6 scholarships, total value $450 (excluding the Dunning award, for which no value was given);
psychology - 3 scholarships, total value $1,230;
sociology - 2 scholarships, total value $410;
Spanish - 4 scholarships, total value $350.

Senate committees want more people

The university senate wants to fill vacancies on its committees for 34 students and 35 faculty members.

Many committee positions come vacant at the end of August, and members of the university community are being invited to suggest "the names of full-time faculty or full-time students whose interests, knowledge and experience seem to qualify them for positions on senate committees".

Nominees do not have to be senators, but should be interested and qualified in the area served by the committee. The nominee's consent is required. Nomination forms, available at the senate office in Richardson Hall, are due by March 9.

Terms of office begin September 1; they are for two years (except the faculty positions on appointment, promotion, tenure and leave, which are for three years).

Drama major for next year is now under study

A recommendation to establish a major in drama for the 1972-73 academic session was received by the Queen's Senate last Thursday and was referred for detailed consideration to the Senate Committee on Academic Development.

The drama department presently offers a minor and a medial in drama, and, as outlined in its brief describing the proposed major, the department feels that there are a number of reasons why a major in drama should be offered at Queen's at this time.

One of these is the growing interest in drama in high schools. A year ago, only five Ontario high schools offered Grade 13 drama; this year, 22 schools are offering it. To provide teachers to meet this demand, the Department of Education has instituted a Type A certificate in drama, for which the equivalent of 9 courses in drama is required.

The drama department expects that many students will be interested in taking a major in drama, which would qualify them for entrance to a Type A programme in drama at a College of Education. It was noted by arts and science dean Dr. Ronald Watts at Thursday's Senate meeting that, since Queen's drama department played an important role in getting the Department of Education to institute a Type A certificate in drama, it would be fitting if Queen's could offer the major to meet the requirements of the Type A programme.

The department's brief also notes that, while at present Queen's has been able to attract many of the top drama students in the province, this might not continue to be the case if the department could not offer a major.

The brief also stated that there is a strong demand within the department for a major. A survey conducted by the department indicated that 73 students now enrolled in drama courses would complete a major in drama if one were offered in 1972-73.

Moreover, there is a great deal of interest in drama at Queen's, as indicated by the growth of the department. In 1965-66, there were only 38 students taking drama courses. This year, 471 students are registered in drama courses and about 550 are expected next year.

To offer a major next year, the department noted that no new courses would have to be added; there are already 12 drama courses, and four courses in dramatic literature from the English department will be included among the courses offered. The department will also not need any new staff for the major, and although more studio space is needed, it is needed to meet the demands of the existing numbers of students and is not affected by the proposed major.

Dunning lecturer tells of African education

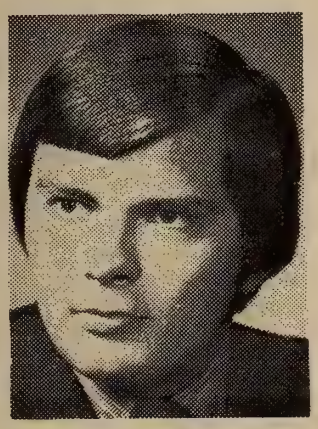
Dr. R. P. Baffour, Dunning Trust Lecturer for 1972 said that "for education to be most beneficial to a developing nation, it must add to, not destroy the cultural values that the country already possesses." Baffour, a noted educationalist, engineer, businessman and civil servant from Ghana spoke on the "Role of Education in Developing Nations" Wednesday night.

Baffour viewed education as an import. "The values of the white man" he said, "were imposed on the Ghanians." Education was not only an attempt to totally anglicize the language of the natives but it was also used to replace their cultural values with western ones. "This led to rebellion and strong nationalistic feeling" he said and added that "education must adapt to the culture rather than imposing itself upon it."

It was also indicated that education was at first primarily concerned with creating civil servants and administrative people, capable of running their own government. "This took place at the expense of technological and scientific subjects," he commented.

Specialists are also needed to discover and develop natural resources and to discover ways of avoiding the mistakes of developed nations such as pollution. He said, "Without men capable of performing these tasks, all the administrative finesse in the world won't make the nation successful."

Ghana has a problem finding an acceptable government. When the British departed, the reins of government were left in the hands of trained natives. However Baffour commented, "many people still see their government as that of a foreign oppressor." And he added, "until the governemnt is completely accepted, it cannot function effectively."



In conclusion, Baffour remarked that "each country requires its own type of education and its own solutions to the problems of development."

Diplomas will stay in Latin

The B.A. diploma will remain the way it was. The arts and science faculty board made this decision, and the university senate confirmed it, earlier this month, after hearing the results of a poll in which arts and science students favoured keeping the old(large) format for diplomas and keeping the B.A. wording in Latin.

The same faculty board meeting heai preliminary proposals for special B.A. programmes in social behaviour and in culture change, and sent them to a committee for study. A third special programme, in "security studies and conflict resolution", was considered but sent back to the departments responsible for it to be considered further. That programme was criticized in the board by philosophy professor Dr. Norman Brown, who said it had "a lack of solid concentration" and a "waywardness" in its choice of options.

The Butler:

Voyeurism in Decline..

by P. A. Gompertz

If this is "What the Butler Saw", then it is not altogether surprising that domestic staff is so hard to come by nowadays. This type of roisterous glance into the machinations of a confused situation used to be slick, ephemeral, and exceedingly fast, carrying the audience along with its momentum of improbability. Feydeau and Brian Rix hinge the action of their farces upon a limitless supply of tenuously inter-related characters, and a plethora of stage entrances and exits.

Orton has elevated farce; and at the same time he has blackened its character. He has tended to combine the sick with the click, and maintains the humour by not allowing time to dwell upon the forror of the situation. Whilst traditional farce goes to great lengths to hide its dirty linen, and relies upon the effort involved to create the humour, Orton throws not only the dirty linen but also "the rank sweat of the enseamed bed" of society onto the stage.

This however does not allow the traditional elements of farce to fade into obscurity. The speed and the slickness are still the essential vehicles for the play, though there is a greater degree of peripheral verbal humour.

"His tragedy seems to be skill, his comedy to be instinct". When Dr. Johnson made this observation concerning Shakespeare, he was underlining a far more general fact of human existance. A good actor can be taught Tragedy, for we all have an awareness of the stuff of great Tragedy within us. But Comedy cannot be transmitted through technical dexterity; it is a latent gift that makes a great comic (not parodic or burlesque) actor the rarest of creatures. Without this "feel" for comedy, nothing a director can do in the way of created timing and mannerism will compensate for an actor's lack of comic gestalt.

And so it was with the Drama Department's presentation of "What the Butler Saw" that nothing could hide the holes in the delicate fabric that is the backcloth of successful comedy. The production was lethargic and flaccid, even self-conscious at times as it began to feel its own inadequacy.

John Burgess, as Dr. Prentice, tried manfully to hold the play together, and fulfilled the traditional function of anchorman with afficacy. His failure would have doomed the play, for as the protagonist he became the hub around which the wheel puttered fitfully into motion. But the weight of responsibility seemed to lie rather heavily upon his performance, and supressed his frenetic incredulity at finding himself the centre of such caprice.

The other commendable performance came from Owen Moulton, whose British Bobby was, in style and appearance, so akin to Kenneth Connor (one of the "Carry On" crew) that it was uncanny. Suffice to say that Kenneth Connor is brilliant in such roles, and Moulton's air of massive indifference and uncomprehension characteristic of all good farce policemen, was a delight. His stoic acceptance of his frequent dismissals by Dr. Prentice was one of the few occasions when actions spoke as loudly as words, and all the elements of the play momentarily gelled.

With the exception of these two characters the cast had great difficulty in establishing the type of flow essential to success. Eleanor Crowder as Geraldine looked as if she had originally come to audition for something like Ophelia and still wasn't sure how she got this part. Her confusion and stilted awkwardness were not facets of the character which were firmly in the actresses control, but were all too obviously manifestations of the state of the actress herself, and her lack of comfort in the role led her to hide behind a cultivated whine which was intended to convey her bewilderment at finding herself in such a bizarre situation.

Janice Irvine's performance was a pantomine travesty employing all the exaggeration and distortion inherent in that genre. Perhaps, if everyone else had achieved an aura of fallible humanity (an essential ingredient of good farce), her failure would have been more obtrusive than it was. She served adequately as a purveyor of Orton's lines, but she studiously avoided any suggestion of character. Robert McClure as Nicholas Beckett had the same problem; but there was in his performance a suggestion of natural flair which was mostly stifled by the atmosphere of the production.

Finally, Stephen Hair as Dr. Rance provided a strange puzzle. What he did he did well; it is however incomprehensible that chose to play the part the way that he did. more than anyone lost that essential air belief in his own normality which makes incongruity of the actions so funny. portrayal deliberately aimed to prov laughter by the absurdity of his whole be and thus lost half of its potential power.

The members of the VAGHY STRING QUARTET have been musicians-in-residence at Queen's since the fall of 1968. They have given concerts throughout the United States and Canada, and in April will be making a tour of Europe, including Ireland, Iceland, Norway, Poland, Germany and Austria. The Journal recently interviewed each of the members of the quartet, and the third of these interviews, with Deszo Vaghy, appears today.

DESZO VAGHY, first violinist of the quartet, was born in Baja, Hungary, and studied with Marc Hendricks at the Stadtliche Hochschule fur Musik in Hamburg, and with Dorothy Delay at the Juilliard School of Music in New York. He plays a Vincenzo Ruggieri violin made in 1710.

Journal: What made you decide to form the Vaghy String Quartet in 1965?

We were playing quite a bit of chamber music in Europe. We had a string quartet-it was more or less professional, but not very serious. It was really for making some money, but we couldn't really take the time to concentrate on string quartet. Of course when we came to the Juilliard, WE thought it would be a great opportunity to study with the Juilliard quartet. But for a good while we didn't see very much of them, since they were always on tour. Dorothy Delay knew that Tibor and I were good chamber music players, and she asked us-Why don't you play something in a concert? So we said that it was better to have something smaller than a string quartet, and we chose a piece, the Dvorak tercet, which we played in a collegium, and it seemed to be a great success. And after that, she asked us why we didn't organize a quartet seriously. At that time we didn't think on a professional basis, but we organized a string quartet, and there were a Japanese and a Korean and the two of us. They were very good players, but somehow there was no possibility for continued existence, since they had other obligations-scholarships and so forth. But after we gave the concert, the Dean called us and he said: if we organized a string quartet he would give us a full scholarship to study in Aspen for the whole summer, and study with the Amadues quartet. That was really the beginning of the quartet and we worked very hard, trying lots of people for the positions, which were open. We succeeded to a point, and got two very nice young gentlemen, and worked very hard. When we got to Aspen the quartet was not more than two months old. After the first violin of the Amadeus quartet heard us he proposed that we be taken under the management of Young Artists of Aspen. We also had the opportunity to make a recording advertising the Aspen Music School-our first recording after only three months in existence. So that's how it really got started.

Journal: What teacher or musician has been the most influential on your individual musical development?

Teaching and inspiration are two things. There are two or three artists whom I have never met who have given great inspiration-one is Svistolav Richter. Also the Tatrai quartet when I was very young.

Teachers are a different story. The major push from a teacher was from Marc Hendricks in Germany. He taught us how "t that's how He was ex very adva man. He d really he strument,

LIGHTHOUSE

Lighthouse is continuing to challenge many of the fundamental ideas about rock. This is a Canadian band, 13 men strong, that is as relaxed at a Saturday night rock dance as it is with a symphony orchestra - or even a ballet company.

Lighthouse is a musical organization that gains standing ovations at jazz festivals and at rock festivals. Yet it can turn around, without losing a fragment of its musical integrity, and shake a symphony orchestra's audience to new heights of enthusiasm.

Lighthouse was formed in Toronto as a result of a series of meetings between two young musicians, Paul Hoffert and Skip Prokop. Prokop had left his former band, The Paupers, to search for new beginnings. Hoffert, who had been working on commercials, jingles and television sound tracks, wanted to move in new directions, too.

Lighthouse has played twice in the last two years at Queen's, and still offer enough that is new musically to make them worth seeing again. The concert will be at Grant Hall, Friday March 3, 7 and 10 p.m. Advance tickets at 99c are on sale in the John Orr room, cost is $2.00 at the door.

Virtuoso at Queen's

At a recent New York debut performance young Canadian pianist Mari-Elizabeth Morgen was heralded as an artist destined for a particularly distinguished future. Her playing of Bach's Goldberg variations was acclaimed "an entire success".

Queen's audiences will have an opportunity to hear this exciting new talent in an all - Bach concert featuring the Goldberg Variations this Friday, March 3

The cycle of variations, dedicated by Bach to his pupil Johann-Ulbricht Goldberg, presents the player with many difficulties. Composed for a two-manual harpsichord, it is regarded by many as unplayable on the piano. It is not a piece to be attempted by the amateur.

Miss Morgen's performance of the work won her a resounding victory in the 1968 International Bach Competition in Washington, D.C. where she was awarded an unprecedented 100 per cent by all three judges.

Tickets for the 8:30 p.m. performance to be held in Dunning Hall on Friday 3 March are now on sale at the Division of Concerts Office, Theological Hall (547-6194). The box office is open from 9:00 a.m. to 5:00 p.m.

It would have been nice if we could have learned what we do today from another quartet, but we really followed the hard way. It was very difficult to get hold of a quartet and work for a long time with them. Naturally we used the service when we could get it, but our progress had to come largely from our own resources.

Journal: What would you say has been the most challenging work or group of works you have played?

Your judgement of difficulty changes with time, and with the development of the quartet. I recall earlier pieces that are not a problem at all today, but we thought we would never master them. I recall when we first played Ravel, it seemed incredibly difficult. Not much later we started to play Bartok's Second, and there were parts we thought weren't possible to play. We told this to Claus Adam, that it wasn't possible to play the marking that Bartok had written, and he just smiled a bit and said: "There are quartets which can play it. "And somehow that pushed us to work further, and we played it.

There are two types of difficulty; one is in performance, and the other is in detail. Some pieces are so long that you feel as if your hand is falling off, and you are just in the first half of it. This is the most serious difficulty - the endurance, because that will always stay difficult. There is the Mozart D minor quartet, a very beautiful piece, but it is terribly long; that piece always remains difficult for us. Schubert's Death and the Maiden" is another one like that-all the romantics are hard to get used to for length. As far as technique Bartok's quartets are no joke. But then again, if you have a piece that is very clear in texture, you can spend maybe more time on these pieces than on other more technically difficult pieces. Haydn quartets eat up time like anything.

Journal: Are there any works that you either feel you aren't ready to play or the audience isn't ready to hear?

Now we are into the question of programming. As far as we are concerned, there are really no limitations. However, in choosing programs there really two ways-either the CBC or some station calls you up and says we want this or that performed, and then you have no choice. Or you have the luck to choose your own program, which we do mostly. If someone is choosing a program he has to be inspired by the pieces-it's a big mistake to choose pieces that you have to fight. There is a problem of who you want to please. There are always people who don't like certain things, so it is very difficult to choose a program that pleases everyone. I really think that if you play a piece that is not normally appealing to the public, but you play it well, there is always something which stays with the audience. And even if they reject it at the moment, there is something which catches their ears, and maybe the next time they will be more aware of things, and more willing to listen with an objective mind. It's interesting to think about the Bartok quartets; some people like them, most people don't like them, but they are really romantic, even classic compared to some other pieces that are played.

Journal: Can you think of any recent works by contemporary composers which rival the best in the string quartet repertoire?

It's a very individual thing. Sometimes the very good pieces fail to get recognition, and the very bad ones are performed. And if you have a festival of modern music, its really more or less for educated people. The general public which likes music doesn't attend.

There is one I might single out-Karl Husser, a conductor-composer who teaches at Cornell. I received two string quartets from him and they are very interesting and very well written.

Journal: In your experience, do audiences in North America and Europe differ in their attitudes to new compositions?

First of all I have to make a difference between Canada and the United States. In the U.S. they are fairly open-minded toward new compositions. Canada is a little bit slower, more traditional, more like Europe. But it is hard to say-in Europe there is definitely a very divided public for music. One is very traditional, and the other is very avant-garde, out of line. John Cage is romantic compared to a lot of what is going on in Europe. I am not very much in favor of most of it, because I don't think there is enough preparation by the composer. I really think I prefer the North American public as far as modern music is concerned.

Journal: What do you think of chance music?

In a way I really think it is a great thing, but in another way I don't think anybody's name should appear beside it. Why should his name be carried beside it when I am doing the chance music? I don't see any reason that any composer has to be mentioned. I am squeaking and squawking, not him.

I don't think that music which doesn't get close to the feelings of the composer can be taken seriously. I really think that if a composer wants to say something, he should put it down on the paper as close as possible to his imagination, so that the recreator can get an idea about it. I don't think a composer should let someone mess around his piece.

Journal: There is a shortage of string players in North America. Does Europe have a similar shortage, and if so why?

Yes, some countries do. It is my observation that with higher standards of living, the number of musicians declines. To make a living with music is not the most attractive thing in a highly affluent country. A good example is Germany, where after the war, when the standard of living began to rise again, good musicians became scarce, especially strings. So that Germany has a great number of imported players from other European countries and the United States. And to compare Western Europe with Eastern Europe, Eastern Europe has an incredible number of good string players. It seems to be that they don't do it for the sake of money it's more or less an honour, and they are respected for it.

Journal: Which does the music critic influence more-the performer or the listening public?

Since music became commercial, managers and artists have been spoiling critics, by giving too much weight to their opinions, by the way they use them. When you sell artists you send out publicity, largely consisting of what critics said.

Critics are often funny people. Lots of them never played an instrument, lots of them don't even hear, but they are better with words. Some have musical background from recordings, some have no musical background at all.

I don't think critics can influence any artist. They can't say as many things critically about the artist as the artist can say about himself. The artist knows how he played, he knows what he missed, or what came close to his ideas.

The Vaghy String Quartet will be in concert Friday March 19 at Dunning. Their program will include works by Charles Ives, Peter Re, and Antonin Dvorak. The concert will begin at 8:30 p.m.

Letters:

the Bormuse

by Alan Broadbent

The administration of this University is burdening themselves under a heavy delusion, and has been doing so for some years.

They have named the week just past "study week".

The poor misguided fellows. They think that people actually get their books out and study during the week.

I certainly don't want to be the first to break the news to them, for I may be spilling the beans, as it were, but I do feel the necessity to outline the poverty of their expectations.

What they call "study week" has been more commonly named "ski week", "spring vacation", "slack week", "bowling week", and a variety of other names specifying the non-academic thrills espoused by the campus populace.

A simple proof that it is not "study week" could be observed by strolling around campus during the period of time under discussion. An absolute plethora of janitors leaning on brooms, a multitude of departmental secretaries slipping home early, a gaggle of library workers quietly dozing at their places; these are sure signs that the students are neither studying nor employing academic buildings.

Of course, it is simple to see why the administrators would think that students are studying during this week. They do not get the week off, and so they remain in their offices conducting business as usual. They deal in such nitty-gritty things as money, enrollment quotas, and time-table slots, and these things remain constant whether the students are around or not. As long as the bills are paid, and there is an official designation of all time, they are not apt to notice what is going on. And they expect that when a certain period of time is called "study week", the students will be studying.

Of course, there is something particularly negative about the appellation "study week". The assumption is that a full week must be set aside during the spring term for students to study. This may mean many things, all of them less than flattering either to the students or to the institution.

First, it might reflect the opinion that students are such laggards that they do not keep up with their work, and they need a full week to merely catch up the slack they have imposed on their workload through months of frivolity and other non-serious purpose.

Secondly, it might relfect on the tedium of the academic curriculum of the university. Students are so bored by what has gone on in the classroom since September that they need a week to recharge their intellectual batteries to avoid smothering in the last two months of the year.

Thirdly, the "study week" concept might mean that the university works the students too hard, placing such heavy demands on their time and energies that they need a week just to accomplish all of the work that had been assigned. This would indicate a rather poor understanding of the learning process on the part of the faculty, and certainly a bad bit of time-tabling.

Fourthly, it would indicate that the university is still operating "in loco parentis", a concept it claims to have dropped some years ago. This concept would have it that the university acts in the role of a parent, that the student is still a child who needs to be guided and disciplined as a child, and that the student is not able to handle responsibility in a way other than that of a child. Thus, the name "study week" could be seen as an admonition, strongly informing the student that he should be studying.

However, the inevitable wave of student activism and protest on this campus has made the week into what the students want it to be. They have made their decision, packed their skis into the old 1971 Dodge Dart, and headed for the ski slopes, study week or not. This kind of dynamic action will certainly bring the university to its knees, forcing the university to seek its funding from the winter resort areas in the Laurentian Mountains.

Leap year

Dear Editors:

While doing reasearch on old newspapers I ran across the following item which you may be interested in reprinting.

LEAP YEAR IN 1848

The present year will give those lovely tyrants, the ladies, the privilege of making love. The gentlemen must remain in a state of calm quiescence for at least three hundred and sixty-six days, during which time they will not be permitted to refuse any lady who shall make love to them.

To prove this to be the case, and that it is no new notion of ours, we will quote an extract from an old volume published in the year 1606, and entitled "Courtship, Love, and Matrimony."

"Albeit it is nowe a parte of the common lawe in regard to the social relations of life, that as every bissexitle or leap year doth return, the ladies have the sole privilege during the time it continueth, of making love unto men, which they may do either by words or looks, as unto them it seemeth proper; and, moreover, no man shall be entitled to the benefit of the clergy who does refuse to accept the offers of a lady, or who dothe in any wise treat her proposals with slight or contumely."

So long ago as the above article was printed, it seems to have been a "parte of the common lawe" that the ladies should have the sole privilege of making love every fourth year, and what was then binding as common law is equally binding now, since it has never been superseded by any statute.

OFS

Dear Editors;

In a front page article of the Journal of Thursday, Feb. 17, the following statement was made: "The OUS (Ont. Union of Students) cannot be revived... chiefly because the Students' Administrative Council at the University of Toronto is constitutionally forbidden to join it." It appears to me that the reasons for forbidding membership in the OUS could easily apply to the OFS (Ont. Federation of Students). If these reasons are no longer valid, then a simple constitional amendment would allow the revival of the OUS. However, a constitutional amendment implies a general referendum or other form of assessing popular opinion. Could it be that a few members of the University of Toronto are trying, by creating a new name for the association, to skirt the wishes of the Toronto student body? I suggest that the AMS carefully investigate this matter to ensure that we are not becoming unwitting accomplices in the usurpation of the rights of the students of the University of Toronto.

-Allan Green

Univ. Centre

Dear Editors;

The series of letters re the university centre has ignored one very important consideration. There are still a few individuals on University Avenue and Alfred Streets who own their own homes and as they obtain a great deal of pleasure from living in this location, which they chose many years ago, have decided not to sell despite heavy pressures from the Queen's administration to force them to do so.

These people would have to be expropriated were the complex to be built, however no regard has been given to this aspect of the venture and the feelings of this group. It has been argued that they would be substantially better off financially were they forced to move. This is not the case with expropriation; where market value is paid.

Surely this generation of students who rejects the present society due to its indifference and mismanagement of the world and who compaign for the rights of minorities will have more compassion than to watch a large institution override individuals.

Cabaret

Dear Editors;

At the recent performances of the Queen's Musical Theatre's "Cabaret," either there was no Journal representative, or those of your staff who attended did not consider that what they saw merited recognition. Since you were sent complimentary tickets, it would have been reasonable to assume that if you did not deem the show worthy of your attention, you might have at least returned the tickets so that some of those who were turned away at the door might have had the opportunity to view the production.

For the second year in a row, the production of the Queen's Musical Theatre has passed virtually unacknowledged by the student publications except for paid advertisements. It seems somewhat inconsistent that a performance which merits a standing ovation by our student government is not worth a few paragraphs in the Journal. I realize that this genre does not match in intellectual sophistication those plays of our drama department (which rarely escape published recognition), but don't you think a show that involves over four months of active preparation and is viewed by one quarter of the campus population might be worth a review?

-Ann Vogl, Paula David

(Ed. note: We do, which is why nearly a page in the Journal of Friday, Feb. 18 was devoted to a review of Cabaret.)

More Trash

Dear Editors:

In view of the collective "mentality" which was ostensibly directed at my subjectively-critical response to the Edgar Winter fiasco of the late AMS Concert, I would hereby attempt to respond to several points made under various heads of that letter to the Journal of February 15th, 1972, (or is it points on those heads?).

In any event, as regards "Point One", I take exception that my name, and the intimation of a "knowledge of music" be in any way mistakenly and subversively connected with the notion that Edgar Winter and similar relics from the abberational garbage-days of rock (the psychedelic perversions which relied upon blinding light, eardrum-shattering decibelratings of sound, and "heads" duely befogged by grass or speed) in any way represent what could be nominated "music" -- even within the bounds which rock and roll attempts to hold open to such worthless and grating assaults.

Also, I feel that it is not within the realm of expectancy for a concert-goer to be actively concerned in the backstage manipulations and programming placements which your letter intimates did sorely detract from, and sabotage what you seem inclined to believe would have been a performance in which Winter could have displayed those "flashes of his greatness".

The premise of rock concerts (which feature assorted talents in a musical attempt at a Smorgasbord effect) has in the past been to offer a style of music to suit the varying tastes of the audience. Recently, Canada's Five Man Electrical Band surged to prominence in the American South and in the highly competitive West Coast and Californian market as a result of being teamed with the James Gang and Paul Butterfield's Blues Band--the success of this junket reflects that each of these groups has that elusive quality which continues to elude those outfits of Winter's ilk--"talent"!

As to your comment on Holmes not showing, why is the audience always treated as a poor dupe--the last to know what is going on? If, as you suggest, Merrick is inundated with problems in hiring and directing the entertainers who arrive at Queen's, then the logical suggestion is that he relinquish the post to someone both capable and qualified enough to do the job.

If the Concert Committee is, as you maintain, a "rookie" organization, then perhaps such an integral part of a Queen's social year should be taken from the hands of "rookies".

The logical comparison would be to look at other schools (Western, Waterloo, Toronto etc.) who have the same difficulties, yet present concerts of a far more outstanding nature.

So the quality of concerts has "improved" -- well, granted there is nowhere to go but up after you have presented one-hit-wonders such as "The Sandpipers" as the outstanding event of a year: or when a synthetic, studio-oriented group such as Grass Roots (who probably require 90 takes to duplicate the right "bubblegum" sound) has the evening stolen from them by the artistry of a David Rea -- or when a Don McLean outguns a super-group of the calibre of Blood Sweat & Tears.

Now, "there's the rub". B.S. & T. were certainly a fantastic group some two to three years ago -- but that was two to three years ago! The conclusion to your primary "point", being that the placing of acts in the programme "effectively doomed the concert and Winter before the show even started" smells as suspect as your "excremental vision" and its "muse" to which I shall later refer.

Which brings me to point 2 -- Winter and his troupe, led by that Disneylandish refugee from a carnival girlie show with his reliance on stagey gimmickry could not have "put it together" for any Queen's audience -- at any time!

Your denigration of the "Queen's audience" is as wrongheaded as your reasoning, as justified by the facts. How was it that Winter and friends could not generate any of the excitement aroused by Cotton's Blues Boys? Were these "name musicians? Name two? In a word, again, they lacked the talent.

Your specious argument (point 3 you call it) regarding the December 30 concert in Ottawa, is a far remove from what can logically be stated as objective response to musicians. Ottawa concerts, of the Grand Funk, Edgar Winter variety, have a notoriety for featuring several thousand wasted souls sitting as the shrieking guitar notes cascade in avalanches upon their ears.

Now maybe we should all be stoned (I prefer to deplete my own neurons with plain old Labatt's 50, but you are welcome to "uppers" of your own choosing, naturally) but when you attempt to tell me I can't appreciate someone's "music" because I am not properly fortified, or subdued, then I say ---- you!, to quote Mr. Carlin.

A further point, regarding these Ottawa concerts should be examined -- would you care to hazard a guess as to the mean age of the participants in the audience response on which you base your assessment of Winter's "powers"?

There are those of us who have grown older than sixteen, unfortunately, and I attempted to express the opinion (not a singular one) on the merits of Edgar Winter's performance on behalf of most viewers I questioned, who replied, in Carlinese -- "horseshit"!

Your feeble attempt at analogy, regarding the telling of your jokes has no conceivable connection with the abilities of a paid (generously) performer in reaching his audience.

The "timing" and "smoothness" of Winter's assembly was indeed non-existant, but you seem so steeped in the aromas which surround your "excremental vision" that you again miss the point (look at your heads)! Turning an amplifier up to ten and donning a Superman cape is not rock music, and let's face it, peerless quintet, Queensmen and Queenswomen know music, and show appreciation for it -- witness Cotton's performance; the Guess Who & Chuck Berry, Sha Na Na, Lightfoot etc. etc.

The "cool reception" which you attribute to the inability of a Queen's audience to discern talent and musical ability was conversely a convincingly final show of disregard for the acrobatics and bubblegum tactics of such typical perveyors of garbage-rock as Edgar Winter, the enemic trash-collector.

I for one felt all of the force of Don McLean's brilliant musical diatribe against such exhibitionist departures from good old rock n' roll, when viewing Winter being indifferently received by a Queen's audience which only wished to hear good music:

And as I watched him on the stage,
My hands were clenched in fists of rage,
No angel born in hell,
Could break that Satan's spell,

I saw Satan laughing with delight,
The day the music died.

So, in reply to your premise that "The audience completely alienated Winter and his performance reflected this", let me add, that as usual you have got it confused, or as your hero Carlin might say, "ass-backwards".

Edgar Winter completely alienated a discerning Queen's audience, which paid a big buck to see a good show, and their indifference reflected the alienation of Winter's "music" from what was expected...ie. a professional performance of rock and roll, albeit following a dynamic blues presentation, or a water-polo tournament, or a log-rolling competition -- no matter! Let us hope that, as you infer, Winter is so "pissed off" that he will never again burden our ears with his mediocre musical mundaneness!

Tricolor Awards

Dear Editors;

It is in bitter appreciation of the committee which is responsible for the nomination of recipients of the Tricolor Awards that I find myself writing this note. They have proved themselves to be irresponsible not by their presentations but rather by one absentee.

The students at Queen's University should be both embarrassed and ashamed at the committee's failure to recommend perhaps the most obvious candidate. He has dedicated his three years on this campus to hard work and has endured numerous sacrifices on behalf of the student body. His innovations and accomplishments are tremendously impressive and more than adequately fulfil the committee's expressed criterion of "benefit to the community."

The omission of Patrick Riley as a recipient of the Tricolor Award leads one to believe that the purported 'selection' was not as objective as one would have expected it to be.

I strongly recommend that the members of the nominating committee reconvene in order to reconsider their own criteria in determining recipients of the Tricolor Award.

- Peter Adams

(Ed. note: Without intending any slight for Patrick Riley, we think you are quibbling about a matter on which we have to feel that the committee gets the benefit of the doubt. Undoubtedly, Riley meets the criterion of providing "benefit to the community;" so, undoubtedly, do many other people on this campus.

But it was the committee's unenviable task to choose among all these people who meet this MINIMUM criterion to select a few who benefitted the community most. Because they had access to a great deal of information on the contributions of ALL these people nominated, we have to believe that their decision, based on these facts and impressions, is likely to be superior to yours, based on an opinion about only some of those chosen.

Likely, as in all cases in which only few of many deserving people are to be awarded, some deserving people get missed, and the number of different opinions on who these people are, is probably about equal to the number of people who think about it.)

The myth that we need more economic growth

With his throne speech a week ago, Prime Minister Trudeau once again stressed his government's commitment to promoting economic growth; and not simply to continuing the present rate of growth but to increasing that rate.

This speech was solidly in line with the Trudeau government's past economic policies, as well as those of the Economic Council of Canada, the Senate Committee on Poverty, the Department of External Affairs, the Science Council of Canada and most, if not all, of Canada's politicians: growth is essential to the good life in this country.

So basic is this idea to most politicians' thinking that they seem incapable of even contemplating an alternative to annual increases in growth in the production of goods and services in a country.

Yet it is essential that the people and politicians of Canada begin to consider such alternatives. It has become apparent that it is no longer possible for the economies of the world's developed countries to continue to grow at their present rates (or even at all) if world wide disaster is to be averted, or if any kind of quality of human existence is to be maintained or recovered.

This is true for several reasons.

First, with the continued push for increases in annual production of goods and services, there will continue to be both increasing pollution of the environment and increased depletion of the steadily deminishing supplies of natural resources, especially fuels. For instance, at its present rates of petroleum usage, the United States will use up its domestic supply of petroleum in 13 years. Increased growth there will speed the process.

Secondly, with growth and the accompanying increase in demand for fuels and other resources, there will be increased pressure to exploit the resources of third world, resource-supplying countries. As long as the pattern of fuel processing continues in its present form (extraction in third world countries, processing in developed countries), the result will be either (or both) an increase in the division between rich and poor countries or increased world tensions as the third world countries refuse the demands of the developed countries.

Thirdly, increased economic growth does nothing to ensure that most of the people in a country benefit from a higher standard or quality of life. The total national income of this country is now large enough that, if divided equally among all the people of this country, it would provide everyone with an adequate income to live on. Yet, this has not happened or even been approached, and increasing the national income will do nothing by itself to ensure that it does.

Finally, an increase in the value of the production of goods and services in a country in no way ensures that what is being produced benefits anyone. This value, called the Gross National Product, is increased just as much when more medical care is supplied or more medicines produced as when more armaments are manufactured or more police hired to control increased amounts of crime.

It should be noted that the above applies only to fairly developed nations, among which Canada is included. For an underdeveloped nation, some economic growth is essential for there to be enough wealth to provide necessary services for its citizens; but as countries develop, a point is reached beyond which any further growth in Gross National Product is dysfunctional: any increases in production add as much in social costs, through such things as pollution, as they provide in terms of benefits.)

What is needed, then, is a government whose priorities emphasize not more growth but finding ways to reach and adjust to no-growth. Rather than concentrating on increasing the value of the Gross National Product or the National Income, the emphasis would be on distributing the wealth of the nation equitably. Rather than concentrating on more production for its own sake, effort would be directed to ensuring that what was produced was socially useful.

As was discovered by a group of Massachusetts Institute of Technology professors (and as reported in the Feb. 3 Journal, p.5), growth in resource usage, economic expansion and population will be curtailed; it will happen either calamitously, when resource depletion becomes too great or when pollution levels reach deadly amounts, or it will happen in a planned manner, as the world adjusts to a state of no-growth through design.

There is still a choice. But government reticence to even consider the possibility that economic growth will have to stop makes it appear unlikely that the choice will be made.

1—0 to Western in double overtime

Hockey Gals Lose Heartbreaker

At the start of the season the Women's Ice Hockey Team seemed to be one of Queen's best hopes for an OWIAA Championship. The girls had played six games by the Christmas break and were undefeated. This was almost an incredible feat when compared to previous years when Queen's was usually at the bottom of the league. However, the Golden Gals had a change of fortunes after Christmas. It would seem that Santa took away a gift rather than leaving one for Christmas. Following that fateful break the Gals were only able to salvage one win, against Guelph, while suffering four losses. On the strength of their pre-Christmas performance the Gals still managed a spot in the top four, number four to be exact, and a chance to go for the title.

First place Guelph played third place McMaster in the first game of the tournament on Feb. 18, and came on strong for three goals in the last five minutes of play to tie the game. From there Guelph went on to win in the first overtime period, and qualify for the finals. Queen's faced Western in their bid to play Guelph for the trophy.

Both Queen's and Western played a hard game and at the end of regulation play were tied 0-0. This was despite the fact that both teams decided later that the score should have been 1-1 on a disallowed goal by Queen's and a counter by Western that went unnoticed by the officials. The game finally ended after 22 seconds of the second overtime period on a Western goal in a scramble in front the Queen's net. The puck actually deflected in off of a Queen's player. This loss meant that Queen's played McMaster on Feb. 19 for the consolation game.

Liz Lankin - two goals against Mac.

In this game Queen's put on a better offensive show than they had in many games and came away with a 4-3 victory. Queen's goals were scored by Liz Lankin, who counted two, Ginny Backus, and Cathy Collins.

Guelph went on to win the championship with their 4-0 shutout of the Western team and claim the trophy for the sixth time in seven years.

It is unfortunate that the Queen's team could not score more often as they were backed by the best goaltending in the league. Queen's goalies Wanda Gyde and Cathy Wright had the lowest goals against average in the league with 1.6. The Queen's girls did improve their standing from fourth to third in the season, and from seventh in the seven team league from last season. Also the Gals have established themselves as a team to watch for next season.

Trackmen Beat Weather

Queen's Track team finally made a meet without weather problems last Saturday in Rochester.

Brian MacDonald furthered his success as a miler by easily winning the event in 4:26:5. At no point in the race was he seriously challenged, leaving little incentive for the hoped-for meet record of 4:22.

Our field men have finally decided to come out of their prolonged hibernation. Bob Lingwood placed first out of 30 competitors in the shotput, with the winner on his last put of 44 feet, 8 inches; 3 feet over his personal best, and placing him sixth overall. In the pole vault, Gary Tetzlaff easily cleared 12 feet, but after having to wait an hour for his next vault, failed to clear the next height.

In the 1000 yard run, a stumble on the final corner prevented Brian Aikin from a first place finish. His 2nd place time of 2:21 beat the previous meet record time; Tony Verhoeven ran 2:25 to place seventh out of the 25 competitors.

In spite of the efforts to seemingly throw the race with bumbling exchanges, a quickly assembled mile relay of Ellis, Warner, MacDonald, and Jarvis placed a strong first to finish the meet on a bright note.

During competition Dave Jarvis started twice in the quarter finals to knock himself out of the 45 yard hurdles, which was unfortunate since it would have been a really great final. Bob Warner was 6th in the 600 at 1:18:8 on his first 600 of the year. Winning time was 1:18:8.

Two members of the Queen's team did not participate in the Rochester meet, but went to Ottawa to compete at the Collisium at Lansdowne Park. The occasion was the official opening of the new 150 metre Euroflex track by Mayor Ken Fogarty. The track is made of a rubber compound like the C.N.E. track in Toronto.

Hugh Fraser and Axel Beck both took first place honours. Fraser came first in the 50 m. (5.8) and first in the 300 m. (37.0). Beck placed top in the Long Jump with 21' 4".

THE END OF THE ROAD

by Chris Boon

The basketball season came to an abrupt but not altogether surprising end for the Queen's Golden Gaels in front of a sparse reading-week crown last Friday.

The Gaels dropped a narrow 68-60 decision to the York Yeomen, newly-crowned OUAA eastern-division champions, despite the efforts of Bruce Hemming, who set a new Queen's record with 31 rebounds in his first full game this season.

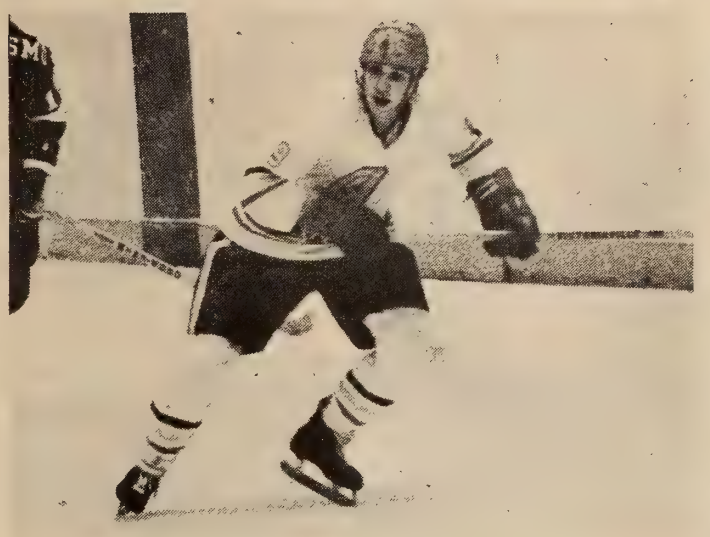
In fact, Queen's dominated the taller York squad on the boards, picking off 56 rebounds to 41 for the Yeomen. Unfortunately, the Gaels' season-long jinx of turnovers and erratic shooting continued to plague them, allowing York to take command, particulary in the later stages of the contest.

York's Vince Santoro led all scorers with 18 points, while Bob Weppler added 15 and Jim Talayja 10 for the Yeomen. Rob Smart and Andy Daugulis had 16 points each for the Gaels, while Paul Howard added 12. Howard also had 11 rebounds to finish with a season total of 172, second to Laurentian's John McKibbon.

The loss left Queen's in 5th spot, with a 5-7 record four points behind Carleton, who suprised many by dumping Laurentian in another Friday-night encounter.

In what was a decided anti-climan to the York game, the Gaels closed out the season with a 59-69 loss to the Loyola Warriors. The Gaels played well at times in the exhibition encounter, but bad refereeing and the fact that the game meant nothing detracted from any sustained effort.

Put bluntly, some players just didn't give a damn. (In some ways, I don't blame them. The scheduling left a little to be desired.)



The Warriors had five players in double figures: John Dore, with 18, Wayne Husses, 15; Trevor Briggs, 11; and Gregg Gill and Jim McCarthy with 10 each. For Queen's, Daugulis tossed in 20 points, while Howard and Hemming added 10 apiece.

So, what happens next year? A lot depends on what if any, changes are made in the organizational end of basketball here at Queen's. There are already several Varsity-caliber ballplayers here who prefer playing in the City league and in OBA competitions to playing for Queen's.

If conditions don't get better, there may be several more joining them. Should this happen, it will make this season look awfully good.

On the other hand, if events take a positive swing, the Gaels could be a real threat next year.

If not, hope that Rob Smart is back for another try, and that he gets to play guard all year. But if things don't improve . . . .

Colin Loudin-gets hat trick vs. Western

by Bruce McLeod

Queen's hopes for a second year in the playoffs expired over the past two weekends, as they dropped their last three games. In the end, the number of key players they had lost through injury and otherwise proved too much of a handicap. The Gaels rarely showed that spark of greatness evident in their play earlier in the season.

The Gaels' last game, an 8-5 loss to Western, was a real exercise in frustration. It was one of those games when every rebound seems to end up right on an opposing player's stick. Western scored their first goal after only 7 seconds, and it was typical.

On a three on two break, Queen's defence blocked the shot from fairly close, but the puck fell just behind the defenceman's skates, and as he turned around to look for it, the Western player pounced and popped into the net.

Queen's did not play very well for the first half of the game, and the next three goals were the result of forwards being left unattended in front of the net, of having shots when they should have been knocked down, but it certainly seemed that Western could do nothing wrong.

Queen's actually had a territorial edge for much of the first half of the game, but were down 7-0 by the 9:25 mark of the second period, and it was obvious that the players were getting discouraged.

But there were a large number of the Gaels who were probably very aware that they were playing their last game in a Queen's uniform, and, although they could feel the icy hand of fate on their collective shoulder, none of the team were about to give up without a struggle.

On top of that, the luck finally began to change. Colin Loudon banked in a shot from the corner off a defenceman's stick for the first Queen's score, added another before the end of the second period and completed his hat trick at 0:43 of the third.

Bobby Kindon cleverly got a goal from the corner by deflecting it off the goalie 42 seconds later, and then Stu Lang finally scored his first of the year with a screened shot on a power play.

Furthermore, the Queen's defence stiffened, allowing only one more goal in the second half of the game, that in between Loudon's first two goals at the end of the second period.

The sparse crowd of Western fans was getting restless, as the Gaels seemed to be taking charge.

—perry

Rob Smart drives against York's Vince Santoro

But Western needed this win to finish in first place, and they didn't get there by accident. Refusing to get rattled, they settled down to a close checking game that kept the Gaels from getting any more good chances, and that's the way the game, and the season, ended for the Gaels.

Queen's had fared little better the weekend before, losing 3-1 to Guelph and 9-2 to a powerhouse U of T team. The game against Guelph was not an inspiring one, and kept the suprisingly large crowd yawning through most of the evening.

Neither team looked particularly as though they were fighting for a playoff position, and the game was decided on a couple of give-aways in the Queen's end at the beginning of the third period.

The Guelph goalie, Ken Lockett, is one of the goalies chosen for the Canadian Student Team, but the Gaels were rarely able to get through to him and test his reputatitn. The only Gael to score was (who else?) Colin Loudon, who slid a screened rebound past him that he never saw.

Even the presence of Morris Mott for the weekend's play did not help, as he was obviously tired, showing the effects of his heavy study schedule.

After seeing the Blues play the next night, it is difficult to imagine any team preventing them from retaining their Canadian College crown. Queen's actually played well, as they usually do against superior opposition, but with the shake-ups and the gaps due to injuries, they were no match for the Toronto squad.

The Blues showed discipline, speed, co-ordination and depth, as they were always in control of the play.

The Queen's goals were scored late in the second and third periods, by Norm Goulet and Bill White. Goulet, a favourite with the Queen's fans, broke out of a slump that stretched all the way back to the Gaels' first season game, against Ryerson.

For most of the game, however, Toronto's superior speed and positional play kept the Gaels completely in check, as they found it difficult to turn around without running into a blue sweater.

So the hockey season draws to a close for the Queen's team. The line was thinly drawn between being league powerhouse and league doormat this year.

But as the league improves, a team's fortunes are bound to rise and fall quickly.

The Gaels are losing a lot of veterans this year, but they still have a lot of talent left. Next year is nothing but a question mark.

Questionaire Report

The Women's Intercollegiate Athletic Committee sent out approximately two hundred and ninety intercollegiate questionnaires to all athletes and coaches of nineteen intercollegiate teams of the last three years. A little less than a third of the questionnaires were returned and following is a summary of the ideas and opinions brought forth by the athletes and coaches. The section dealing with each sport regarding practise times, competition and coaching has been compiled and discussed and will be given to each coach. The eligibility questionnaire was prompted by a request for student response from the Ontario Women's Intercollegiate Athletic Association institutions on various points.

The majority felt that there should be no academic eligibility for competing on an intercollegiate team and that it should be a conference decision. It was believed that it is the student's responsibility to assess her capabilities and to be mature enough to make the best decision. Students need a well rounded education. Those in favour of a restriction said that successful completion of the preceeding year should be a prerequisite since studies must come before sports.

Concerning the number of years a student should be allowed to compete, very few favoured a restriction of four or five years which some thought would ensure maximum participation and prevent domination of membership of a team. Five years would allow for a four years honour programme with an additional year for failure or post graduate work on Ontario College of Education. Most felt that all should have the right to play and that women don't have the same professional attitude towards sports as the men.

Likewise few thought that a restriction was necessary on the number of years of participation allowed in any one sport since the athlete's experience would help the team and she might only find one sport enjoyable. However, a similar four or five year limit would allow more young athletes to make the team, control the amount of experience on teams in the league and take the emphasis away from winning at any extreme.

The question of whether or not a student competing or training in a sport outside of the university during the intercollegiate season should be allowed to participate in that sport intercollegiately brought a great deal of response. Sixty per cent of the athletes said that these people would greatly contribute to the team, by aiding the coaching and inspiring the players, improve themselves at the level of competition and that they should be able to gain the benefits, provided they can meet all the commitments necessary. On the other hand such athletes would be creating unequal competition, splitting loyalties between teams and limiting participation by occupying a sport on two teams. It is unfair to schools situated in towns where club players are not available and the athletes should be a product of the university's coaching during the season.

Most thought that there should be no restriction on the number of intercollegiate teams an athlete may play on during the year, since it is up to the individuals to decide if they can handle it academically and physically. It is primarily a coach's decision whether or not the sports will conflict. A limit of two sports per year seemed to be a popular suggestion.

Training table meals, presently provided only for women in residence who must practise during the supper hour and who have already pre-paid their meals, were generally approved by the athletes. In addition a good number felt that those students out of residence should get a meal too since it was inconvenient to eat later and they wanted equality with the men. Others agreed that no one should be provided with meals and that such a practice is too much like remuneration for services given. Mention was also made of the expense of meals on away trips. The Committee feels that it is now more aware of the feelings of the women athletes at Queen's and at the request of a number of students the W.I.A.C. will be holding an open meeting for all team captains, coaches and interested athletes and students to discuss the questionnaire and various other items and policies. It will be held Thursday, March 2nd, in Classroom A & B, at 7:30.

Volleyballers Improve

The weekend of Feb. 18, 19 the OWIAA Volleyball championships were held at McMaster U. The top 6 teams and the bottom 6 teams played off for the Championship and Consolation titles respectively. By virtue of their win over the host team Western took the title and advanced to the National Finals.

Queen's played in the consolation round of the tournament. They won all of their matches except against Guelph. At the end of scheduled play Queen's and Guelph were tied and had to play an extra match. Queen's played an excellent match and earned the Consolation title. The win was the result of good overall team play and no individual star could be named.

Waterpolo

After a successful O.U.A.A. season last term, when they came third, the Queen's Waterpolo team has entered the Ottawa Valley Division of the Ontario Waterpolo Association.

The first two games were played in Ottawa at the Canterbury Pool on January 16th against the Pinecrest Swim Club - Queen's recording a win - lost verdict. Similar results were recorded at the Queen's Pool on Saturday, January 29th against Carleton.

On Sunday 13th February the team had its most successful outing so far, beating Canterbury at Ottawa in both games 7-3 and 5-3. There is a double header against Pinecrest at the Queen's Pool on Saturday 19th February and also a Women's Waterpolo competition between ten clubs in Ontario on 25-26th March.

Queen's Gymnasts 3rd; Mac's Mitruk Wins All

The O.U.A.A. Men's Gymnastics Championships, hosted by Queen's University in the Bartlett Gymnasium, emerged as a closely fought team battle between York and McMaster for first place.

—boon

Queen's Tim Wasiliniuk shows strain in Iron Cross move.

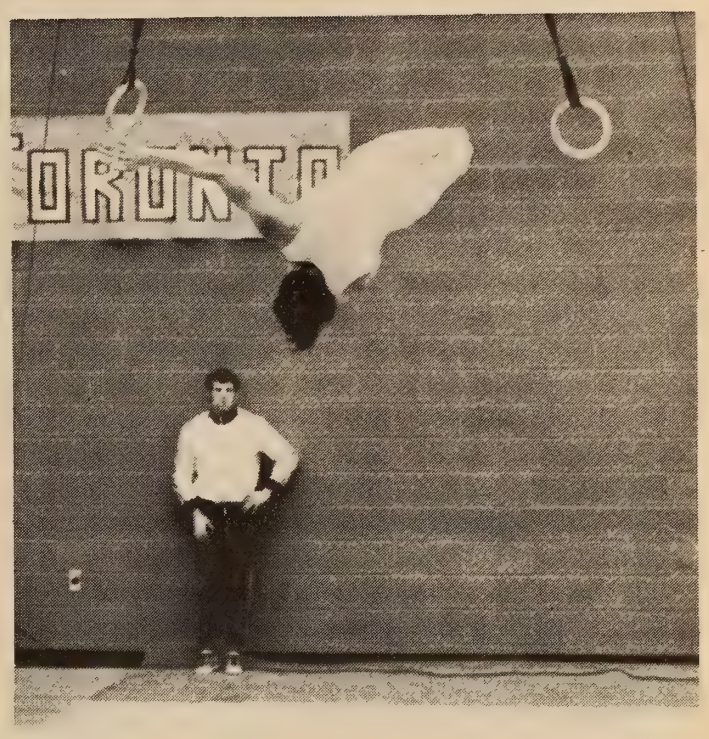
McMaster, paced by Olympic gymnast Steve Mitruk, won the O.U.A.A. West finals on February, 12 with 219 points. However, at todays's championships meet, the York Yeomen, the league's Eastern winners, emerged victorious with a score of 223.5. McMaster, with 218.3 points, placed second, while a much-improved Queen's team finished in third spot at 206.3.

Victor in the all-around competition was Steve Mitruk who, as expected, turned in dazzling routines to earn a total score of 50.45 out of a possible 60 points.

Mitruk swept four of the six events, Side Horse, Still Rings, Parallel Bars, and Horizontal Bar, while he captured second honours in Floor Exercises.

A member of Canada's Olympics '68 team and of the Canadian contingent at the 1970 World Championships in Lubljana, Yugoslavia, Mitruk was winner by a wide margin over the runner-up, York's David Hunter, who surprised most seasoned observers by relegating teammate Tom Kinsman to third place.

Hunter accumulated 47.9 points while Kinsman, a contender for Canada's 1972 Olympic squad, collected 47.3 points in the individual all-around standings. On the way to his third place finish, Kinsman copped first place in both Floor Exercises and Still Rings.



The Ontario team at the Canadian University Invitational Championships, to be held in Edmonton on March 4th, consisting of the top six all-around gymnasts, was filled out by Halmut Fink of McMaster, Colin Puffer of York, and Hans Frick of Toronto, who placed fourth, fifth and sixth respectively in the all-around standings.

On the Queen's team, Drew Strickland placed eighth all-around with a score of 41.45 while MacArthur student Tim Wasilinuik took eleventh spot with 40.05 points.

Strickland, a Kingston native, also placed third on Parallel Bars with 7.9 points, behind Mitruk of McMaster and Kinsman of York. Overall, the Queen's team's strongest event was definitely Floor Exercises, which it won.

The Queen's team, fourth last year in the old O.Q.A.A. league, earned a very respectable spot in today's meet despite this year's addition of York University.

The Tricolor squad has developed tremendous depth and consistency over the past year under the tutelage of Queen's excellent coach, Barry Brooker, and could offer a distinct challenge to McMaster and York.

Sportski at Queen's

With the gigantic Tremblant Weekend set for this weekend, March 3rd, 4th and 5th, in the northern Quebec community of St. Jovite. The most active year ever in the club's history will see 250 Queen's students take over three hotels at Mont Tremblant. The six buses required for the trip will blast out of Kingston, from Victoria Hall, at 2 p.m. on Friday and return late Sunday night.

In two years the number of skiers going to Tremblant has doubled.

The bus trip is ordinarily a long five or six hours but with most skiiers feeling "no pain" the trip should be excitingly short. On arrival the skiers will probably continue their socializing but on a quieter scale - at least with respect to the wild ride up.

John Telgmann, the President of the Queen's Ski Club, said everyone behaved in a commendable way last year with a minimum of problems. He added that the manager of Hotel St. Jovite did not require a deposit this year because he could trust the Queen's students to behave in a reasonable way.

Hotel St. Jovite will swing on Saturday night with everyone from all the hotels converging on its Bar. John said there will be a loud bustling party in the Bar Room with a band. Others who desire a more quiet and soft atmosphere will gather in various chalet rooms to sing or listen to guitars played by some of the members.

Mont Tremblant offers some of the best skiing in the East with a wide variety of slopes and trails. For example. "Sissy Schuss" is a long gentle run for beginners and the "Expo" run is a suicide run for all but the most advanced skiiers. There are over 26 runs and ten lifts.

During Reading Week 25 Ski Club members stayed at Mont Ste. Anne near Quebec City. The trip was a tremendous success for all those who went and at a cost of only $80, a comparatively cheaper skiing holiday does not exist.

The students that went this past week enjoyed one foot of deep powder snow on several runs, a cocktail party, dancing and an evening in Quebec City. One of the skiers brought his stereo and as a result Room 48 was the scene of a permanent party. A reunion is planned at the Manor some time before the end of term.

In addition to the two Ski Bashes previously held, the Ski Club is planning another one in Grant Hall, Saturday March 18th. Admission will be free and open to all.

Badminton Gals 3rd

Part III of the OWIAA Badminton round robin was held at U. of Toronto on Feb. 18-19. The Queen's girls placed third in the final accounting with 59 out of a possible 81 points. U. of Toronto took the title again this year with 69 points, but were closely followed by Waterloo U. with 65. Queen's won 28 of their 36 matches during Part III of the tournament for the best finish they have earned in several years. Last year the team finished in fifth place.

The teams consisted of six players who all played singles and doubles to make nine events. Queen's had the most individual event winners. Jane McMichael, 3rd singles; Mary Lee Robins, 5th singles; Patsy MacKimmie, 6th singles; and the Robbins-MacKimmie doubles pair all won their events for Queen's. Wendy Jenkins played in the 2nd singles position for Dianne Lougheed, who was unable to compete due to illness.

Queen's should have a strong year next year as 6 of 8 players are in first year, and all team members are expected to return.

Trackgals Sweep

The Women's Track and Field team competed in Albany N.Y. and came away with the unofficial women's team title. The relay team of Janey O'Rourke, Sue Foster, Aileen Kirby and Barb Platt completely surprised all of the American teams, winning the relay by 15 yards. The favourite team Albany, which has won the event the last three years in a row, placed second.

Janey O'Rourke ran her best race ever in the 60 yd dash, missing 1st place by inches. Still Janey placed 2nd and broke a Queen's all-time record in the 60 yd dash in 8.1 sec.

Queen's had three competitors in the mile. Barb Platt placed fourth setting a Queen's record of 6:16.0. The Calgary flash, Kirby, placed fifth with a personal best of 6:21 and Sue Foster was seventh in 6:30.

The Women's best sprinter Irene Harris did not compete, unfortunately; if she had Queen's would have dominated the meet.

The next meet will be the OUAA Men's and Women's championships. With the strong showing at Albany the women have a good chance of winning the Women's title.

OTTAWA—In an unprecedented crackdown on legal drugs, the federal health department Thursday virtually banned amphetamines, which are being taken by millions of Canadians as a stimulant and for diet control.

Last year in Canada, 19,200,000 prescriptions were filled for amphetamines—which are also manufactured illegally and sold as "speed."

But after Sept. 1—when physicians will have had time to ease patients off the drugs, or on to new ones—amphetamines can be legally prescribed only for the treatment of two relatively rare childhood illnesses, and then only with health department permission.

At the same time Thursday, Health Minister John Munro announced similar clamps on the use of methadone, a synthetic drug used in the treatment of heroin addiction.

After June 1, Munro's department will insist that only authorized physicians, operating through specialized clinics, be able to prescribe the drug after getting permission from Ottawa.

TORONTO—More than 50 per cent of Ontario's homeowners, tenants and roomers are expected to benefit under the new property tax credit scheme announced Wednesday by Provincial Treasurer Darcy McKeough.

The benefits will come in the form of a deduction from federal income tax or as a direct payment to those whose income is too small to pay taxes, McKeough said.

The cost of increasing benefits for low income persons will be picked up by those in income brackets over $15,000, while those in the middle range between $8,000 and $15,000, will receive about the same amount as under the old Provincial Basic Shelter Exemption program that the new scheme replaces.

McKeough announced the agreement with Ottawa Wednesday, and said he saw it as a breakthrough on the way to some form of guaranteed income that would eventually end "the welfare jungle."

He suggested to a federal-provincial conference last November the tax benefit should consist of a flat $100 for the tax filer, plus 10 per cent of actual property taxes paid minus 1 per cent on taxable income.

TORONTO—Douglas Wright has resigned as chairman of the Commission on Post-Secondary Education in Ontario, which recently released an interim report calling for a major overhaul of higher education.

Mr. Wright will continue as a member of the body.

The new chairman is David O. Davis, 67, of Ancaster, a member of the commission since its start.

A statement issued Wednesday by Premier William Davis said Mr. Wright asked to resign "in light of his new and added responsibilities as deputy provincial secretary for social devolopment". In this job he is responsible for co-ordinating Ontario's education policy.

SAULT STE. MARIE—Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau described abortion as "an act of destruction" Thursday night and said he personally would never support the demands of Women's Liberation movements for abortion on demand.

Trudeau was replying at a public meeting here to a question from Rosalie Gardezi, who identified herself as a supporter of abortion on demand and led a Women's Liberation group to the meeting. Trudeau began a two-day tour of northern Ontario Thursday.

"I don't know if your slogan is free abortion on demand . . .but quite frankly it is not mine," the Prime Minister said.

"If you want me to vote that way (for abortion on demand)," he said, "you will have to convince me that a person who asked for an abortion has no responsibility at all.

"You know at some point you are killing life in the fetus,whether it is after three months or eight months.

"At some points an abortion is killing."

"All killing is not illegal and is not immoral, Trudeau said. "You know, in some countries they hang people and it's legal and it's justified by morality. In war you kill people. You kill people in self defence.

"So I'm not shocked by the idea of killing," he said. "But when there is the benefit of the doubt, my doubt is on the side of life against death."

LONDON, Ont—A London psychologist who works with drug users has condemned a citizens' committee plan to offer up to $500 reward for information leading to the conviction of heroin pushers as a regressive step that will result in more drug crime.

Dr. Mario Faveri, chairman of both the Board of Education task force on drugs and the London drug treatment network, said the plan "may curtail the number of pushers but will not solve the drug problem. It will reduce the supply and the prices will rise, and crime will increase."

He said the suspiciousness and paranoia created in the drug sub-culture "will make our treatment effort more difficult."

"The bounty hunter approach is morally repugnant" Feberi added.

OTTAWA—The federal government intends to screen, and perhaps block, the proposed takeover of major Canadian firms by foreign interests, according to a secret cabinet document.

The document says the government will screen takeovers of firms "above a certain size" but the cabinet has not yet decided what ground rules will govern its program to regulate foreign investment in Canada.

The secret document was submitted to Cabinet Feb. 14 by Revenue Minister Herbert Gray who is responsible for foreign ownership policy.

It reveals that Gray wanted to announce this week or next the cabinet's decision last November to control takeovers of Canadian companies by foreign interests. But cabinet apparently overruled him and decided to delay the announcement until supporting studies are ready—probably in April.

The document also shows that:

—Measures are needed to prevent a rash of takeovers in the weeks before the screening agency is set up.

But it shows that the cabinet still has a lot of work to do in deciding the legal status of the screening agency and the criteria it should use to evaluate foreign investment, penalties available to enforce its decisions, and even the definitions of "takeover" and "foreign-controlled."

DANBURY, Conn. Exclaiming "terrific, I'm free," Rev. Daniel J. Berrigan walked out of federal prison here Thursday after serving two years and three months of a three-year term for burning draft records.

Berrigan, 51 who vowed to continue working to end the Viet Nam war, was cheered by about 200 placord-waving supporters.

LONDON—An unofficial guide to what the thinking Russian really thinks about his country's problems was published in London Thursday. The book, Uncensored Russia, tells of growing pressure against the Government.

The editor and translator, Peter Reddaway, a lecturer at the London School of Economics, believes the documents he uses describe nothing less than "the first broad if loosely organized movement of dissent in the USSR for almost half a century."

The book recounts the arrests, trials and sentences of 102 dissidents, among them scientists, teachers, writers, even military men. Their crimes were to criticize and sometimes to demonstrate against what they saw as illegal acts by the Soviet authorities, from suppression of artistic or religious freedom to the invasion of Czechoslovakia.

WASHINGTON—The Senate, in a rebuff to the leaders of both the Democrats and Republicans, voted Friday to strip all federal courts of power to order student busing in school desegregation cases.

By a vote of 43 to 40, the Senate adopted an amendment by Senator Robert Griffin (R—Mich.) that went beyond any previous step taken against busing to achieve racial balance in schools.

However, Senate leaders were optimistic that they might be able to reverse the vote next week.

THE WORLD

UNITED NATIONS—A $3 million advance payment by China has helped avert a financial collapse of the world organization, sources said Thursday.

The downpayment by China against its assessment of $7 million for 1972 put Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim's appeal for $20 million over the top. The money was needed to meet current payrolls and running expenses.

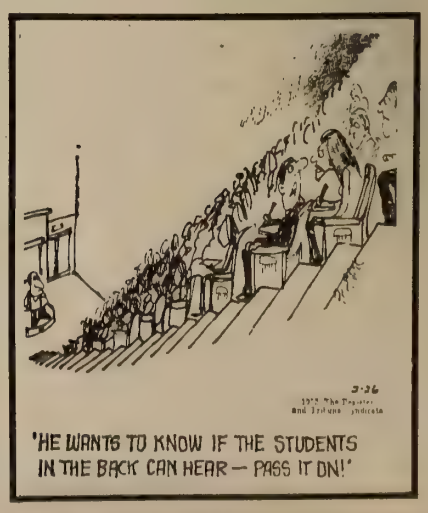
To date nothing has been advanced by the Soviet Union, which is required to pay $29 million toward the cost of running the UN this year.

LONDON—Britain's 280,000 coal miners Friday ended their country-wide strike, voting overwhelmingly to go back to work on Monday.

The men voted by a margin of more than 27-to-1 to accept the 20 per cent pay increase from the state-run National Coal Board.

WASHINGTON—There will be no progress toward a total ban on nuclear testing when negotiations resume next week because of U.S. insistence on a point that is no longer of major significance, Government sources acknowledge.

Although conceding that onsite inspection in the Soviet Union is of no more than marginal importance in detecting violations of a test ban treaty, the officials say there will be no compromise of this U.S. demand.



HANGCHOW,China—President Richard Nixon of the United States and Premier Chou En-lai of China have reached "basic agreement" in talks designed to end more than 20 years of bitter division between their countries, Ronald Ziegler, Nixon's press secretary, announced Saturday.

Ziegler declined to give any clues about the accord, but said details would be revealed in a communique to be issued Sunday when the two leaders are visiting Shanghai.

Officials indicated the communique would list steps for governmental contact below the level of formal diplomatic relations; cultural exchanges; increased trade; and a pledge to co-operate in reducing tension in Asia.

Triennial letter explains Dunning Trust background

RIGHT: The Hon. Charles Avery Dunning, chancellor of Queen's for many years; from an oil painting by Lilias Torrance Newton, now hanging in Dunning Hall; courtesy Alumni Association.

Queen's Journal

Vol. XCIX, No. 54 Fri., Mar. 3, 1972

Queen's University
February 21, 1972.

Every three years the University is requested to read the letter from the anonymous donor establishing the Dunning Trust and to decide in the light of the existing conditions how best to use the income over the next three years, with the understanding that the letter plus the decision by the Board of Trustees shall be published in the student newspaper. The letter mentioned above reads as follows:

To the Principal and Vice-Chancellor of Queen's University.

I desire to establish at Queen's University a permanent tribute to your Chancellor, Honourable Charles A. Dunning, in the hope that the inspiration of a life of public service will help future students to do their part in service to humanity.

To this end, I am enclosing a cheque for $100,000 payable to "Queen's University Endowment Fund" and request that the University accept the following obligations with regard thereto:

1. That the donation shall be treated with absolute confidence as anonymous;
2. That it be called the "Chancellor Dunning Trust";
3. That once in every three years the Trustees of Queen's University read this letter and decide, in the light of the then existing conditions, how best the income from the trust may be expended to promote understanding and appreciation of the supreme importance of the dignity, freedom and responsibility of the individual person in human society - and shall publish this memorandum, together with their decision, in the students' newspaper.

"Anonymous"
Friend of Chancellor Dunning.

2 October, 1946.

The letter was previously read to the Board on October 10, 1968, and a decision made at that time for the use of the Trust for the three-year period ending in 1971.

The letter was read again at the Board of Trustees meeting on October 15-16, 1971. The Board reserved its decision in order to give the Dunning Trust Committee an opportunity to seek out suggestions for the use of the income and to present recommendations to the Board. The Committee on Fine Arts and Public Lectures published a position paper designed to elicit the views of the University community which was published in the Queen's Gazette on January 5 and in the Queen's Journal on January 28, with a request for oral and written comments. The following report and recommendations of the Dunning Trust Committee was presented to the Board of Trustees on February 11-12, 1972:

"The Committee believes that the terms of the Dunning Trust can be met most effectively by allowing members of the University the opportunity to interact with distinguished men and women having a deep interest in a problem or problems which should concern the academic community. An attempt has been made to emphasize equally the topic and the speakers and to insist on extended visits so that speakers may be seen and questioned in several forums.

"The 1971-72 program has been concerned with the role of university education. Lord Bowden spent four days on campus in October. His main address concerned university education in Europe and America, but in several of his seminars he laid stress on the problems of education in the developing nations. This last theme will be picked up next week by Dr. Robert Baffour of Ghana, a former vice chancellor of the technical university at Kumasi, and an engineer of international standard. Dr. Baffour will be with us for five days, and will speak to two groups in medicine, and one each in geography, sociology, psychology, chemistry and mechanical engineering, as well as meeting informally with such groups as the Graduate Student Society and the heads of engineering departments. His main lecture will be on Wednesday evening.

"We are already committed to a 1972-73 program involving those attitudes of our society which underlie the deterioration of the environment. Participants are Dr. Garrett Hardin, a biologist from the University of California; Mr. Ian McHarg, a Scottish landscape architect now head of the Department of Landscape Architecture and Regional Planning at the University of Pennsylvania; and Raymond Moriyama, the Toronto architect and chairman of the Task Force concerned with ecological factors in mid-Canada Development. By having these men of diverse background here simultaneously for four days, the Committee hopes to add a new dimension to the Dunning Trust in promoting constructive interaction among the participants on various aspects of the topic. While this is valuable in itself, the opportunity it provides to members of the university to observe and perhaps to participate is outstanding.

"We are in the process of developing, on a similar format, the program for 1973-74. It will be concerned with unrealizable expectations in the world today. Already invited is Mr Raoult Prebisch, an Argeninian who has worked for many years in the U.N. on social problems. John Kenneth Galbraith, Maurice Strong and Sir Macfarlane Burnet are being considered."

The Board of Trustees approved in principle the proposals for the use of the Dunning Trust for the three-year period ending in 1973-74 with the proviso that the Committee take steps to seek out additional suggestions from the University community for the use of the Dunning Trust in the future.

John W. Bannister,
Secretary of the University.

Meds pick leaders

The Aesculapian Society has announced the names of the executive which will govern medical students for 1972-73.

President will be Bob Reid. Other officers are Murray Girotti (vice-president); Sarah Pritchard (vice-president for external affairs); John Moorhead (secretary); Ian Richardson (treasurer); Andy Pipe (senior AMS rep); Alan Cruess (junior AMS rep); Cathy Tait (public relations officer); Ren Mann (athletic stick).

In a statement, Reid said his policy would be threefold: "First, to expand essential services to medical students, to establish in addition to social and sports activities, a more unified student voice in matters relating to curriculum and course evaluation. Second, to create an awareness among society members of how their money is divided up for financing the existing services and to allow them an increasing voice in modifying the emphasis of these expenditures. Third, to play an increasing role in functions on the university level in this centennial year of the Aesculapian Society."

AMS committee report on campus bookstores

This is a reply by a committee of the Alma Mater Society to the working paper "Task Force on the Role and Operation of a Bookstore or Bookstores at Queen's University - An Interim Report", and it will deal only with the sections entitled "The Alternatives" and "Operating Practices and Procedures". We have made no attempt to review critically the first parts of the report, the informational sections dealing with history and research as we feel we lack the competence in this short time to do any testing of the material in this section. To deal with last things first, or to start with immediate problems and then talk about longer term issues, we will start by commenting on the improvements suggested in the section entitled "Operating Practices and Procedures" of Technical Supplies.

We agree with all the recommendations in the first subsection dealing with the ordering of texts, but we think that there should be an explicit recommendation that the order form circulated by Technical Supplies be revised so as to facilitate the implemendation of the other seven recommendations in this section. We feel that a new or revised order form is implicitly required by the recommendations, but that this should be explicitly stated.

The recommendations in the next two subsections -"The September Crush" and "The Bookstore and the Library" will have many longer term benefits, and we feel that they should be implemented immediately. One small point that should be noted concerning Recommendation 10 is that if a new expanded bookstore is placed in the University Centre Complex, the need for rush space in the Complex might be overcome by a more judicious use of space in the bookstore itself, which would revert to normal bookstore usage afterwards, rather than using up much needed common space for these periods. Also it is likely that most common space that would exist in the University Centre would be unsuitable to the kind of security needed for a large amount of stock. Extended hours of operation in the main store and in the rush space should be considered as well.

The recommendations in subsection IV of this section seem to us to be so logical that it is unfortunate that they had to be recommended at all. We wholeheartedly agree with them, and further suggest that the spirit of these recommendations be followed in any new management and financial superstructure.

Subsection V dealing with second hand books seems to us to be one of the most useful suggestions in this section. We believe that these recommendations would accomplish two things. They will supply a source of inexpensive books for students who are either building their personal libraries or only use books for a short time on a once over basis. It will also be a source of revenue for students who wish to sell books. Both of these ends are critical in these days of tight money, higher costs of living and higher costs of education. We believe that every effort should be made to implement Recommendation 19 immediately.

We believe that the last subsection, dealing with packaged course materials, is useful but does not go far enough. Technical Supplies should be able to update and expand this type of service as the demand increases, as we believe it will.

To summarize our feelings on this section, we believe that these recommendations with the aforementioned additions and qualifications should be implemented as soon as possible, that is, the Senate should endorse these as policies immediately so that they will be implemented for the next academic year.

In dealing with the section entitled "The Alternatives", we must first state that we are speaking as students, by far the most important group of customers of a campus bookstore. That is to say, that we have not concerned ourselves with the means of implementation of the recommendations. We have taken the view that we should present what we would like to see, and why, with only a cursory look at the practical problems of implementation. We fully realize that any actual practical constraints on these proposals will necessarily modify them.

The Committee agreed that the bookstore which should be sought for Queen's University was best outlined in the second proposal entitled "A Comprehensive Bookstore". A minority thought that the end result should be alternative III, "Limited Bookstore". The committee agreed that Recommendation III should be an interim measure as a means of progressing towards the comprehensive bookstore that Queen's needs and deserves.

The route we saw to a comprehensive bookstore goes like this. Take Technical supplies as it is now (with the immediate changes as mentioned earlier) and expand it in Clark Hall to the services outlined as "A Limited Bookstore" (Alternative III) as soon as possible. This expanded store should then work towards a smooth transition to "A Comprehensive Bookstore" (Alternative II) as soon as possible after it is able to move into the University Centre. We wish to emphasize that the Alma Mater Society wants a comprehensive bookstore for Queen's which would satisfy the needs of the Queen's Community.

We also believe that the space for the bookstore in the University Centre should be built unfinished at the expense of the University Centre Funds, and that the cost of finishing this space should be born over a suitable period of time by the bookstore with money loaned by the University at the best possible rates.

We accept the fact that this proposal will necessitate the reduction or elimination of discounts on books much as has been outlined in the Interim Report. We also appreciate the necessity and desirability of having other goods for sale to offset the overhead which can not be derived from book sales. We do not see this so much as competition with local business as giving Queen's University and indeed Kingston, the solid, comprehensive bookstore which they presently lack.

The Committee does not believe that there should be a differential price structure for textbooks and supplementary academic books, as they have been defined in the Interim Report. Because books of both kinds are essential for university education we do not believe that students who primarily use "textbooks" should be subsidized by those who do not It should be noted that this position is not consistent with the Interim Report.

We do not think that it is desirable to create a massive variety store either in the bookstore itself or as a supporting subsidiary but rather that these "profit-makers" be of the type of convenience items often found in bookstores, such as greeting cards, gifts, records, etc., or of such university related items as Queen's jewelry, sweatshirts, T-shirts, mugs, etc A full line of stationary, writing, drafting and technical supplies should be retained and in some cases expanded.

Thus we believe that the Task Force should recommend the creation of the "Comprehensive Bookstore" which will serve the Queen's Community (and thus Kingston) as befits a great academic and learning institution, with the amount and kind of "competitive" merchandise carried with discretion so as to make the store a break-even venture selling books at "reasonable" prices.

The last section to be dealt with is that on "Management and Financial Superstructures". The committee agreed that the alternative of a University-owned bookstore would best serve the interests of the Queen's Community. The financial umbrella of the University would provide security and stability and might provide real savings to the customers of the bookstore. However, we want to see student control of the management of the store and this could be achieved by some kind of management board legally responsible to the University but with as much independance as possible. This management board should consist of students, faculty, and University representatives, but with a student majority. It would be responsible for all aspects of running the bookstore. It would have sub-committees dealing directly with such areas as general management, public relations, and policies regarding the buying and pricing of books. These sub-committees could have on them students, faculty, University representatives and the appropriate employees of the bookstore.

This report is submitted and endorsed by the Alma Mater Society Outer Council which is the only body which speaks on behalf of all students at Queen's. Because students are the major customers of a campus bookstore, we trust that this report will be given serious consideration by the Task Force.

Bradley era ends; concert fee is made optional

The $3 concert fee will be optional next year, as a result of a decision made quickly at Tuesday night's annual general meeting of the AMS.

The meeting observed carefully the tradition that annual general meetings should spice up the routine business with one item of substance. This year it was the concert fee. A proposal introduced by graduate student rep Graham Millington, and seconded by retiring arts and science president Marv Bloos, was that students be allowed to opt out of the $3 fee on request before October 15 each fall.

A similar arrangement has existed for two years with the $4 Tricolor yearbook fee.

There was a brief discussion in which some speakers said students should be able to get a fee refund -- and waive their rights to cheaper concert tickets -- after hearing that AMS concerts were planned for the year. Others said they should have to decide based on their feelings about subsidized concerts in general, without hearing what specific concerts would be held.

The proposal passed easily.

Routine business at the annual meeting included the election of directors for the AMS, Incorporated -- the company which takes legal responsibility for what the AMS does.

They will be incoming president and vice-president Greg LeBlanc and Wally Palmer, and perennial meds rep Andy Pipe.

Retiring president Patrick Riley gave a brief speech, commenting on what the AMS had done during the year -- "it was more fun than I thought it was going to be." The five retiring commissioners also reported on their progress during the year.

Riley and vice-president Victor Bradley commented on the importance of two AMS studies now going on: about the Wright Commission report on Ontario post-secondary education, and about bookstore proposals for Queen's.

The meeting concluded, as usual, with the installation of the incoming president and vice-president. Riley, retiring, borrowed the gavel from speaker Paul Kennedy, who was chairing the meeting, and handed it to LeBlanc to prolonged applause. A moment later, Bradley produced greater applause by tossing a jangling keychain to his successor.

There were 77 people at the meeting, including three who responded when services commissioner Glenn Hall asked for all the "ordinary students" to show themselves.

Constables' role is discussed as old AMS council retires

It was parliamentary procedure and constables when the AMS held its transitional outer council meeting Monday night in Stirling Hall.

Retiring outer council members initiated their successors with one of the most confused meetings within memory. The longest discussion was on AMS constable policy, brought up in the report of a committee studying how the AMS is affected by the new university disciplinary rules.

A long argument raged over by-law amendments, and particularly over the rule that alcoholic beverages are not allowed in the stadium and the phys ed centre. Constables should not be used to enforce provincial laws, arts and science president Marv Bloos insisted; he said what should be forbidden is not alcohol but "Bottles and sharp objects" which might be thrown.

There was some disagreement, including a comment by dean of student affairs Dr. I. Stewart Webster: "People drinking Coca-Cola do not generally throw the bottles at each other."

After much discussion of the precise role of the constables, a motion to have a committee study the matter was defeated on a tie vote. (The confusion of the meeting can be gauged from the fact that artsci rep Gary Gannage, who had opposed the motion, tried to ask for a recount after it failed.)

The amendments brought forward, and eventually carried, included one change from last week: constables will not be compulsory at social events unless the chief constable or the event's organizers want them there.

The meeting also passed, on the first of three readings, a constitution for its concert committee, which met with strong opposition from present members of the committee -- notably education rep Anne Merrick -- and from grad rep Doug Pritchard, who said it was not explicit enough to guide the committee's behaviour. Improvements in detail were promised before second reading.

Concert committee chairman John Green also raised the question of selling beer at concerts, which he said had been proposed for the Lighthouse concert March 3. Vice-president Victor Bradley said the idea had been turned down by an emergency inner council meeting, but that "those people that are going to bring booze, are going to bring booze. We shouldn't necessarily worry about it."

A financial statement presented at the meeting showed that Snowball this year made a $283 profit, rather than the $1200 loss expected.

Education representative Anne Merrick complained to the meeting that the three education reps had not been invited to the weekend retreat planned for this weekend for members of the new outer council. She said education reps serve from September to September, and therefore are members of the new council for more than half a year. (A later decision permits them to go to the retreat.)

Queen's Entertainment Agency director Dave Merrick was granted a special honorarium payment of $100. A by-law amendment to make such a payment automatic in future years was given first reading.

As the most important items on the agenda, president Pat Riley and vice-president Victor Bradley presented draft reports on the Wright Commission proposals and on Queen's bookstore facilities. The bookstore report was approved by the outer council; consideration of the Wright Commission comment was postponed to the weekend retreat.

Finally, the AMS approved a $500 grant to buy sapling trees for Macdonald Park and the central campus.

QUEEN'S UNIVERSITY
PARKING REGULATIONS

Over the past several months a great deal of vandalism has occurred in the parking garage under the Jock Harty Arena. Damage to the building and fixtures and to automobiles has reached an unacceptable level. In order to prevent further damage, security gates have been installed on all entrances to the garage: these gates will be closed and locked each working day at 6.00 p.m. effective Monday Mar. 6, 1972. They will be reopened at 7.00 a.m. the following day. Permit holders who use this parking facility should ensure that their vehicles are removed prior to the closing hour.

The garage will remain closed on Saturdays, Sundays and statutory holidays.

World's motor conks out, Federalist claims

By Bob Mutrie

"The World Federalist Organization is working toward a stronger, more effective United Nations" Dr. Allan G. Newcombe, executive officer of the Canadian branch stated Tuesday.

The World Federalist movement is an international peace organization with members in 43 countries around the world.

"We are ships of state drifting along the Niagara River above the falls with our motor conked out. No one reacts until the waves begin to become rough and by then it is too late", he said.

Dr. Newcombe suggested that the United Nations must stop talking and start reacting to world events.

"With the United Nations charter presently under revision, the World Federalists have taken an active interest in the organization. By changing just one rule of the game, a world of hostility could become civilized," he said.

The present U.N. charter, Newcombe commented was framed in a pre-nuclear age, when only the United States, Britain and Canada were aware of the Atomic bomb. Consequently, it is far out of date.

He said, "the World Federalists have put forward several detailed briefs on charter reform.

"One brief deals exclusively with revision of the voting system. The present system of one nation - one vote does not give nations proportionate representation. At present it is possible for a proposal to pass in the U.N. by only a very small proportion of the World's population.

"The World Federalists have suggested a weighted system based on population and energy consumption," he said. Energy is measured using the standard watt all over the world. This would give the United States, China, the USSR, India and the United Kingdom the greatest number of votes.

Another proposal, still in draft form, Newcombe remarked is to base U.N. dues on a multilateral scale in which the target figure would be 1 per cent of the world's GNP.

Dr. Newcombe commented that copies of these briefs are being sent out to every Canadian MP. One hundred and fifty members of parliament belong to the organization.

Newcombe also urged world togetherness on the pollution question. "Ontario is not polluting the Great Lakes as much as the United States but we have no binding means of enforcing an end to it." He called for paper companies to follow Sweden's lead and install anti-pollution facilities even at the cost of becoming less competitive.

Dr. Newcombe is also North American chairman of the World Mondialization Committee, a branch of the Federalists aimed at creating international cities.

The committee teams up willing cities and towns with a twin in another country, he said. "It opens a locked door, encouraging people to look outward," he stated and pointed out that it has proven to be an effective force in broadening attitudes.

He said, "Halifax and Dartmouth in Nova Scotia, Rock Island in Quebec, Ottawa, Toronto, Oakville, Hamilton, Dundas and St. Catharines in Ontario and Victoria in B.C., have mondialized.

Newcombe headed the committee for the mondialization of Dundas and has travelled all over North America starting committees in various cities.

Dundas' twin is Kogs, Japan and there have already been two exchanges at the public school level.

Newcombe commented that the World Federalists of Canada have applied to the Canadian International Development Assn. for a grant to carry their work on a larger scale.

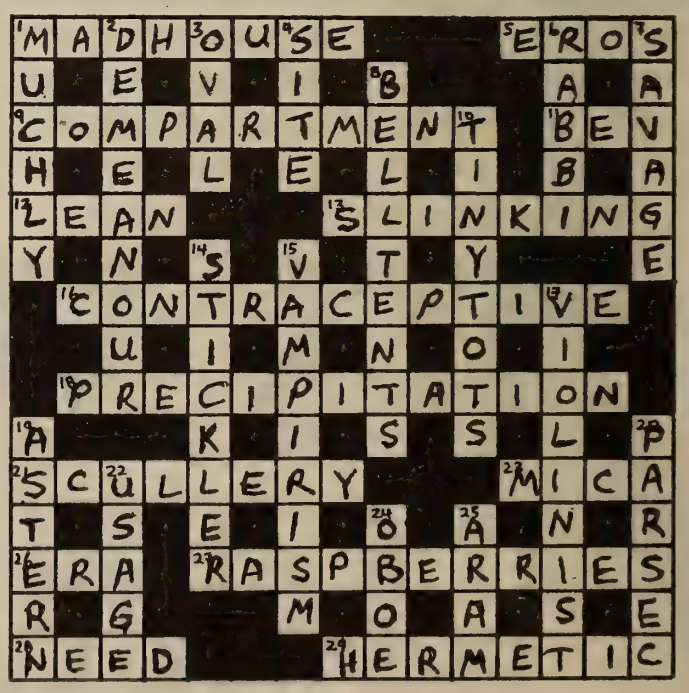
V. I. John, Professor of Electrical Engineering told the Journal that he has been taking an active part on a 22 member committee for the mondialization of Kingston. "We have made some contacts and are considering Kingston, Jamaica as our twin", he said.

"For a city to mondialize, it must have general community support and the approval of city council. We are looking for mondialization by 1973, the city's 300th anniversary", he said.

Night lockup at garage

The parking garage under the Jock Harty Arena will be locked at night beginning some time next week.

The action is the result of "an unacceptable level of vandalism', parking coordinator R. I. Luker told The Journal Tuesday.



He said that when entrance gates are completed they will be closed from 6 p.m. to 7 a.m. every night, and on weekends and holidays.

Vandalism has been occurring to the building, its fixtures, and the cars parked there, Luker said.

Kingston fire chief Warren Gibson recommended last fall that the garage be closed or a watchman be posted, after a number of false fire alarms and episodes of vandalism were caused by Kingston children playing in the garage at night.

There have been no fire alarms recently, Luker said.

Cleansing the windows of perception

Transcendental Meditation

by J.M. MacKenzie and Gregg Wilson

"If the windows of our perception were cleansed, we would see infinity stretching in every direction."

In this passage, William Blake displays an intuition of ultimate reality shared by philosophers and poets since the time of Plato. Their frustrating inability to perceive clearly this universal meaning hovering just beyond their grasp, in fact, might be considered as a basic theme underlying much of the world's great literature. This clear vision of the Absolute, however, can now be attained by all men. So proclaims Maharishi Mahesh Yogi, the Indian philosopher and teacher, who has travelled worldwide in the past fourteen years, spreading transcendental meditation.

If one were to consider such teaching as exotic or "Swami stuff" and thus not worthy of serious consideration, he would not be alone. Such skepticism, though, does not trouble Maharishi. This technique, he asserts, is natural and requires no irrational belief or "cultism". Meditation is for everyday people with normal disappointments, frustrations, joys and ambitions.

Transcendental meditation, or "TM", as it is commonly known, received widespread journalistic attention in 1967 with the famous voyages to Rishikesh, Maharishi's headquarters, by well-known personalities such as the Beatles and Mia Farrow. Since that time this notoriety has largely died down while serious scientific interest has increased markedly. Quietly and steadily TM has reached around the globe and in the past six years alone, has claimed over 100,000 initiates in North America.

Students from all walks of life, young and old, "straight" and "hip" have discovered a new existence with transcendental meditation. In addition, scientists, philosophers, educationalists and youth counsellors throughout the western world are expressing keen interest in this technique inherited from ancient Vedic tradition. Careful physiological studies have also been conducted, with results tending to confirm that the meditator achieves a "transcental", fourth major state of consciousness, differing markedly from waking, dreaming, deep sleep or hypnotic trance.

Most westerners regard meditation as an exotic eastern religious practice. It is true that for centuries Zen Buddhist monks in Japan and Hindu yogis in India have been engaging in and refining sophisticated meditational techniques. In recent years, however, there has been a quickening western interest in Oriental philosophies and a growing awareness that our materialistic industrial society may benefit greatly from this ancient learning.

Transcendental meditation springs from rich Himalayan traditions, but it is a common sense approach to many problems besetting twentieth century mankind. It might be described as a "no muss, no fuss' technique for modern living, requiring no ceremony, garments, incense, complex positions or esoteric jargon. It is different from all other methods of mind-control or physical manipulation involving concentration, contemplation, discipline or extensive training.

A simple, natural process, TM involves the progressive refinement of the nervous system through the regular alternation of deep rest and activity. In other words, postulates Maharishi, just as sleep and dreaming are required to relieve certain stresses and fatigue, so transcendental meditation is essential for relief of deep rooted stresses in the nervous system. It relaxes and rejuvenates both body and mind.

This energizing effect of meditation is explicable in light of Maharishi's view of the universe in which he sees all things striving for fulfilment. One aspect of this general principle is the natural tendency of the mind, or the attention, to move in the direction of greater satisfaction. Thi physiological state. As reported in such publications as Scientific American (February 1972), Time (October 25, 1971) and Science (March 27, 1970), these studies indicate that bodily changes occurring during meditation differ markedly from those observed during the other major states of consciousness such as waking, dreaming and sleeping as well as such "altered states" as hypnosis and auto-suggestion.

While these studies are relatively recent, for many years the concept of "higher" states of consciousness which might occur during meditation and which possibly could relieve physical and mental stresses has been postulated. Researchers, however, have been hindered by the difficulties in finding expert meditators and measuring physiological changes without interrupting the meditation. Studies among yogic meditators in India and Zen monks in Japan have produced results showing consistent and significant physiological changes and have suggested the possibility of a physiologically unique state of consciousness.

With the spread of transcendental meditation in North America, many thousands of subjects became available for such research. Furthermore, since the technique was claimed to be natural, requiring no concentration, contemplation or control, meditation could be carried on despite the array of instruments and electrodes affixed to the subject's body.

Profound Relaxation - Fully Active Mind

The observations reported by recent researchers are interesting and impressive. While the subjects were normal individuals with only a three-month to three-year experience in meditation, the results in some cases were similar to those recorded on expert Japanese Zen monks with over twenty-five years practice.

Dr. Herbert Benson and R. K. Wallace of the Harvard Medical School, in a current Scientific American article, write that the quality of rest in twenty minutes of meditation is much more profound than that gained in a full eight hours of sleep. While oxygen consumption during deep sleep, for example, decreases only about 15 per cent, during meditation it drops almost 80 per cent - a condition incompatible with life in any other state of consciousness. Even in deep hypnotic sleep the decrease is only negligible.A slight fall in blood pressure and an average decrease of five beats per minute in heart beat were also observed by these scientists. In addition, the marked fall in blood lactate level during meditation is apparently very significant. Since an increase in lactic acid accompanies anxiety symptoms and muscular activity, this particular change may cause a deep muscular relacation and reduction of anxiety.

Perhaps the most dramatic observation, notes Wallace, is the 500 per cent increase in electrical skin resistance as compared with the average 50 per cent increase during deep sleep and the negligible change during hypnotic trances. This indicates lowered perspiration activity and thus a definite fall in physical tension. Another interesting phenomenon recorded was the peculiar encephalographic pattern of subject brain waves: the alpha rhythm present in all subjects at rest increased in regularity and amplitude, even stopping in some cases from two to five minutes, to be replaced by low voltage theta waves.

These results tend to confirm the subjective experiences of many meditators and show indeed that the mind is fully conscious despite the profound rest experienced by the entire nervous system. The transcendental state clearly differs markedly from other states or altered states of consciousness and from other meditative techniques requiring control and thus imposing stresses and strains on the mind. Wallace has suggested, in fact, that perhaps in such meditation, ancient Hindu yogis discovered or stumbled upon a form of human "hibernation", a milder form of the winter sleep of animals.

Clinical and Other Practical Applications

The primary benefits of transcendental meditation for the individual have been discussed above. Modern researchers, in additon, foresee clinical applications of the technique in the treatment of hypertension and certain diseases during which extended periods of low oxygen consumption simultaneous with responsive mental activity would be very useful. It has also been suggested that transcendental meditation could be utilized successfully during extended space travel.

The most significant side-effect of TM, however, and that which has attracted the attention of medical, educational and legislative groups in Canada and the United States, is its proven value in alleviating drug abuse. In a recent report, the LeDain Commission on Non-Medical Use of Drugs notes that following regular practice of meditation, subjects report that the drug experience becomes distasteful. Moreover alcohol, caffeine and tobacco dependencies also tend to decrease or disappear after several months of meditating.

The technique appears to be acceptable to drug users among North American university communities because it is offered as a program for personal development and is not specifically intended to be a treatment for drug abuse. Transcendental meditation enables the subject to experience "mind-expansion" but does not threaten the beliefs of committed users who condone the use of drugs. "Try a 'natural' high", ask the thousands of young people who have turned away from artificial stimulants.

In a recent Time article, Dr. Benson remained cautious about TM's value to addicts. The studies conducted by him and his colleagues were "biased" he noted, since they had reported only on people who had learned meditation and continued to practise it. He agreed with the LeDain Commission though, that such results definitely merited further careful investigation.

The role of meditation in alleviating drug abuse has naturally impressed Boards of Education and youth counselling services throughout the nation. Furthermore, the increased motivation and higher academic success levels among secondary and post-secondary students, attributable to regular meditation has also attracted the attention of these authorities. The Department of Health and Welfare, for example, has expressed keen interest in transcendental meditation during recent months, especially following the January publication of the LeDain Commission report. School boards in British Coumbia and Ontario are considering the success achieved following the introduction of the Science of Creative Intelligence, the educational application of transcendental meditation, into the secondary school system in Eastchester, New York. A similar pilot project, in fact, has been approved by the North York Board of Education, one of the most progressive school systems in Canada.

Transcendental meditation has drawn federal support also through the Opportunities for Youth programme. In the summer of 1971, a grant of $3,000 was provided to a group of young meditators in Richmond, B.C. Their report, entitled Insight into the Richmond Community, surveyed the effect of this "new educational technique" on recently initiated students of TM. It is expected that applications will be submitted for further studies during the coming summer.

Transcendental Meditation for Students

The results of both the Richmond study and the Eastchester project clearly indicate the value of transcendental meditation to high school and university students. The technique, bringing profound relaxation, yet requiring only a short period of time each day, is eminently suited to the academic life with its constant tensions and demands upon the intellect. Through the Students International Meditation Society (SIMS), transcendental meditation has been introduced at hundreds of universities throughout the western world. Not only does the technique produce increased energy and efficiency in the performance of any work, but also, it is reported, it aids in the mobilization of all bodily resources to combat such strenuous circumstances as accidents, sensory monotony and confined places.

It would appear, moreover, that TM can play a vital role upon the frontiers of knowledge. In a recent article in Creative Intelligence, for example, Richard Prosser, a physicist at Imperial College, London, explains that the technique had guided him in the formulation of new concepts in advanced quantum mechanics. Prosser believes, furthermore, that the great pioneers of science, including Sir Isaac Newton and Albert Einstein, have striven to clarify basic approaches to ultimate reality similar in several respects to that of Maharishi.

Erwin Schrodinger, a leader in early quantum physics research, also indicated the essential contribution which Eastern philosophy such as that underlying transcendental meditation may bring to the western "objective" methodology:

. . . our science - Greek science - is based on objectification, whereby it has cut itself off from an adequate understanding of the Subject of Cognizance, of the mind. But I do believe that this is precisely the point where our present way of thinking does need to be amended, perhaps by a bit of blood-transfusion from Eastern thought.

Following the research of Schrodinger and his colleagues, Prosser postulates that the basis of all physical reality, even that of sub-atomic particles, is a universal wave pattern. Consequently, he presents the awe-inspiring vision of a man walking about with these components of infinity, stirring the whole cosmos by his every breath and action. This possible relationship between Being and superficial appearance derived from quantum theortetical interpretation resembles closely Maharishi's vision of pure Consciousness.

In response to Prosser's theory, Maharishi has outlined his own vision of the universe:

This aspect of nature is very peculiar. Everyone is dancing on the head of everyone else. The whole physical structure is just a composite of waves. Actually, there is only one wave although it seems that there are many. Beyond the waves are just "tendencies". And beyond all this is the finest, no particle, no wave, no tendency.

It is this field of the Infinite, he asserts, that man reaches through the regular practice of transcendental meditation.

This is rarefied air for the average person to breathe but Transcendental meditation is basically practical and common sense - a philosophy of action for everyday life. It is not only for those who are by nature introspective or devotional or for ascetics. The life of the spirit may be opened to all men and infinity indeed stretches in every direction.

Know thyself

-Condensed from "The Conscious Source of Thought" by Jonathan Shear, professor ot philosophy at Lone Mountain College, San Francisco.)

Throughout history seekers of wisdom have pondered upon the source of thought, the underlying reality of consciousness. Plato, for example, considered that true widsom entailed a knowledge of the essence of thought and that this was tantamount to knowing the Good, the source of all being. Those who were ignorant of this Absolute he likened to blind men.

In the Republic, Plato outlined his technique for attaining direct intuition of the Absolute. After a long period of rigorous physical and mental training, one begins to practise the dialectic, allowing his mind to reverse its usual focus and follow ideas backward to the prior ideas on which they depend until at last the Absolute source is encountered in a direct non-representational illumination. It is not clear whether this method of entering the eternal and unchanging region of the soul was ever successfully followed. Even if it was a practical technique, however, it was lost during succeeding centuries.

Rene Descartes took up the search once again at the dawn of the modern era. By his famous cogito, he asserted that awareness was unseparable from being: so long as he was conscious, he was. He could not, however, offer any illumination regarding the mind itself, apart from all its cognitive practices. John Locke, a leading member of the British Empiricist school, agreed with Descartes that self esistence was indubitable but neither he nor his skeptical compatriot, David Hume, could support the existence of any constant element beyond the level of experience. By the early twentieth century, apparently, most English philosophers had resigned themselves to acceptance of the fact that there is no experiencible source for our thinking.

On the Continent also little substantial progress was achieved in this area. Immanual Kant, for one concluded that the "ego" could not be known in isolation because it served as a unifying link for all temporal experience. To him such a conclusion was fortunate, for otherwise, he reasoned, an extra-spatio-temporal intuition would unleash a torrent of untestable metaphysical fancies, dooming the rational growth of scientific knowledge.

The adverse effects of such a concept upon the whole scientific phenomenological experience also concerned Jean Paul Sarte and the existentialists. With some relief, they decided that the very concept of ego was not only vacuous, but also completely unnecessary, for consciousness must involve "positional" reference. Consciousness itself, therefore, could not be the subject of conscious experience - there could be no knowable source of thought.

Contemporary linguistic philosophers prove to be no exception to the general skepticism regarding the existence of the conscious source of thought. Such a concept, they might contend, cannot be meaningfully discussed for three reasons. First, the phrase "experience of consciousness itself", refers indiscriminantly and therefore meaninglessly since there can be no experience of which it would be false to say "consciousness itself is here". Second, because consciousness must accompany all experience, the assertion refers "non contingently" and thus non-experientially. Finally, in their view, all describable experience is objective and public; one does not "experience" introspective states, dreams or consciousness.

To modern philosophers, therefore, the Delphic command "Know thyself" appears impossible of fulfilment. Experience of consciousness is neither actual nor possible. It can not have any content and in any case would be anti-scientific.

It is submitted that transcendental meditation overcomes these difficulties and offers a sound basis for the development of a scientific theory of the conscious source of thought. TM is a systematic technique, easily learned and practised by any curious investigators. The subjective sense of the flow of time is reported to be completely absent from the experience of "transcending", suggesting prima facie that an atemporal intuition is involved. Although the experience of consciousness itself does not have any determinate content, it is clearly remembered as differentiated in memory from the nothingness of unconsciousness. In addition, the fact that subjective - objective distinctions are obliterated in this one experience does not pose a threat to the traditional subjects of scientific investigation.

Having been experienced by all meditators, the transcendental state may be meaningfully discussed. Recent experiments, furthermore, have correlated the physiological states of waking, dreaming and sleeping with that of meditating according to the technique of transcendental meditation. This lends objectivity to reports about these subjective states.

On all these counts, it can be fairly claimed that the practice and results of the systematic technique of transcendental meditation satisfies the historical objections to the possibility of experiencing and theorizing about the conscious source of thought or consciousness itself. It would appear that a foundation is being established for developing a significant science of creative intelligence, the science of the experience and understanding of the conscious source of thought.

Transcendental Meditation in Kingston

Transcendental meditation has attracted much interest in Kingston during recent months. In September 1971 the Students International Meditation Society (SIMS) opened its local Centre at 457 Princess St. to offer instruction in the technique and philosophy of TM. Gregg and Georgina Wilson, fresh from an extended training course with Maharishi Mahesh Yogi, conduct introductory lectures, group meditation and general discussion meetings each week at the Centre. Since their arrival last September, Gregg and Georgina have initiated over 150 meditators within and outside the University community.

TM campus activities include noon-hour group meditation Mondays and Wednesdays in the Union third-floor common room and frequent residence lectures. From several academic fields have been attracted both professors and students to this novel experience of transcendental meditation. Their comments are interesting and generally attest to the universality of the technique. Some medical doctors, while perhaps skeptical of the philosophy of meditation, express pleasant surprise that TM appears to promote relaxation and increased efficiency in both physician and patient.

Engineering students often do not publicize their new interest in meditation, but find, nevertheless, that concentration improves and tension decreases. Many of the students involved in meditation have sworn off heavy drug use in preference for the "natural high" resulting from TM. With the disappearance of "tension headaches", one law student became convinced of TM's benefits and indicated that his wife too would soon be initiated.

"Increased self-confidence in the knowledge that one is developing his mind" - this was the particular advantage explained by a Queen's computer expert. The camaraderie and special communication between experienced meditators also constitute an attraction apparently - absent seem to be the tensions and social games encountered in so many other group situations. This community of spirit becomes especially evident during "residence courses", usually conducted in a retreat house or other tranquil setting. For two days at a time, meditators relax, discuss the philosophy of Maharishi and engage in long sessions of deep meditation. Held four times yearly, these courses provide a welcome break from the stresses of business and academic life and aid in a renewal of mental and physical energy.

How may one learn more about TM? Introductory lectures are advertised regularly on campus and are conducted at the SIMS Centre at 8:30 each Wednesday evening. After a subsequent lecture, one may apply to be initiated - to be instructed personally by a qualified teacher. Initiation and instruction require one hour on each of four successive days, usually selected as convenient to the applicant. No further contact with the teacher is necessary, but meditators are encouraged to have their meditation "checked" once a month by a meditator trained for this purpose.

A major concern of many applicants is the donation requested from each person at the time of initiation. Since SIMS is a non-profit educational organization, this money is employed to defray operating and publicity expenses at local, national and international levels. Donations may be varied according to individual income situations, but generally the amount suggested is $25 for high school students, $35 for university students and 3 days' wages or $75 from non-students. Following initiation, it should be noted, the meditator is entitled to make use of facilities and to attend group meditations and advanced lectures at SIMS and International Meditation Society centres throughout the world.

The next introductory lecture will be presented Tuesday March 7 8:00 p.m. Stirling Hall Rm 412C

What shall we say about life on earth?

The newspapers recently carried prominent accounts of a meeting of American and Soviet scientists for the purpose of "tuning in" on the universe. The meeting considered ways in which scientists could monitor the universe for signals from planets possibly inhabited by creatures possessing intelligence and advanced communications skills. If contact with other planets should in fact be made, and if the earth-dwellers are able both to send and receive information, what shall we say about our life on earth? Shall we say that we have developed the human intelligence to a point where we need fear only ourselves, that the most extensive exercise of collective brain power is directed not to human needs but to ever-more advanced techniques for killing off humans, that the natural environment is being fouled at a prodigious rate, and that the earth-dwellers have never outgrown their tribalism, of which national sovereignty is an all-powerful manifestation?

Despite the historians, there has been only one age of man. It is the age of primitive man. The beginning of the age of civilized man, when it comes, will be marked by his political, philosophical and spiritual awareness of himself as a member of a world species with world needs and with the capacity and desire to create world institutions to meet these needs. Human kind need not sacrifice the nation to create such institutions. It need only recognize and assert an allegiance of humans to one another beyond national boundaries and to do those things in the human interest that the nation as an organization is incapable of doing.

The present mode of life on earth is madness, which is nonetheless lethal for being legal. Rational existence is possible, but it calls for a world consciousness and a world design. People who develop the habit of thinking of themselves as world citizens are fulfilling the first requirement of sanity in our time.

The members of the VAGHY STRING QUARTET have been musicians-in-residence at Queen's since the fall of 1968. They have given concerts throughout the United States and Canada, and in April will be making a tour of Europe, including Ireland, Iceland, Norway, Poland, Germany and Austria. The Journal recently interviewed each of the members of the quartet, and the fourth of these interviews, with Robert Dodson, appears today.

ROBERT DODSON, the cellist of the quartet, was born in Los Angeles, California, and studied with Janos Starker at Indiana University. He plays a Gennaro Gagliano cello made in 1782.

When did you first become interested in chamber music?

Very, very early. My parents were chamber music buffs, although neither of them had much musical training. My father was passionately in love with Beethoven string quartets, and in fact he used to shave to them in the morning. Later on I got interested in playing the cello. I had a year of strictly rudimentary piano training, fell in love with the piano again in high school, and studied it very intensively in my last year. I still like the piano very much, and play when I have time.

After high school I went to Columbia University, where I studied chemistry for a brief period, and decided that it wasn't really for me. I took up music again, and went to Boston for a year and decided I wanted to be a cellist. Then I transferred to Indiana, where I was from 1962 to 1968 and where I did my Masters.

What teacher or musician has been the most influential on your individual musical development?

If I had to pick out one individual, I'd have to say Jonos Starker, who was a very great influence on me. Not just as a musician, but as a person to have around in his energy, and in his interest in so many things which he is able to maintain most of the time. He is very well rounded - unusually so for a musician.

I would say his chamber music class was the most inspiring of all, where, I suppose, he didn't feel an obligation to discuss technical questions, as he would in a private lesson. And so, as a result, he got into some very subtle aspects of music-making.

What has been the greatest influence on your approach to string quartet playing?

You'd be surprised at all the things you have to learn as a professional, that no student situation can help you out with. I would say in the case of string quartet, preparation for performance. This is something I didn't learn at school; it is something I had to learn along the way. I would imagine you'd get much the same answer from my colleagues.

You can't apply a method to string quartet, because it's so much a matter of personalities. It's four people working together. It's not just the music you're working on, it's people, and finding the best in each individual and allowing that to flower, without interfering with someone else's flowering. That's something that's achieved every time we do a new piece. It's like learning again in a way. Not to say that there isn't a very heavy carryover from everything that was done in the past, but like to take each situation as it comes and not try too hard to apply old lessons to new situations, not in the beginning anyway.

What would you say personally is the most challenging work that you've played?

The pieces I've sweated the most over in sheer labour are the Bartok quartets. You would also have to isolate the Beethoven Quartets and a few of the Mozart quartets for depth of musical probing. But then sometimes it will seem more difficult to put together a quartet by Dvorak. Perhaps his music is a little vaguer, not quite so clearly defined musically, perhaps not quite so tightly worked out, intellectually and formally. A whole new set of problems arise.

Are pieces in the string quartet literature less apt to fall into the "warhorse" category than pieces in the orchestral literature?

I think it's true that string quartets are less likely to fall into that category, although pieces can become warhorses simply by playing them too often. You can certainly reach a situation where you wish a vacation from a certain piece, as every musician has, I think into the quartet composers have put some of their most profound thoughts, when they didn't feel the compulsion to satisfy audiences. Certainly that is true of Beethoven and Bartok.

Of some of the nineteenth century composers, its not entirely true. For instance, I personally get tired of Dvorak quite quickly. The "American" quartet stands out as being somewhat of an exception to that rule. The "D minor" that we did a couple of years ago I was very grateful to put on the shelf. I thought it was far more difficult than what it had to offer once it was learned, and that's very annoying. And I don't hate Dvorak, I love Dvorak. After all he wrote the greatest concerto for my instrument.

Do you personally have any preferences for the types of audience you play for?

If I gave you a snap answer I would say no. But to be more truthful I would say yes, although I'm not sure I can identify my preferences. I like playing for children very much. You'd be amazed that some of the most responsive audiences we have are in schools. They have no prejudices about what they should or shouldn't like, until they're ten or twelve or so, when it becomes necessary to like popular music.

Can you think of any recent works by contempory composers which stand out in your mind as rivalling the best in the string quartet medium?

I heard one, that was submitted to a string quartet composition contest, that was done by the Berkshire quartet. It didn't win, but it was one of the three competitors for the first prize. But it was absolutely an outstanding work, really stunning. The judges were a bit too conservative, and when one of the judges, who was not, suggested that it might be twelve tone, and that he'd have to check the score to see, that immediately set the other judges against it. But it was very, very impressive. Unfortunately I don't know who wrote it, because it was submitted to the quartet anonymously. Even in the sealed envelope that was supposed to hold the composers name, there was nothing but an address, so a major composer, must have submitted it. But even if the man or woman is not known as a major composer, by that work he definitely is.

A string quartet is so much a matter of personalities

- eggar

There are works contemporary with Bartok that are very outstanding - the Schoenberg Quartets are great favorites of mine. I haven't played any, but I hope we can do at least number four soon. Also the Webern Quartet and the Berg Lyric Suite. There are some avant-garde things being done. I don't quite know how to evaluate them, since I'm not quite sure how they wish to be evaluated. If some of them wish to be taken seriously, then I don't. But I don't wish to seem anti-advant-garde, because that's the farthest from the truth.

How would you describe present-day audience response to avante-garde music?

A little bit of education is the worst kind, because people with a little bit of musical education are the least sensitive, and the most antagonistic to modern music. It takes either quite a deep understanding and love for music, or none at all to be open to something completely new.

There's a small but very active clientele for almost exclusively avant-garde music. In New York city, for instance, you see pretty much the same people every week or two weeks at the really modern music concerts. With the new musical director of the New York Philharmonic, that will probably change. He does a lot of the Viennese atonal composers, and he's actually alienating the Philharmonic audience to some extent. I know several subscribers, and even the most educated and sophisticated of them are protesting. I celebrated Boulez's appointment. I think it was very imaginative, and it's certainly in the tradition of the New York Philharmonic of hiring great and unusual men to conduct their orchestra. They've had Gustav Mahler, Mengelberg, Toscannini, Furtwangler, all outstanding men in their own right, none of them a great composer. I think you'd have to recognize Pierre Boulez as one of the great composers of today, whether you like his music or not. Certainly he's one of the most important.

But that was all about your question concerning audiences. There is definitely a kind of fanatic following of the avant-garde music in the large cities in all of North America, but particularly in places like New York, Chicago, San Francisco, Los Angeles. And then there are the other audiences who want only to hear Tchaikowsky, and Mendelsohn. Even some of Beethoven's works are either a little too avant-garde or too early for them. I can remember when some of the Boston audiences used to get upset when Munch would do Berlioz. Berlioz isn't nice music at all.

Chance music is becoming a very popular technique among today's composers. What do you think of it?

I've seen aleatoric devices used in otherwise standard pieces, not standard by most peoples' definition, but pieces with an identifiable classical form and some sort of identifiable harmonic approach. And I've heard works that are exclusively aleatoric. I think it's a useful device, and it's also a device that's misused by most composers, that is, if you wish to take their work seriously. I prefer to take some of them as entertainments, and then I have no objection. Everybody's entitled to have fun, including composers. And I can't deny that I've fooled around a bit that way myself, with my roommates when I was a student. We'd get together with knives and forks and spoons and pots and pans and anything else that would make an interesting sound in the apartment and see what we could come up with. And it had a certain charm. At least it relieved the pressure that was there someplace in the back of your brain. If music does that for John Cage, then more power to him.

This is not to say that I don't take aleatoric music seriously. Some of Stockhausen's earlier works that were to a certain extent chance I found quite impressive. There's a man in the United States by the name of Donald Erb, who was a fellow student of mine at Indiana University, who's now performed all over the world. He wrote a work called "Symphony of Overtures" with an aleatoric passage in each movement. It was very successful. Sometimes it's useful to have a couple of minutes of sheer chaos. Charles Ives wrote it into his symphonies, and those are the parts of his works that many people object to. I'm quite partial to them. And there is order everywhere if you wish to look for it.

Which does the music critic affect more, the performing artist or the listening public?

The traditional response is the listening public, in that their suspicions or doubts or enthusiasms are confirmed in the newspaper the next day, or as is often the case, the listener hasn't quite made up his mind and waits until the next day to form his opinion. This is a pretty run-of-the-mill observation of the relationship between the listener and the reviewer, but to a certain extent it's true.

As for the effect of a reviewer on a performer that's quite a bit more complicated, and fairly subtle. I think a reviewer is very important to a young performer, when he's trying to get started, and frantically trying to get copy for his publicity. It helps a lot to have some good reviews to quote from. The more an artist becomes established, the less interested he is in seeing the review, and the less important the reviewer becomes.

I've been asked to be a critic several times, and always refused, for a number of reasons. First, I don't like to discuss my colleagues, and in a broad sense every performing musician is a colleague. And secondly I don't believe it's possible to share my views of a performance with an audience that doesn't have the same point of view I have. Certainly I've never felt an obligation to make any alterations in my playing, because of what a critic said. It's dangerous to take praise or criticism seriously, you have to have a good mind about what you think of yourself, what you're trying to do, where you fall short of what your trying to accomplish. You also have to recognize when you think you're succeeding, otherwise you'll drive yourself crazy with insecurity.

The Vaghy String Quartet will be in concert Friday March 10 at Dunning. Their program will include works by Charles Ives, Peter Re, and Antonin Dvorak. The concert will begin at 8:30 p.m. Tickets $1.00 for Students and $2.00 for General Public.

OUAA Wrap-Up

Windsor Lancers Take OUAA B-Ball Crown

A rookie-laden Windsor Lancer squad carried off its second straight Ontario title at York University last Saturday, running past the host Yeomen 73-61 on the strength of 14 second-half points from newcomer Jerry Sovran. Earlier, the Lancers had upset a favoured Waterloo team 83-82 on three foul shots in the final minute, then stunned Ottawa U. 100-78 to reach the finals.

York dumped the Carleton Ravens 84-67 in the quarter-finals and trampled Western 85-77 on their semi-final match. Ottawa U. had also produced an upset, edging Laurentian 88-86 on a jumper by Vince Lukenda with 4 seconds to go.

Windsor starts its run at a C.I.A.U. title later today when the Lancers meet the UBC Thunderbirds in Vancouver. The other semi-final pits Acadia against Montreal's Loyola College.

Gaels Place Two On East All-Stars

Back to the OUAA for a moment: the Gaels took two of the five first-team all-star berths in the selections announced Monday. Andy Daugulis, who was the second-leading scorer in the east this year, and Paul Howard, who was second in rebounding, were the Gaels named. Laurentian had the other three spots, placing centre John McKibbon and guards Don Lavigeur and Guy Vetrie.

The Western All-Stars had Mark Walton and Wayne Morgan of Guelph, Marnix Heersink of Western, Rod Dean of Lutheran and repeater Jaan Laaniste of Waterloo. Interestingly enough, Windsor failed to place a single player on either the first or second All-star squads. Wonder if that shows something??

Andy Daugulis, at right, made OUAA All-Star squad for second straight year after leading the Gaels on scoring with a 20 ppg average.

Bad Second Half Sinks Gals In O.W.I.A.A. B-Ball Consolations

A combination of a tight University of Waterloo zone and erratic outside shooting combined to cool off the Golden Gals in the last half of an O.W.I.A.A. Consolation semi-final in Waterloo last Friday and Saturday. Queen's had held a 36-29 half-time lead, largely on the strength of Laney Marshall's shooting and some tough work on the boards by centre Sue Higgins. Waterloo's switch to a zone proved the Gal's undoing, as the Athenas were able to keep Queen's off the offensive boards and force them to take outside shots -- and as happened all season, not too many went in. Waterloo won 61-55, despite Laney Marshall's game high 23 points. Pat Quigley added 9 and Karen Carson 8.

Earlier, Queen's had defeated Guelph 44-33, with Karen Carson hitting 13 points, and Sue Higgins and Laney Marshall adding 9 each, and York 50-36. Pat Patterson had 12 points for the Gals, Marshall 10, and Higgins 8.

Waterloo went on to edge Windsor in the Consolation final, while Western captured the OWIAA crown by dumping Ottawa U.

The Gals were a young team this year -- only Sue Higgins will be lost to graduation. If they can develop a consistent outside shooter, and if a suitable replacement for Sue can be found, then next year could be a good one. Otherwise, teams will be able to sit in collapsing zones and dare Queen's to take outside shots -- and that's no fun at all.

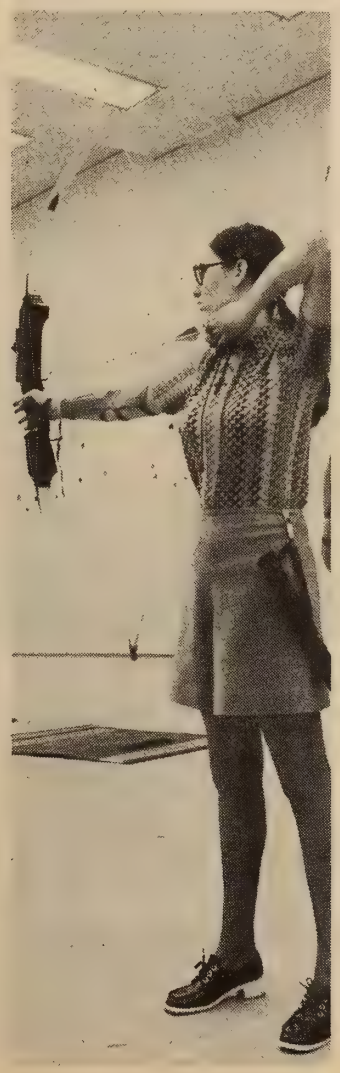
Synchro Swimmers Have Problems



By Vicki Gilliat

While other Queen's students headed for the slopes, the Queen's Synchro Swim Team headed for Windsor (again) for the O.W.I.A.A. Championships. But the weekend was disasterous, beginning with one star swimmer, Cathi Billings, who contracted the flu and couldn't make the trip. The only points were won by Diane Thompson, 4th in the figures, and the team routine earned a single point with 8th place overall.

For the record, Lynne Anne Muldoon placed 10th and Heather Demeza 22nd in a field of 29 in the figures. The soloists, Jackie Mansell and Heather Duff placed 13th and 16th respectively with 17 entries.

The duets managed to sew up 10th and 11th places securely (both tied in total points but R. Jay and Vicki Gilliatt had higher execution marks than Demeza and Muldoon). And the team routine placed 7th out of 9.

The best team did win! McMaster swept all firsts except the duet where they placed third. An informal vote by McMaster rated Queen's the No. 1 friendliest team at the meet.

Janet Spence Leads Archers

The Women's Intercollegiate Archery Team competed in the St. Lawrence College International Tournament last Sunday, and came away with three trophies to show for their trouble. Janet Spence was just four points off Olympian Carol Armstrong, with a score of 260 points and two perfect ends.

Squash Squad 5th At Western

Queen's five top squash players took part at the O.U.A.A. finals at Western February 25, 26 & 27th and as a team placed fifth out of the seven Universities taking part.

The Queen's Team consisted of:

	WON	LOST
1. FISHER, Hugh	3	3
2. GUDEWILL, Nick	1	5
3. IRVINE, Rich	3	3
4. MOORE, John	1	5
5. THOMPSON, Greg	3	3

Queen's will lose Gudewill, Fisher & Thompson next year, but rumour has it that some top seeded players from other Universities will be attending the Faculty of Education next year and should provide Queen's with a contending team.

Newman Replaces Morgan

Mari-Elizabeth Morgen, the pianist to perform the third concert in the Dunning Hall Series this Friday has cancelled her concert at Queen's University. Performing in her place will be Anthony Newman, a young American harpsichordist.

Mari Morgen was involved in a car accident. "She only sprained her wrist" said Mr. Barry Cole of the Division of Concerts. "But unfortunately this forced her to cancel the concert."

Anthony Newman, her replacement, is fast gaining attention with his interpretations of Bach's harpsichord music. Columbia Records has issued four albums featuring his interpretations of Bach's music. Soon to be released on Columbia records is Newman playing and conducting the six Brandenburg Concerti, said Mr. Cole.

These recordings have been given outstanding reviews. Stereo Review wrote "Wow! This is zap harpsichord playing - Newman is a phenomenal performer." High Fidelity Magazine stated that there have "never been more intelligent, more lucid, more penetrating, and (not least important) more virtuosic readings than what we are presented on this new recital disc.

If you don't own a single harpsichord record, here is an excellent place to begin, and if you're the compleat collector of this repertory, prepare yourself for a most dazzlingly exciting 'Italian Concerto' conceivable, a flamboyantly elaborate 'Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue,".

Both these works will be presented on the concert this Friday.

His concerts have been followed by similar reviews.

CFRC gets licence

The Queen's radio station will be able to keep broadcasting -- it's official.

CFRC AND CFRC-FM had their licences renewed Monday by the Canadian Radio and Television Commission, for a period extending to March 31, 1974.

Under an earlier government order, the CRTC was not permitted to issue licences to radio stations owned by provincial government agencies and universities. That policy is being reconsidered.

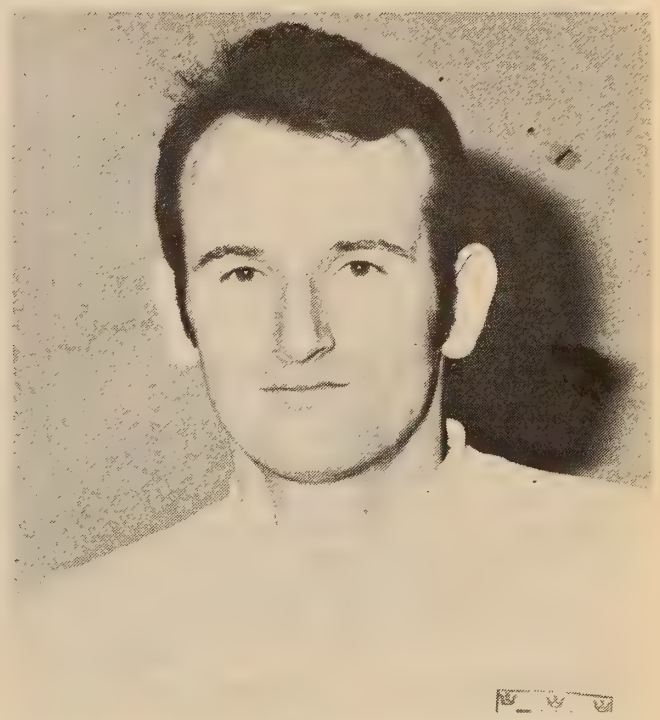
Men's Volleyball

Youngest Queen's Team 3rd in Canada

- marien

The Volleyball Gaels, one of Queen's youngest teams, challenged the best teams in Canada for the National title after only two years of competition. In their first season the Gaels were defeated in the semi-final round of the O.Q.A.A. Championships which were won by Western. This season the Queen's squad edged the Mustangs to capture the O.U.A.A. title and advance to the National tournament in Quebec City.



The U. of Winnipeg, three time winners in the last five years, took the meet with a championship match win over defending champion U. de Montreal. U. de Montreal, which boasts the National team coach and four players, ended up in second place. Queen's, with a 2 win and 4 loss record in the double round robin tournament, claimed third place. The fourth place team was Dalhousie which won no matches.

The team from Queen's plays under a severe handicap in that they have only six members. The true impact of this was brought out in the finals when playing coach George Rada fractured his finger in a practice on Thursday and had no backup men to call on.

Also the fact that the O.U.A.A. finals were in December, and the team has been able to find little competition since then, affected the team.

There is a possibility that the Queen's team will go to Edmonton in mid-March to participate in the Canadian Volleyball Championships. However, even as the top team from Ontario, they would be required to cover half of their expenses for the trip.

Coach Rada hopes that more pre-season training and increased numbers of people trying out for the team will improve on even this year's standing.

Wrestlers Unlucky

Queen's wrestlers fell victim to a combination of unlucky draws and inexperience in the OUAA Finals, held at Guelph February 18th and 19th. Only Ted Pordham and Garry Brown managed to place, with Pordham 3rd in 134-lb. class and Brown 4th in the 142-lb. group. Neither of these competitors will return next year, although seven of this year's rookies will be back, bigger, stronger and wiser than ever. Next season could be a good one.

Mermen sixth

Queen's swimmers could do no better than 6th in the tough OUAA swimming finals held at Hamilton's McMaster University Friday and Saturday, but coach Larry Brawley was less than despondent. Brawley indicated that he felt the team as a whole had performed much better than last year. Leading this upswing was veteran Gord Hurd, who collected 4th in the 200-yd individual medley and the 100-yd butterfly events. The first six finishers in the Butterfly were within one second of each other.

Rob Herman also added to the Queen's totals with a pair of 6th-place finishes, in the 200 and 400-yd medleys.

CANADA

TORONTO — Ontario's commission to reshape higher education is in for some heavy sniping if Monday's official hearing was any guide.

Heaviest criticism came from University of Toronto faculty who said the recent draft report ignored the concept of quality and would creat government-appointed boards with too much power and too little university representation.

Commissioner Vincent Kelly, a Toronto lawyer, said the 112-page draft report would be expanded to encourage "academic excellence in mass education" but would not support "elitism."

Mr. Kelly also said the commission on post-secondary education is "open for suggestions" on the structure of the proposed three boards of 13 government appointees to direct higher education.

Critics of the draft report usually centre this recommendation out as evidence of an impending government take-over of and possible meddling in higher education. They see it as an attack on academic freedom from government control.

MONTREAL — As Hugh MacLennan sees it, the worst threat to Canada's survival does not come from Quebec separatists but from the smiling contenentalists in the United States.

The author and academic says that more and more Canadians fear absorption into "the American technological empire."

"After its defeat in Viet Nam, the U.S. cannot expand any more in Asia," he commented. "It now wants to consolidate its power in North America and exploit our resources."

Canada will break down under the mounting pressures from Washington and the giant U.S. corporations unless the federal government reacts firmly, he said.

TORONTO — University of Toronto students should have limited access to bookshelves in the Robarts Library and the public no access, according to a recently completed report on library policy.

This report indicates a compromise reply to student demands of full public access to the $42-million building, due to open next year.

The report is from an 11-member committee, including four students, created to advise the U of T on library policy.

Original policy was to allow only faculty and graduate students to browse through the books while other students would have to order books from a card catalogue and the public would have this access by paying $50 a year.

Students argued that 900,000 of the books they now have direct access to will be put out of reach when they are moved into the Robarts Library. They recently staged an all-night sit-in at the present main library to back up their argument.

The special committee report calls for only slightly greater access than originally planned by allowing fourth year arts and science students into the stacks and other students in on short-term passes.

The report says the present system of open access was the result of rapid enrolment increases with little library growth at the U of T and the access should now be restricted to protect the books from damage and theft.

TORONTO — Doctors are no longer legally obliged to tell patients in advance when their fees will exceed the Ontario Health Services Insurance Plan benefit, which is 90 per cent of the Ontario Medical Association fee schedule.

However, the Canadian Medical Association Code of Ethics still requires a doctor to take the initiative in telling his patient if the fee will exceed the provincial fee schedule.

Legal requirements under OHSIP legislation were repealed last fall when amendments were made to the act requiring doctors to choose to bill the plan or to bill their patients.

A Department of Health spokesman said Monday the legal requirement did not seem appropriate when doctors who chose to bill their patients would no longer be subject to this legislation.

LONDON — Britain's 280,000 coal miners returned to work Monday, ending a seven-week strike that left Government and industry reeling. Most industrial plants resumed full production and electric train service returned to normal as coal began moving from the mines to power stations. The total cost in lost production has not been calculated. The miners voted by a 96 per cent majority last week to accept pay increases averaging 20 per cent.

UNITED NATIONS — The UN Security Council voted Monday to keep economic sanctions against Rhodesia fully in force and declared that any national legislation that would permit the importation of embargoed commodities would contravene a country's obligations.

The resolution, jointly sponsored by Guinea, Somalia, and Sudan, was aimed particularly at the United States, which has decided to lift the embargo against Rhodesian chrome imports.

Brain surgery to produce docility

WASHINGTON — A researcher says brain surgery is gaining new popularity for use on people suffering anxiety and tension, including overactive children and depressed mental patients.

"Well over 100,000 persons have already been subjected to psychosurgery around the world, including 20,000 in England, perhaps 50,000 in America, and many more thousands in Canada," according to Dr. Peter R. Breggin.

"We are now in the midst of a resurgence, including multiple forms of psychosurgery upon hyperactive children," he said. "It is time to take action before this revival takes on proportions of the first wave that peaked in the 1950s," he adds in a 25,000-word study inserted by Representative Cornelius Gallagher (Dem. N.J.) in the Congressional Record.

Dr. Breggin, 35, is on the faculty of the Washington, D.C., School of Psychiatry. He urges that all forms of psychosurgery be outlawed in the United States as they have been in the Soviet Union.

Dr. Breggin said his survey was based on material presented by 100 psychosurgeons who gathered in Denmark in the summer of 1970 for the Second International Conference on Psychosurgery.

The initial wave of operations, he said, primarily involved state-hospital patients with chronic disabilities, while the current one "is aimed at an entirely diffeent group — individuals who are relatively .well-functioning, the large majority of them with the diagnosis of neurosis, many of them individuals who are still living at home and performing on the job."

"Women constitute the majority of the patients, with old people and children as other large groups. In Japan, Thailand and India, children have been large target populations for some time; but now in America, children are again being submitted to psychosurgery, particularly at the University of Mississippi, where O. J. Andy is operating on hyperactive children as young as age 5."

By psychosurgery, he said, doctors mutilate or cut out parts of the brain in seeking to "blunt the individual's emotions and make him more docile.

"Each technique attacks and mutilates brain tissue that has nothing demonstrably wrong with it, and each does this within the delicately balanced limbo system of the brain which harmonizes the most highly developed human capacities, including emotional responsiveness."

WASHINGTON — A new international study warns that the human race faces disaster within the next 100 years unless it collectively brakes rates of growth.

The study calls for urgent efforts to create a new lower-keyed world of non-growth to insure that "human society can survive indefinitely on earth with an enriching existence for all."

'Who is Robert Stanfield and why is he saying those terrible things about me?'

PEKING — President Richard Nixon prepared to leave for home Monday morning at the end of a historic mission which placed the United States and China on the long road back toward normal relations after a generation of hostility that twice placed them on the opposite sides in war.

At the conclusion of a week that Mr. Nixon declared to have "changed the world" the two sides issued a joint communique in which they pledged to live in peace with one another despite the great differences that stand between them.

The communique went a long way toward removing the most critical of those differences, with a U.S. pledge that all U.S. forces and military installations eventually will be withdrawn from Taiwan, whose separate existence they have guaranteed for nearly 22 years.

WASHINGTON — The Senate Judiciary Committee Tuesday approved by 14 to 1 a proposed constitutional amendment to guarantee women equal rights with men under federal and state law.

It provides that equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any state on account of sex.

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia — The southern area of Sudan is to have self-government under a formula reacher here Sunday to end the 16-year "forgotten" civil war between Arabs and blacks in which hundreds of thousands have died.

A joint statement issued here after the agreement between the Sudanese government and the South Sudan Liberation Front said:

"With the restoration of peace and stability as their primary concern, both parties have outlined a political, legal and administrative framework within which these regional aspirations can be fulfilled and the national interests and sovereignty best preserved."

The agreement marks the end of a campaign by southern secessionists to secure a separate state which they call "Azania." The campaign began when the largely black south rebelled against Arab rule from the north in 1955.

HIGH-FEE POLICY ALREADY IN USE BY ONTARIO CABINET, PAPER SAYS

The Ontario government is already relying on controversial recommendations of the Commission on Post-Secondary Education, the University of Toronto newspaper says.

Chief of these is "a dramatic fee hike, with its consequent result of shifting the emphasis from full-time to part-time studies", in all Ontario Universities, according to The Varsity, in an article by co-editor Tom Walkom published February 28.

It says proposals of the post-secondary education commission (better known as the Wright Commission) "formed the basis for top-level policy decisions in the Ontario cabinet" two months before it was published.

Its recommendations parallel those of a Treasury Board report which reached the cabinet in November and suggested alternatives for "financing spiralling university costs" -- the same alternatives the Wright Commission suggested last month.

"These alternatives included increasing student fees, charging interest on student loans, and restricting student aid to the students in the first three years of university," The Varsity says.

It continues: "Although the draft report officially is scheduled to come under intensive public discussion before it is put in final form sometime in June and although no policy has yet been submitted to the floor of the legislature, indications are that the government is going full steam on at least some of its recommendations."

- boag

Student in the sunshine: summer school and year-round use of universities are included in Wright Commission's proposals for life-long post-secondary education.

The Treasury Board report, suggesting guidelines for the 1972 budget, recommended that student numbers at Ontario universities "should be slashed", The Varsity says. A sharp fee increase, leading more students to attend university only part-time, would be a way to accomplish this, it says.

The Wright Report does not actually say that fees should go up in order to reduce full-time enrollment, but it does say that students should pay a larger share of the cost of their education and that more emphasis should be put on part-time studies.

The Varsity's article continues:

Government concern with slashing university enrollment is a direct turn-about from the policy of just a few years ago, when education, and especially higher education, was touted as a cure-all for the province's social and economic ills. With the increasing failure of university graduates to land jobs, though, the government has been trying to dampen the inflated expectations of students by cutting down their numbers.

Interestingly enough, the Wright Commission, also suggested a shift to part-time education.

Other alternatives strongly recommended by the Treasury Board document include the limiting of graduate and research enrollment in the province and the placing of "embargoes" on certain courses in Ontario universities.

(An embargo is placed on a course when the Committee on University Affairs turns down a university's request to fund it.)

The existence of the Treasury Board report points to the peculiar roles played in the formation of government policy on education by the Committee on University Affairs and its former chairman Doug Wright.

Officially, the CUA is charged with making recommendations to the Ontario government on all matters of university education. In fact, though, as existence of the Treasury Board report points out, their parameters are rather limited. For the alternatives decided on by the cabinet were presented to the CUA two months later; from these alternatives the CUA was to choose a set to recommend back to the government. In other words, the CUA was allowed to recommend only choices already cleared with cabinet.

They chose the same set later to be embodied in the Wright report.

It was in reaction to these constraints that one faculty member of the CUA, Phyllis Grosskurth, resigned from the body in January, and in a series of letters to The Varsity and The Globe and Mail first brought into the public eye the existence of the Treasury Board report.

She refused to divulge the actual contents of the report. What she did do, however, was describe the inner workings of the CUA and the key role played by Doug Wright.

Meetings, says Miss Grosskurth, never took votes, but only reached a consensus. A clever chairman can easily control a consensual meeting and, according to Miss Grosskurth, Wright was that type of chairman.

During his term as chairman of the CUA, and even to a greater extent now, Wright played and plays a key role in government education policy.

While chairman of the CUA, the former Waterloo engineering dean was also chairman of the Committee on Post-Secondary Education, and a key man in the corridors of government.

What undoubtedly happened with the Treasury Board report is that Doug Wright, the chairman of the commission, short-circulated normal government procedures to bring the cream of his financial recommendations directly into the hands of the cabinet. The recommendations were then passed on to Doug Wright, the chairman of the CUA, for study. Under the able guidance of its chairman, Doug Wright, the CUA affirmed those recommendations and sent them back to the government where they will be implemented by Doug Wright, the new super-deputy minister of social development (he was appointed to that post in January).

At the same time, the same recommendations were released to the public under the name of the Wright report.

Planning chairman quits

Dr. S.D. Lash will conclude his term as Chairman of the School of Urban and Regional Planning on June 30, 1972. A committee under the Chairmanship of Vice Principal G. A. Harrower, has been appointed to advise the Principal on the selection of a new Chairman.

Members of the Advisory Committee include Dr. J. Lele, Head, Dept of Sociology; Dr. J. W. Grove, Head, Dept. of Political Studies; Dr. J. Hogarth, Associate Dean, School of Graduate Studies; Dr. R. H. T. Smith, Head, Dept. of Geography; S. Mcleod, School of Urban and Regional Planning; M. Ircha, School of Urban and Regional Planning (student); Dr. D. Gow, Director, School of Public Administration; Associate Dean H. M. Edwards, Faculty of Applied Science.

Members of faculty and students are invited to submit to the Chairman of the Committee their views on the future development of the school and their suggestions of possible candidates for the position.

Faculty ponders longer year

The Ad Hoc Committee formed by the Queen's University Faculty Association to consider the implications of extension of the academic year and its effects on the faculty will meet regularly at 3.30 p.m. every Tuesday in the next few weeks.

The committee under the chairmanship of B. deV. Batchelor, Civil Engineering; includes D. Magnussen, Law; W. Breck, Chemistry, R. Chivers, Anatomy; C. Curtis, Business; A. G. Green, Economics; D. Pratt, Education; P. Rogers, English; J. Stayer, History; D. Walton, Biochemistry; and R. Willmott, Mathematics.

Faculty members are invited to submit their views in writing to secretary Magnussen or to request a personal hearing by contacting any of the members of the committee.

Miss Grosskurth, a Toronto English professor and something of a romantic, is upset at the harsh realities of government and accuses the CUA of merely being a facade for the government's civil service.

She may have a point.

The CUA is made up of 11 members, all appointed by government. Three are solid corporate figures — Maurice Lavigne, a manager from Sudbury's Falconbridge nickel mines, Jim Hughes, president of A. E. Ames stockbrokers, and Robert Mitchell, vice-president of Supertest Petroleum (a subsidiary of British Petroleum).

Two more, although billed as academics, are actually academic administrators — James Parr, dean of Applied Science at the University of Windsor and new chairman following Wright's exit, and Roger Rossiter, vice-president of the University of Western Ontario.

In addition there is a labour representative — William Dodge, secretary-treasurer of the Canadian Labour Congress, an economist (Sylvia Ostrey), a psychologist (Reva Gerstein), and former Ontario premier Leslie Frost.

Students have their representative too — Perrin Beatty. Appointed with loud hurrahs as evidence of the province's generous attitude towards youth, Beatty, a former head of the provincial Young Progressive Conservatives is presently assistant to Health minister Bert Lawrence and a nominee for the Conservative candidacy in the Grey-Willington riding.

AMS organizes -- in Gananoque

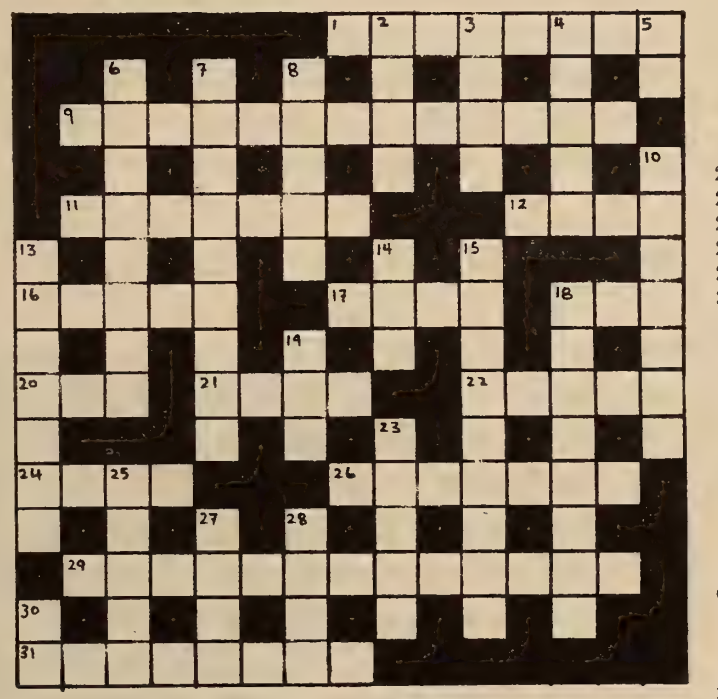
by Jennifer Grass

The new Outer Council spent its customary weekend of retreat in Gananoque on Saturday and Sunday.

President and Vice-president, Greg LeBlanc and Wally Palmer both expressed their satisfaction with the retreat. Its purpose is to acquaint the new members with each other, to familiarize them with the workings of the AMS and to choose the new commissioners.

These are expected to be announced this week. "But I hope all members of outer council will ally themselves with a commission," LeBlanc told the Journal.

The weekend began with discussion of Elrond and the University Centre. Information was provided by John Blanchard, Project Director of Elrond and Susan Dowler, student representative on the University Centre Committee.



The controversial Wright Report was then discussed in depth. The outer council approved a response to the Wright Report. This was compiled by former President Patrick Riley.

The old and new executives of several university councils will be meeting with George Kerr, Minister of Colleges and Universities this Friday in Toronto. Riley's report will be presented at that time.

"Considerable interest in the education commission at Queen's was expressed," Palmer told the Journal. As well as the customary teach-ins, the new council wishes to investigate the possibilities of introducing several interdisciplinary courses and brief two week courses on contemporary subjects. "A proposal concerning this will be presented at the first outer council meeting and hopefully to the senate in March," LeBlanc said.

Discussion broke up on Saturday night for a "sensitivity session" led by Frank Clampett. Palmer commented that the evenings activities were extremely helpful in unifying the new council.

Queen's Girls at Swimming Nats

by Anne McDonald

The 2nd annual Canadian Women's National Intercollegiate Swimming and Diving Championships were held February 25 & 26 at the University of New Brunswick in Fredricton. Queen's saw its two swimmers, Cathy Clarke and Cathy Brace, hold their own by obtaining 22 points between the two of them.

In the 50 freestyle finals Brace placed 8th (of 12), 11th in the 200 breaststroke finals, and 100 yd breaststroke finals. Queen's backstroker, Cathy Clarke, placed 5th (of 12) in the 200 backstroke finals and 10th in the 100 backstroke finals.

Considering the fact that Queen's swimmers both placed in the finals of their events, and showed personal improvement in their times, they represented Queen's well in the Nationals. The overall winner of the meet was the Western Conference (WCIAA) with a total of 717 points, with the top university being the U. of Alberta (267 points).

The Ontario Conference (OWIAA) came second with 607 points; the top Ontario University being U. of Toronto with 157, and Western 2nd with 126.

The Queen's team ended the season in 7th place in their league, the O.W.I.A.A.

Gaels place well in Ont. Sr. meet

Queen's indoor track Gaels showed considerable depth Saturday, winning the mile relay and placing in four other events in the Ontario Senior Track and Field Meet, held at the C.N.E.

The Relay squad of Dave Jarvis, Hugh Fraser, Brian Aiken and Bob Milne were able to defend the title won last year. Fraser added a second in the 50-meters, losing at the wire to one-time Western Kentucky star Herman Carter, who was clocked in 5.9 for the distance. Jarvis and teammate Don Price grabbed 2nd and 3rd in the 50-metre hurdles, with times of 7.0 and 7.1 respectively.

In the field events, the Gaels had another two-three finish in shot-put, with veteran team captain Bob Lingwood on top by virtue of a 47'1" heave. Rookie Jim Barnett was third with 43'5". Long-jumper Axel Becke added another 2nd with a personal-best leap of 23'1".

Three other Gaels recorded personal bests in the Meet; Pete Fedycznko with a 53.4 in the 400-metres, middle-distance man Tony Verhoeven with a 1:59.2 in the 800-metres, and distance runner Kip Sumner with an 8:39.0 in the 3000-metres.

The Gaels will have a full team entered in the first OUAA Indoor Track and Field competition next Saturday at the C.N.E. The development of some decent field-event competitors since last fall's outdoor meet could move the Gaels into contention.

W.I.C. News

As the end of the year (and those fatal exams) draws closer, W.I.C. activities are slowing down. Those activities still remaining are volleyball, indoor softball, and co-ed bowling.

The volleyball playoffs begin on Tuesday when PHE meets Arts'73, and Law plays Meds at 8:15 in the Bews Gym. On Thursday, at 8:15, indoor softball has Rehab against PHE. Co-ed bowling continues on Sunday.

Elections for next year's W.I.C. will be held on Wednesday March 15.

University literature courses- why is no one s

by Alec Lucas

In spite of the continuing campaign of James Steele and Robin Mathews and the promises of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, Canadian content in university curricula in the humanities and social sciences has received little attention so far. Yet what is to be studied is inseparable from issues such as personnel policy, Canadian publishing, even arrangements for guest speakers and poetry readings, and most obviously inseparable from the general question of the well-being of our culture, the bedrock of our national identity. All are inextricably united, and, as in a gestalt, no one component shifts without affecting all others.

During 1964-65, according to the B. & B. Commission survey (unpublished) of university undergraduate and graduate courses in both English Canadian and French Canadian literature, eight institutions—Carlton, Manitoba, McGill, New Brunswick, Queen's, Toronto, Western, and York—offered a total of seven undergraduate courses in Canadian literature. By 1967-68, when Canadianism was supposedly in full flower throughout the land, the same universities offered only a total of ten in Canadian literature and nine combining it with other literatures, out of a total of 250 or so courses. At the same time these schools offered fourteen courses in American literature and seven and twenty-two in which it was combined with Canadian and British literature respectively. In a course on the novel at Manitoba, for instance, Hugh MacLennan's The Watch that Ends the Night could do no better than place among the electives. This is but one example of a 'throw-the-dog-a-bone' practice that can hardly pass as a serious attempt to study our literature. Like 'Studies in' and 'Special Author' courses, it may easily become an escape hatch for those who wish to salve their consciences about the paucity of Canadian literature courses in their curricula.

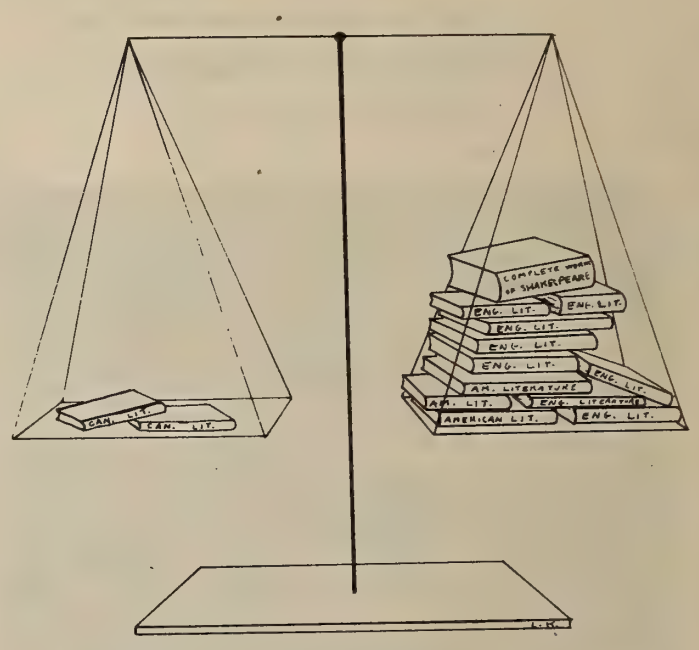
A survey of the 1970-71 offerings in literature programmes in twenty-seven Canadian universities from Victoria to Memorial and from the large to the small reveals some expansion in the number of courses in Canadian literature, but as Dr. Johnson might say, "The protuberance is scarcely obvious.' Of the 1,119 undergraduate courses given (and many more were listed), ninety-four were American literature and fifty-nine Canadian. Besides, there were forty-six admitted couplings, forty-three involving American and nine Canadian literature. The score for the eight universities mentioned above now stands at twenty-two American and eighteen Canadian.

How The Universities Rank

A simple addition discloses, then, that in 1970-71 American literature courses outnumbered Canadian by 137 to sixty-eight on the undergraduate level. Among the twenty-seven programmes surveyed, Victoria's takes first for Americanization with nine courses in American literature (in fact, Victoria has a special programme for such a study) and two combining it with British literature. Victoria offers one course in Canadian literature and one combined with American literature. Waterloo makes almost as depressing a show with five courses in American literature and three combining it with British, and only three half-courses in our own. Waterloo has, however, recently instituted a Canadian Studies programme, and, as a result, Canadian literature has gained a bit ground there. . Carleton stands first in the list for the number of courses in Canadian literature with five. Moreover, it has an Institute of Canadian Studies, Regina, with a five to two ratio, tries to strike a better balance through its Canadian Plains Area Study. The same observation probably holds true for New Brunswick with its three to two ratio.

(Queen's offers four courses dealing with Canadian literature; two are completely Canadian, one is Canadian and American, and one is Canadian, Australian and New Zealand literature. An equal number of American courses are offered, two American, one British and American and one Canadian and American. Eds.)

At the bottom of the scale are Memorial, with a one-term course, and Manitoba where Canadian literature is offered only when combined with that of the U.S. or the Commonwealth.



French-Canadian literature in English-Canadian universities is usually left to French departments, which invariably give some courses on it. However, at the University of Montreal seven courses in French-Canadian literature are given, two in English-Canadian, and two in la litterature Americane, in a total of thirty-four courses. Only four of the English-Canadian universities on my list teach French-Canadian literature as part of their programmes in literature. Yet in answer to a request for information about this question a friend wrote: "Of the ten novels we did, five were English and five French (in translation, of course).... French-Canadian literature is becoming more easily available through more and 'faster' translations.... The students found unexpected similarities between Marie Chapdelaine and Susanna Moodie...between Ringuet and Grove, between Richlar, MacLennan, Roy, etc. That is, there is something Canadian about our literature. That one cannot glibly analyze it in expository argument does not mean that it is not there."

For 1970-71 graduate programmes reflected those at the undergraduate level generally. Of some 515 courses offered, fifty-four were all or partly American and thirty were all or partly Canadian. Of these Toronto with a 61-1 score (it was 51-0 the year before), comes first or last, a better word surely for such a shameful situation, followed by McGill with 39-0, Saskatchewan with 27-0, and Victoria with 12-0.

(Queen's record is about 15- one third; of the 15 courses available, one can take Canadian literature as part of a course on Canadian, Australian and New Zealand literature. Eds.)

This assessment is more than a numbers game. Naturally, there are variables that it does not take into account—the ability of the professor, the academic standards of the courses, the number of texts, and the number and quality of the students. Yet it does indicate clearly that a 'curriculum crisis' exists and that Canadian literature has been seriously neglected. A student in a Canadian university does not have an adequate opportunity to study the literature and culture of his own country. And only one of our universities makes one course in Canadian literature a degree requirement.

(It is not a degree requirement at Queen's. Eds.)

American Staff:
American Texts:
American Themes---
They Go Together

Courses combining our literature with that of the United States supposedly demonstrate a meritorious cultural exchange, or perhaps more accurately, significant steps toward that so-called utopia, continentalism. But an examination of their composition reveals that Canada contributes little to these hybrids. Here, to illustrate, are some pertinent facts about one North American literature course. Of fifty-four books listed as texts and collateral reading, fourteen are by Canadians. Of the twenty-six weeks allotted to the course only six are given to the study of Canadian works. The proportions here, similar as they are, unfortunately, to the general pattern, suggest they will remain so in combined programmes so long as the present academic situation persists.

The implications of such a pattern is clear—in terms of library acquisitions, of staffing, especially in view of the greater number of specialists in American literature as compared with those in Canadian literature (the dismal record of the big graduate schools haunt us), and finally in terms of the student who is more apt to see his literature as a second-best and his study of it peripheral.

At this point, however, I wish to focus on the question of staff. In a recent study of the University of Waterloo, Robin Mathews found a marked co-relation between course content and curriculum and the citizenship of the acemic staff. No such study that I know of has been made of other universities, but one correspondences exist elsewhere.

Certainly freshman courses suppo McGill, 128 books were listed for first Canadian, while (exclusive, of anth productions) thirty-two were Amer dropped to 72 titles, the number of Ame and Canadian selections zooming to were spread over forty-nine sections o approximately 1,400 students, but since of only eleven sections some 1,000 McG to study Canadian literature at all.

films, and so forth. Use of Canadian books in university classes could contribute much to keeping our publishing industry independent, since today domestic publishing has less than one-fifth of the university text-book sales. In addition, the Canadian author would find a larger market immediately, one that would enlarge over the years with a concomitant growth in knowledge and appreciation of our literature. Writing in general, and hence publishing, would receive a fillip. A prosperous Canadian firm is more apt to take chances with a manuscript than is one down-at-the-heels, and I believe , more willingly than would a subsidiary of a foreign firm. Beyond all these considerations, however, at the very centre of the whole matter exists a cultural question of national concern -- the need to preserve and rediscover Canadian cultural life in the midst of what is essentially not our own.

My comments on Canadian literature are frequently greeted with jeers of some or other 'ism - parochialism, chauvinism, racism. We dread being thought less than internationalists. Yet to become internationalists we must be truly national first. Internationalism will come from having others imitate us, not from our imitation of others. Anti-Americanism and even anti-intellectualism are charges laid against academic nationalists. But an increased emphasis on our literature is narrow only if taken to mean the denial of a place for other literatures. It means rather a much larger place for our own. A Canadian self-awareness noes not automatically make for bad writing as some critics think. Furthermore, as A Dictionary of Canadianisms and Orkin's two books , Speaking Canadian English and Speaking Canadian French, make clear, our literature is also distinguishable by its language development. Most important is the Canadian imagination which gives our best writing a national but also a human significance. Morley Callaghan is not a Hemingway manque; Sinclair Ross' stories could come only from the Canadian prairies: the publishers of Hugh MacLennan's Two Solitudes did not know who the author was, but they rcognized from his approach and attitude to his material that he was neither British or American ; Colin McDougall's Execution is neither the regimental war novel of the British nor the tough rebellious war novel of Mailer and Jones. Like Roberts, Lampman, Laurence, Godfrey, Hood and others, these authors reveal a distinctive cultural perspective. The danger of losing it in the classrooms I find every bit as disturbing as the danger inherent in losing control of our economic destiny.

Dr Deutsch comments on The de-Canadianization of Queen's

(About a month ago, an article by Bill Johnston on The De-Canadianization of Queen's appeared in the Journal. It was subsequently reprinted in the Kingston Whig-Standard, along with some coments on it by Queen's Principal John J. Deutsch. Dr. Deutsch's comments are reprinted below, and a reply to his comments appears on the next page.)

"Sixty-five percent of the total full-time staff at Queen's are Canadian citizens. About 16 percent are citizens of Britain. Fewer than 10 percent are citizens of the United States.

"The present policy of the university which has existed for the past several years is to recruit Canadians where they are as well qualified as other candidates for a particular academic post. However, in a number of fields such as economics, geography, sociology, applied psychology, nursing and art education among others, qualified Canadians continue to be in short supply. In order to appoint adequately qualified persons it has been necessary to appoint non-Canadians in particular circumstances. Overall academic excellence will continue to be the essential governing factor.

"The Journal article states that the administration has not volunteered any figures on faculty citizenship in the past two years. Figures on the citizenship of faculty for the university as a whole were included in the Queen's presentation to the Committee on University Affairs in October of 1971 (pages 82 and 83.) This presentation is a public document and copies were made available to the press including the Queen's Journal. These figures show that for the university as a whole -48 (or 60 percent) of 79 new full-time appointments in 1970-71 were Canadian citizens; -34 (or 43 percent) had taken their last (advanced) degrees at Canadian universities; -33 percent of the whole full-time faculty of 764 hold advanced or last degrees from Canadian universities.

"The 10 percent (increase in the) figure for those with Canadian advanced degrees in the group of new faculty engaged during 1970-71 reflects the growth of graduate work in Canadian universities during the 1960's.

"Citizenship figures were not published by discipline or department because presentation in this form would make possible identification of individuals in certain cases. The release of such information concerning individuals would conflict with general university policy regarding disclosure of personal information. It would also invite invidious comparisons which are irrelevant by themselves to essential academic consideration.

"It must be remembered that a number of senior faculty including some department heads have lived in Canada for 10, 20 years or longer. The fact that such persons received their education elsewhere has no bearing at all on their familiarity with or undestanding of this country in which they have chosen to live and work. The Canada we have today owes a very great deal to such Canadians by choice in all walks of life. It is churlish and short-sighted to suggest that they are intruders in our universities.

"Mr. Johnston acknowledges that Queen's 'owes at least some part of its good reputation to its excellence in Canadian work.' This reputation for Canadian studies has not happened by accident as he seems to imply. It has developed because of the priorities attached to the development of Canadian studies by succeeding generations of faculty and administration in this university. But these priorities have not been based on narrow chauvinism. Universities are international in outlook or they do not deserve the name. Canadian life is rooted in western civilization and things Canadian cannot be studied in isolation.

"Queen's will always strive for improvement in its academic programmes. Although the university is already in the forefront of Canadian studies among the universities of English Canada, we are fully aware that constant effort is required to maintain this position. At the same time, we intend to strive for a balanced improvement in many other areas of study on which the general academic quality of the university depends."

A reply on p.8

Reply to Dr. Deutsch

Queen's- preparation for life in Canada

by Bill Johnston

My main concern, both in the article on which Dr. Deutsch commented (see previous page) and in this reply to his comments, is with the quality of education at Queen's and with the universities role in preserving, strengthening and passing on Canadian culture and values. Thus, the focus of that article was on course offerings and the extent to which they are Canadian or reflect the reality of Canadian life.

The quality of education at a university and its success in providing students with a clear understanding of Canadian life, or at least, of the Canadian aspects of the particular field a student is studying, are not separate things. A university in Canada only offers high quality education if that education is thoroughly grounded in Canadian reality.

This idea was made quite clear, if implicitly, in the definition of the essential functions of education which was presented in the Draft Report of the Wright Commission (the Commission on Post-Secondary Education in Ontario), of which Dr. Deutsch is a member. The report noted, that "the socializing of citizens and their preparation for life and work in our society are the two essential functions of the educational system." (page 10) Our society is Canada, and a university which lacked Canadian courses or which allowed students to graduate without having been exposed to those areas in their field of study which relate particularily to Canada will thus have failed to carry out one of what the Wright Commission called the "essential functions" of education.

It was and is my contention that in this matter Queen's is failing. While some departments in Arts and Science have a good number of Canadian courses (history has 10 and politics 12), there are a number of departments (French, economics and English are examples) which offer few. More important, however, is the fact that one does not need to take even the Canadian courses that are offered. In history, politics and sociology, no more than one Canadian course is needed to graduate with an honours BA. In English, French, economics, art history and geography, a person can graduate with an honours BA without ever having taken a course whose focus is Canada. A student should be required to take more Canadian courses in history, sociology and politics, and should have to take at least one in the other five departments mentioned as a prerequisite to getting an honours or even a general with a concentration in those subjects) degree, if Queen's is to carry out its essential functions.

This does NOT mean that things Canadian should be studied in isolation; it merely means that they should be studied. It is worth noting that, while it is impossible at Queen's, as well as undesirable, to study Canadian life in isolation from the wider world, it is possible at Queen's to study many subjects in isolation from Canadian life, a situation hardly designed to prepare a person to live in our society and a situation which should thus end.

Would the requirement that students study Canadian courses mean that Queen's would become less "international in outlook"? The answer is no. Certainly, Harvard University in the U.S. or Cambridge in Britain have long been internationally regarded as high quality universities, yet Cambridge requires history students to take at least 50 percent of their courses in British history, and English literature students to take 66 percent of their courses in British literature, while Harvard requires that 25 percent of history courses taken must be American history and 20 percent of literature courses must be American.

Moreover, a truly international outlook can only be built upon a thorough understanding and appreciation of a person's own nationality, culture, history and heritage. A person who knows little and, as a result, cares little for what happens or has happened in his own country is unlikely to be concerned with what is happening in the whole world, nor is such a person likely to be able to understand the rest of the world. A grasp of a person's own reality (ie, of Canadian reality), even if only in relation to his own field, is not a replacement for an understanding of international reality, it is a prerequisite to it.

There is another matter involved here which also relates to the idea of an international outlook. In some disciplines, particularily the sciences, there is a body of knowledge to be learned which applies in all nations, and it might therefore be assumed that, at least here, one need not be concerned with applying a particularily Canadian point of view. Yet, this assumption is not warranted because there are certain ethical questions involved in the sciences, particularily with regards to the uses to which one will allow one's scientific work to be put, which are culturally determined to some extent and which will be presented to students, along with the more universal 'facts', in the course of lectures. It is important that the basic values thus transmitted do not flagrantly violate those accepted as proper in Canada.

Finally, many Canadian universities (Queen's not included here) attempt to justify the fact that they have few Canadian faculty members by citing the international outlook they have acquired by hiring so many non-Canadians. Yet, such an "international" outlook is often nothing more than an American outlook, since at many universities most of the non-Canadians (even most of the staff) are Americans.

This, then, brings up the question of the citizenship of faculty members. This question is important only as it relates to essential academic considerations; in particular, it is important a) to the extent that a person's citizenship helps or hinder him providing his students with a solid grounding in the Canadian aspects of the discipline being studied, and b) to the extent that the citizenship of faculty members will affect the future direction of particular universities and universities in general within Canada.

It is my contention (there is evidence to support it) that people born in this country or those who have sufficient commitment to it to have taken out Canadian citizenship are more likely in general, than non-citizens to be deeply interested in Canadian life, in teaching about Canadian subjects or in using Canadian material in their courses. Departments with a substantial number of Canadians and-or with Canadian departments heads would be more likely to develop and teach Canadian courses than those in which this is not the case.

The university does not publish figures on citizenship broken down by faculty, department or for department heads as a group. To get some indication of the extent to which individual departments were dominated by either Canadians or non-Canadians, I used country-of-first-degree as an indication of citizenship (an admittedly imperfect measure which becomes more inexact the smaller the group being dealt with.) I did not contend that a university could or should discriminate against a faculty member on the basis of where he got his education; I did say that the university could and should discriminate, in hiring and promotion to certain positions, on the basis of citizenship.

The universities of most other countries of the world give very definite preference to their own citizens in hiring faculty members. Not only does this help to ensure that the country gets some return on the investment in their citizens' education, but also, this policy may be a positive stimulus to the creation of schools of thought peculiar to an individual nation. These unique schools are specially suited to dealing with the problems and issues of the nation in which they grow up, and also, because of their uniqueness, they make a greater contribution to world knowledge than outlooks or schools of thought which are mere reflections of the existing schools in other countries.

In certain disciplines, such as sociology or psychology, in which the number of Canadian graduates is few, but in which greater numbers are being produced every year, there is a danger that existing departments will fill all their available positions with foreigners now, leaving future Canadian graduates unlikely to find places to teach. This will be accentuated by the fact that universities' growth is slowing down, since fewer new positions will be created. In these fields, strong preference should be given to Canadians, even when they are not equal in past accomplishments to non-Canadians, so long as they show promise of future accomplishment. Where a department must hire foreigners to get enough teachers, visiting professorships should be stressed instead of full-time jobs.

None of these suggestions could be applied so as to penalize existing non-Canadian faculty members, since they were hired on the assumption that they would be treated no differently than Canadians. They should not suffer when and if Canadian universities and governments come to recognize that, for our universities to properly train people to live in our society, it is necessary that they give much greater emphasis to Canadian studies, and, as a result of that, to hiring and promoting a large majority of Canadians not only throughout whole universities but also within individual departments.

by Alan Broadbent

Remember all of those nights here at Queen's when you sit in your room, alone or with a group of friends, and you wonder what there is to do here in town.

You sit there and you think of all the things there are to do, you try very hard to arrive at some diversion that will excite you, titillate you, and you end up doing one of two things; you order in a pizza or you jump into someone's Barracuda and race off to Montreal or Toronto.

And when you get the pizza you wolf it down, and you then notice how greasy it is, how greasy and oily all Kingston pizzas are, and your stomach begins to speak to you, telling you it is neither excited nor titillated, just over-worked.

Or you get to Toronto or Montreal, and you rush around looking for something to do. You go to the various bars, because you are too late for a film or anything else, and you end up in a restaurant on Yonge Street or Ste. Catherine's Street eating a pizza that is greasy and oily, vaguely reflecting that you could be doing this in Kingston at a considerably lesser cost and with less fatigue.

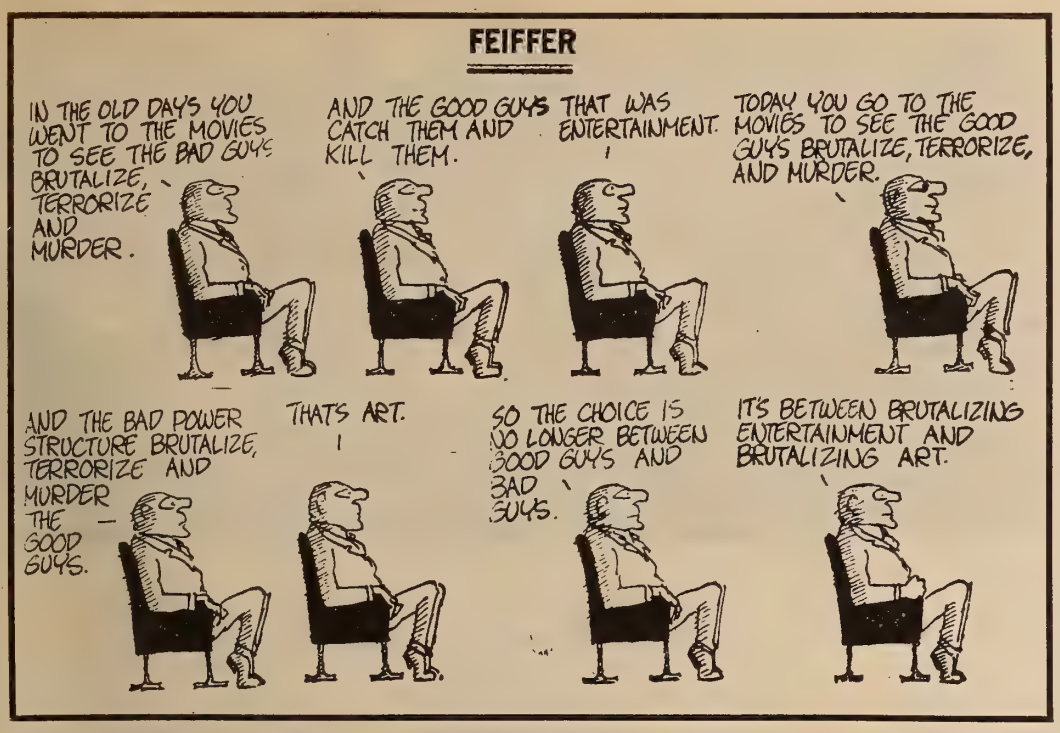
Then, after the tedium of this approach gets to you, you decide to institutionalize the tedium, and you move to the anesthetic stage, where you go out to the various bars in town, predominantly the Manor, and drink like crazy, or sit in a room less public and smoke heavily, until what to do is not a problem at that point.

You follow this intermittently tranquil route for a while, until you become thoroughly bored, somewhat neurotic, slightly paranoid, and then you decide it is time to declare that you have "been through that trip." And generally you find that you are right back where you started, sitting in a room, wondering what there is to do in town.

So you start to read bulletin boards, and you discover new things such as film societies, and clubs, and student government, and athletics. You join them, some of them, and things start to expand for you. These activities are full of new people who you have never sat in a room with before, wondering what to do.

And so you expand yourself, but pretty soon you reach the boundaries of these things to do on campus, and you want to find out what you set out to find out in the first place; what is there to do in this town.

The first answer which occurs to you is to go and find out what the town is like. So for the first time in several years, you go about Kingston with an inquisitive eye.



First you might notice the stores, at which you have bought some things in the past but never really noticed, and you see the possibilities of some of them. So you make some demands on them to get the kind of thing you might want to buy, and they, being capitalists, respond to your demands.

Then you look for entertainment, and you discover places like the Razor's Edge, of which you had seen the posters before but never quite got up the energy to go to. But now you have the energy, and you realize that these are good places with the kind of entertainment and atmosphere that sure beats sitting around in a room wondering what to do.

And after you have discovered that places like the Razor's Edge are your friends, you notice that Kingston is not such a dead place after all. There are places to walk, to read, to sit, and you begin to wonder why you used to sit in rooms at all.

When you get tired of the taking, you decide to give a bit, and you work with some of the social agency groups in the city, learning some more about the place and helping some people besides.

At this point, the greasy pizza empire collapses, and mankind is ushered into a new era over the dry crusts and yellowing cardboard boxes of a thousand neglected free delivery pizzas.

Letters on Mr. Lea, Bews expansion

Dear Editors;

On Saturday, Feb. 12, at one in the morning, I was witness to the forceful eviction of an RMC cadet from Victoria Hall. When I say forcefully, I mean that he was punched and kicked several times by Mr. Lea and one of his lackies, while offering no resistance. Whether or not the man provoked this eviction is not my objection. But the fact that Lea assaulted the man in the process should surely be brought to the attention of the Residence Board and Mr. Lea's superior, whether he thinks he has a superior or not. The fact that these "men" were very proud of their newly found brawn is enough to caution rumours that this is not an unusual circumstance.

I would hope that the AMS would at least consider this situation. It seems to me that Victoria Hall is a one man show run by Mr. Lea. He admits who he wants, when he wants and how he wants.

Dear Editors;

We commend the Bews Expansion Committee on introducing the three new "fun" sports to the Bews programme which should increase participation. It is a shame, though, that wrestling and gymnastics, two TEAM sports that allow individuals to compete against each other, should be abolished. One wonders if poor participation was the actual reason these sports were dropped or the fact that P.H.E. annually wins these titles might be closer to the truth.

Our real reason for questioning Mr. Feldman's article is his statement that the points system was revised, "hopefully to make next year's Bews race more than a competition for second place." This year's race is still not over and Mr. Feldman's belittling of Mining and Commerce '73 seems somewhat an insult.

The Hare Krishna Festival at Queen's

Yoga means to inquire. What am I? Yoga means to get out of this material entanglement and it means to know oneself. Yoga means linking yourself to the Supreme.

Bhakti-Yoga or Krsna Consciousness is the great necessity of human society. Learn it and appreciate it, comprehend it and assimilate it, and teach it. It is very simple. If you offenselessly chant Hare Krsna, everything will be revealed from within because krishna is sitting within you. The process is spiritual; it does not require any material qualifications. You will feel a change in your life, a change in happiness and a change in youth, also. Krsna consciousness is a great science; it is not a sentimental speculation regarding love. It is based on scientific propositions described in the Bhagavad-Gita, in the Vedas, and in the Brahma-Samhita; and it is accepted by authorities like Lord Caitanya, Ramanujacarya, Madhvacarya, Narada, Asita, Vyasa; there are so many authorities.

The Hare Krishna Movement began in the Western Hemisphere 7 years ago. Since then over 80 Centers have been established around the world including U.S.A., Canada, Japan, Hong Kong, Malaysia, India, Africa, Australia and Europe.

The basis of our teaching is that the difference between animal scoiety and human society is that the human society has, in some form, the ideals of Krishna Consciousness or God Consciousness. That is religion. Religion without God Consciousness has no meaning. God Consciousness means that we are eternally related with God, whom we call Krishna. Whatever we possess, including our body and self, everything, belongs to God. When one is completely in sense of this fact, he is in God Consciousness. Unless a living entity becomes God Conscious, which is his constitutional position, he cannot be happy.

It is not a question of following this religion or that religion. It is a question of philosophy of life. Our Krishna Consciousness philosophy is practical, easy and based on sound reasoning and authority. We place it before impartial, thoughtful people of the world and we are certain that they will find it sublime.

Devotee's from various Canadian centers will be on campus Wednesday to offer a presentation of what they have found to be the most effective means of self-realization: chanting the Hare Krishna, Maha Mantra.

Along with chanting and a dance we call the "Swami" a Vedic vegetarian feast will be served. (so don't eat a big lunch that day). There will be beautiful slides shown depicting Lord Sri Krishna's transcendental pastimes which He manifested on this planet 5000 years ago in India. A wide selection of Books by our Spiritual Master, A.C. Bhaktivedanta Swami Prabhupada will be available. His authorized translations and commentaries on the Vedic scriptures clear up all questions about our spiritual indentity and relationships with each other and God. Reading his books is like drinking nectar through the ears. A transcendental art display will attract the eye to the eternal form of the ever youthful Supreme Personality of Godhead, Sri Krishna.

Women's Festival

From March 10 to 12, Friday to Sunday, a Women's Festival will be presented at the University of Toronto. As far as the organizers know, this is the first of kind in Canada, although not in North America.

The aim of the festival is to include only works which express sympathy for women and are of a feminist nature. Being a women artist is not enough. This show is to present a perspective on women by women, and this type of art is still very scarce.

As Adelyn Bowland says (Toronto Citizen, Feb. 24) "Whereas with men there is no artist vs. man complex, there definitely is an artist vs. woman complex. Margaret Atwood has said that poetry 'wasn't considered a very ballsy thing to,' so that the men in her field were extremely defensive towards women poets." Even though it is not quite "masculine," art is still male-dominated.

Many women are trying to make it on men's terms only, and so refuse to ally themselves with other women. The fact that women have greatly reduced opportunities for displaying their work is not taken into account or seen as a reason to band together. Hopefully the new stress on women's culture (which certainly exists as distinct from the male, if you read such poetesses as Margaret Atwood and the late Sylvia Plath, the American genius will help women to align themselves with each other. Women have a cultural contribution to make which is as valuable as it is different from the already available male contribution.

No culture suffers from diversity. If you have participated in some aspect of art, and have used your art to express yourself as a female, you will appreciate the celebration of liberation which is happening in Toronto this month.

International Women's Day

March 8 is International Women's Day. It is a day for women everywhere to commemorate their struggle to the present and to consider the long road toward their future liberation, a struggle that involves the liberation of over half the human race, and calls for the liberation of the other half in order to secure it.

International Women's Day originated in the U.S.

The date commemorates a march on March 8, 1859, by women garment and textile workers in New York City to protest their bad working conditions, 12 hour day, and miniscule pay. As they moved from their poor living area into the more affluent section of the city, the march was violently broken up by police, who arrested many of the women. In the ensuing chaos, some of the women were brutally trampled.

In March of 1860 the women formed their first union. Forty-eight years later, on March 8, 1908, thousands of women in the needle trades industry marched again in New York with similar demands. In 1910 the Second International Socialist Congress recognized March 8 as International Women's Day.

LIGHTHOUSE SHINES!

alan broadbent

Last Friday night was a particularly cold and snowy night in Kingston. The temperatures had taken quite a dip, and the wise looked upon the evening as one designed for warm hearths and bubbling grog.

Not being one of the wise, I saw the evening as one for going over to Grant Hall to see Lighthouse, the Canadian rock-jazz group, play their third set of concerts at Queen's. Knowing something of the concert process at Queen's, I showed up for the event about 20 minutes late, aware that all concerts start late. However, I found myself standing at the end of a very long line-up for about half an hour. As the various extremities of my body began to freeze, I tried to divert my attention from my life functions to excited anticipation of the impending concert. I was only partly successful, for my toes began to freeze together, very together.

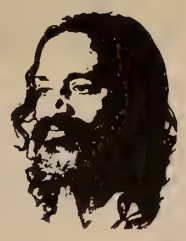
I soon gained entrance to Grant Hall, however, just before I suffered any permanent damage to my appendages. After a suitable wait for the crowd to settle, the group Riversun appeared. Riversun is apparently one of two results of the dissolution of Mash Makahn. Three members of the former group went off with one manager, and the remaining three formed Riversun with a second manager. They did a semi-folksy set which was quite generously rewarded by polite applause. The impression I got was that the other manager was a clever and persuasive chap.

Just before Lighthouse came on-stage, one of the members of the Concert's Committee took me aside to explain why the concert was starting late. Apparently the truck carrying the equipment for Lighthouse broke down in Toronto, and was consequently late in arriving in Kingston. In addition, the lead singer, Bob McBride, was in hospital, having had an operation performed to remove a growth from his throat. I was further informed that the group felt badly about the absence of McBride, and about being late for the concert, and that if the response to the group was a good one, both in terms of the audience response and any write-ups in the student newspaper, Lighthouse would come back to campus in the near future, probably sometime in early April, to play a free concert.

This appeared to me to hint of coercion, and I gamely rallied my admittedly shallow objectivety to cast a truly critical ear to the concert. However, I was much releived when Lighthouse appeared on stage and drummer-leader Skip Prokop informed us all that the truck had broken down, that "Bobby had a thing done to his throat", and that the free concert was in the works, with the setting of dates being the only real problem.

Lighthouse then began to play. And I found that this was not going to be an easy review to write. I had seen the previous Queen's concerts performed by Lighthouse and had not been too impressed. I was not particularly prepared to be impressed Friday night. I was happily surprised, a process I will try to explain.

Lighthouse works hard at playing their music, and at bringing their audience into their musical sphere. I was previously dismayed at the seeming nonchalance of the group, and their frequent self-indulgence, particularly in their solos. However, on Friday night they were disciplined and exacting in their performance, playing tightly as a unit, and communicating true dynamic energy as a result.



Lighthouse has come to know that music is what they do best, and they play solidly without the tedious-between number-hip-gettin it on-subculture-esoteric banalities that have become so much a part of the rock concert world. One number followed on the other, weaving a multi-hued Lighthouse musical fabric over an hour in length, with a total absence of trivial "jive". That seems to be a part of the disipline and musical intent of the group.

With the infirming of McBride, vocal solos were handled by various members of the group. Prokop sang many of the numbers, and the remainder were sung by the person who wrote the song. This added another dimension to the concert, a dimension of interpretation that I found to be invigorating.

The final thing that impressed me, as it must impress everyone who sees Lighthouse; was the drum-work of Prokop. Many know Prokop as a premier drummer, someone who has played with many "star" musicians in jam sessions, who has participated in one of the Al Kooper super-sessions albums. But to see the man live is a wonder. He is visible talent. Prokop could hold a stampeding buffalo herd together with his drumming, and he defines the musical fabric of Lighthouse. He is violent, flashy, and in love with his performance, but he is, above all, an extra-ordinary drummer.

By the time the group had finished the set, my toes were well-thawed, and I was about to start looking for the Journal notices of when the free concert would take place, all in good conscience.

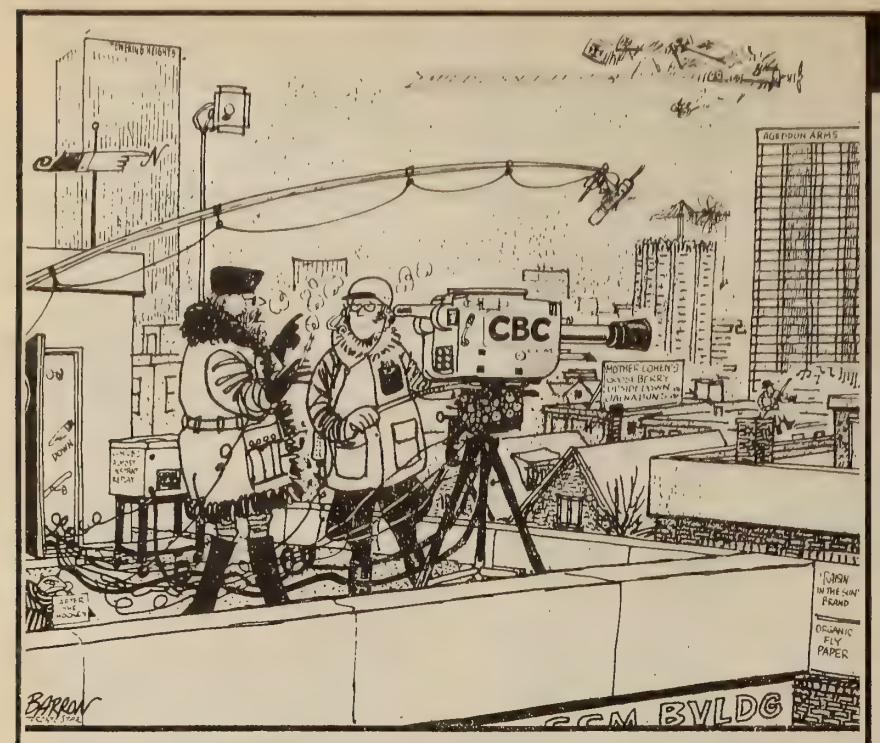
Anthony Newman — Flawless Technique

by Ian Findlay



Anthony Newman passed through Kingston on Friday night, giving a harpsichord recital at Dunning Hall on his way. At least, that was the impression left on listeners who may be accustomed to more formal concerts. The casualness of Newman's approach would not normally bear mention, except that it affected his performance in one small but important way- he has a penchant for starting his pieces before the audience has time to settle down and acknowledge his presence on the stage.

The program consisted of Bach's Partita in B minor, 30 Variations on "As I went to Walsingham" by John Bull, Bach's Chromatic Fantasy and Fugue in D minor, Couperin's Eighth "Ordre" and Bach's Italian Concerto. Newman played everything with conviction, but his style featured very rapid tempos and a lot of rubato. This was not always successful, particularly in the Chromatic Fantasy, where the effect was one of disjointedness and lack of continuity in phrasing. However, since I am rather partial to rubato in Baroque music, especially when it is part of a preconceived overall musical conception, I found the Italian Concerto the most successful piece on the program. The artist in this work managed to produce musical excitement that was both spontaneous and well thought out.

The most striking aspect of the recital was Newman's absolutely flawless technique.

CANADA

The Ontario Government has done almost nothing to meet an "urgent" situation documented 20 months ago in a confidential Government report which said thousands of children in the province were not receiving adequate mental health treatment, a senior civil servant said yesterday.

Dr. Naomi Rae-Grant, director of the children's services branch of the Department of Health, said 10 programs to expand or create new mental health services to meet the need were rejected last year by the Treasury Board.

The programs were submitted again this year and one was finally accepted by Treasury Board just recently, Dr. Rae-Grant said. This will permit construction of two assessment centres and a backup centre. But nine other appeals for more money, staff, and facilities have been rejected again, she said.

"It's a question of priorities," Dr. Rae-Grant said. "And apparently kids don't rate very high.".

The Ontario Government will pay a larger share of school operating costs this year than last, and will increase its support for French instruction in elementary schools, the Department of Education announced Friday.

The effect of these changes, combined with the previously imposed ceiling on school costs, will likely be to lower the education property tax rate in Metro Toronto. Bruce Bone, chairman of the Metro School Board, predicted a decreased mill rate but could not say how much until calculations are done.

The province is raising its share of total operating costs from 60 per cent last year to 63.5 per cent this year.

HAMILTON — Rod Stewart, a 24-year-old high school dropout from Dundas, has received a $40,000 grant from the federal Government's Local Initiatives Program to produce two pro-Communist plays he describes as "agitational progaganda."

Commenting on the LIP grant he said: "The economics of the thing are really insane and ridiculous because it's bourgeoisie economics. They (the federal Government) figure all they have to do is throw money in there and they're going to get something."

"There's a rumor that more grants will be available," he said. "The Government must really be in trouble."

TORONTO — If you're mad at your boss but can't tell him off, it will do you little good to take it out on somebody else, a Kingston psychologist said last week.

Studies have shown your heartbeat and blood pressure, fired up by your tension, revert to normal quickly only when you can be aggressive against the person who annoyed you, according to Andrew McGhie, professor of psychology at Queen's University.

OTTAWA — The Health Department has announced a nation-wide program to help transient youth with nutrition and other health matters during the summer months. A statement last week by Health Minister John Munro said clinics will be set up in various centres frequented by travelling youth. Physicians, nurses, nutritionists and dental hygienists will be available for counsel. The program will operate from June 19 to Oct. 20 in clinics along the Trans-Canada Highway and in cities such as Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver.

OTTAWA — It appears certain the government, if re-elected, intends to make some changes in the legislation that gives public servants the right to strike.

The precise nature of the changes may be something of which even the cabinet remains unsure. Clearly, however, the main objective will be to reduce or eliminate the possibility of strikes by key groups of workers.

OTTAWA — Counsel for the Quebec government Thursday questioned Bell Canada's promotion of "luxurious equipment" and methods it uses to cut off telephone subscribers who fail to pay their bills.

Bernard Lesage, lawyer for the Quebec government, questioned Bell vice-president Jean-Paul Gagnon on revenue statistics the company was using to support a demand for a 9.5 per cent increase in rates for local service to Quebec, Ontario, parts of Labrador and the Northwest Territories.

The Canadian Transport Commission is hearing the Bell request which would bring in $78.1 million if the rate increase was in effect for the whole of this year.

In his testimony supporting the application, Gagnon said the company is forced to introduce new services to meet the demands of subscribers. He mentioned the "contempra" telephone as an example.

Lesage asked Gagnon whether Bell salesmen press such "luxurious equipment" on customers no matter if they are able to pay for it or not.

A contempra telephone has the dialing device built into a stylized handle and may be either hung on the wall or used on a desk.

Gagnon said it depends on the person who is buying whether the equipment is a luxury. But he agreed that Bell salesmen are under orders to offer clients all services available.

ST. JOHN'S Nfld.— Premier Frank Moores, asking voters to put a stable government into office, has called a Newfoundland election for Friday, March 24.

He told a news conference Thursday the uncertainty left by events following the Oct. 28 provincial election made it impossible for his Progressive Conservative administration "to govern in the unstable position that we presently find ourselves...."

The riot in Bathurst, N.B.,. against delays in unemployment insurance payments will be repeated across the country unless the federal government changes its policies, according to David Archer, president of the Ontario Federation of Labor.

He said the federation believes the delays are a deliberate part of the commission's policy, announced a year ago, to crack down on chisellers.

OTTAWA — While opposition MPs made new demands yesterday that Information Canada be disbanded, Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau acknowledged that the government agency is operating inefficiently.

Trudeau told the House of Commons that Information Canada "is not working as efficiently as we would like." He said officials "perhaps ... have not been audacious enough" because of fears that opposition MPs would accuse them of putting out government propaganda.

But outside the Commons Martin O'Connell - the minister responsible for Information Canada - said the agency was "not less effective at all." He told reporters that operations have slowed to a near standstill because he is conducting a complete re-assessment "to see how we are attaining our objectives."

OTTAWA — Aging maximum-security penitentaries in British Columbia, Saskatchewan and New Brunswick should be demolished and new ones near Montreal and Kingston should be put to other uses, the governfment has been told.

UNITED NATIONS — A reported meeting in Havana, Cuba, between East German Foreign Minister Otto Winzer and Maurice Strong, secretary-general of the UN conference on the environment, caught diplomats by surprise yesterday.

The question of East German participation at the conference on the environment, in Stockholm beginning June 5, has posed a serious threat to the effectiveness of the big international gathering.

The Soviet Union and its East European allies have indicated that they may boycott the conference if East Germany isn't allowed to take part.

SALISBURY, Rhodesia — Garfield Todd, former Southern Rhodesian prime minister, and his daughter Judith are settling down to an indefinite period of restriction to a tiny area of the family ranch following the ruling of a secret tribunal announced here Thursday.

The three-man tribunal, which spent the earlier part of this week reviewing the detention orders on the Todds and black nationalists Josiah and Ruth Chinamano recommended their continued detention "in the interests of public safety and order."

Both Garfield and Judith had refused to appear before the tribunal because it was "just a rubber stamp for the government."

DUBLIN — Prime Minister Jack Lynch of the Irish Republic said Thursday that Senator Edward Kennedy was wrong to demand that Britain immediately withdraw its 15,000 troops from Northern Ireland.

In an interview, Lynch said that the British soldiers must remain to protect both the Roman Catholics and the Protestants in strife-ridden Ulster. And as for the Democratic senator from Massachusetts, Lynch said:

"I don't think he understands the situation as fully as we do.

"It requires some period of time" before the soldiers can be pulled out, the prime minister said, "to dampen down and reconcile feelings in the two communities."

LONDON — Prime Minister Edward Heath's Conservative government is plummeting in public popularity, an opinion poll suggested Saturday.

A Louis Harris poll in The Daily Express reported Labor had surged to a 14-percentage-point lead, from six in January.

The latest party figures, Harris said, were: Conservatives 39 per cent, Labor 53 per cent, Liberals and others eight per cent. In January, they were 43, 49 and eight respectively.

On these statistics, Labor would sweep to a landslide victory if a general election was held now. But in normal circumstances, the next one is not due for three years.

HONG KONG — North Vietnam yesterday attacked statements made by President Richard Nixon in Peking and accused the United States of "sowing discord" among the Communist countries.

North Vietnam's official press agency said Nhan Dan also printed a cartoon showing a two-faced Mr. Nixon holding a bomb in one hand and an olive branch in the other.

RAWALPINDI — President Zulfikar Ali Bhutto of Pakistan yesterday purged the two military officers most responsible for putting him in power last December. He accused them of "Bonapartic" actions.

At the same time, Mr. Bhutto warned that he would not tolerate breaches in law and order and implied that he would crack down on some forms of political opposition in "the higher interest of the nation."

WASHINGTON — The U.S. will sell approximately $70 million worth of arms to Greece before next June 30, the State Department announced Friday. The arms will include an unspecified number of F-4 jets plus tanks and other ground equipment.

Nixon used authority granted him by Congress to invoke the "over-riding" interests of national security to wave a congressional ban on any assistance to the military regime in Greece.

Faculty's job "not just teaching" Sinclair says

-marien

By Bob Mutrie

"Government concern over the high cost of education has led to increasing pressure on the university community to quantify the responsibilities of its faculty members."

That is how physiology professor Dr. D. G. Sinclair explains the work of the committee of which he is chairman: the senate subcommittee on the responsibilities of faculty.

In presenting a working paper from the committee, Sinclair said faculty members have a commitment to the university and the community to devote time to research, counselling, service and administration as well as teaching.

The committee was asked to consider and recommend to the senate policies to define what responsibilities faculty members have. It based its findings on an earlier report, by vice-principal (finance) Dave Bonham, who brought together the opinions of department heads on faculty service, consulting, and periods of responsibility, Sinclair said.

He said the university, being the centre of intellectual activity, performs a unique function in the community and has a responsibility to outside demands.

Every faculty member, he said, is committed to devote his professional endeavours to the university. But he cited, as an example of outside service, the work by Queen's law professor C. T. Simmons in mediating the recent strike by air traffic controllers.

The working paper, Sinclair said, tried to strike a balance between service and lecturing, stating that community service must not "detract from the performance of a faculty member's other responsibilities".

The paper does not say what the balance should be, leaving such a decision to each faculty. "Work load differs from faculty to faculty," Sinclair said.

He said the working paper is only an instrument to focus attention and draw replies and briefs, not yet a list of firm recommendations. The faculty association, for example, is preparing a response to the paper, he said.

Sinclair commented that students, as members of the university community, have as much responsibility to comment as do faculty. "Students are the ultimate consumers."

Sinclair said there would be an open meeting to talk about the report at 8 p.m. Monday, March 27, in the Collins Room of Richardson Hall.

Results of the meeting, together with any briefs submitted, will be considered by the committee, and recommendations will then be compiled for senate approval, Sinclair said.

AMS tells government its position today

By Jennifer Grass

Representatives of university student councils throughout Ontario will meet with George Kerr, Ontario minister of colleges and universities, in Toronto today, to present responses to the recommendations of the Wright Commission on Post-Secondary Education in Ontario.

Former AMS president Patrick Riley will be among them, and will present the brief he wrote and the new AMS outer council approved last week. In it he expresses agreement with the Wright Commission's comments on the financing of Ontario higher education, but fear about their "failure" to deal with the quality of education.

The Wright Report recommends that higher education be made more accessible. But, Riley's comments suggest, it does not deal adequately with the possibility that a sudden expansion of the boundaries of post-secondary education might drastically reduce its worth.

Riley's brief says the dimensions of higher education must be altered before new people can be admitted. "Increased resources must accompany increased enrolment in order to maintain the quality of educational experience for all."

A major aim of the Wright Commission was to move towards greater integration of education with work and with life. This is to be implemented by providing non-academic experiences as an alternative to formal schooling. Riley's comment urges that such alternatives not be limited to young people but be available throughout a person's life regardless of the economic benefit he may be able to derive from it.

Integration also involves decreasing the relative importance of formal academic experience for economic advancement. This is to be accomplished by increasing the weight given to practical experience in the processes of hiring and promotion. "We feel that these are sound changes, particularly in light of our obsession with the value of formal education in non-economic terms," Riley's report says.

The Commission's endorsement of open decision-making and increased faculty and student representation in decision-making bodies is welcome in Riley's brief. But it expresses concern for the scope of the powers the Wright Commission would give to Ontario government boards.

"The government may have the right to cut off or refuse operating funds for a particular program," it says, "but we do not feel that the government should have the power to terminate a program or refuse to give student aid money to participants in the program."

It also comments that the suggestion that the government should set university admission standards is unsound.

"The inaccuracy of government enrolment projections this fall and the desire to preserve institutional autonomy in the area of quality maintenance convinces us of this," Riley says.

In the area of financing, Riley's report agrees that students ought to pay a large portion of all the direct and indirect costs of their own instruction. This includes faculty salaries for teaching, a contribution to plant maintenance, and to administration. In addition they ought to pay for a portion of the costs of research that is related to instruction, Riley says.

But, it says, society should pay the costs of other research.

The Riley report suggests that the first two years of arts and science work should be free to all, becoming simply two more years of public education.

"However, more study must be done on its cost implications before it can be endorsed without reservation," the report admits.

Student league will be founded

Old and new student leaders from Queen's join with the student council officers of other universities in Toronto this weekend to found the Ontario Federation of Students.

The OFS is rising out of the ashes of the Ontario Union of Students and the embers of the Ontario Union of Student Councils – a dormant student union and an interim administrative body.

AMS presidents (old and new) Patrick Riley and Greg LeBlanc, and vice-presidents Victor Bradley and Wally Palmer, will represent Queen's at the session.

"The Ontario Union of Students was put into mothballs last spring because it was ineffectual," Riley told The Journal. But, he said, it was replaced by ad hoc conferences held last summer and fall on topics of interest to students across the province.

One such conference -- on tenure-- was held at Queen's in November. They were all organized by the OUSC, which existed only for that purpose, and financed with OUS money.

At an OUSC meeting January 6, it was decided that a formal body was needed to make student councils effective in lobbying at Queen's Park. A draft constitution was produced and has been approved by most student councils at Ontario universities – including the AMS at Queen's.

This weekend's conference will include formal adoption of the constitution and election of an executive.

Plans to establish a Canadian student association will also be discussed, Riley said. Such a body may be founded at a conference scheduled for May at the University of Windsor.

TAK planning to listen

Telephone Aid-Kingston, being organized on campus by a group of students, is scheduled to begin operation in September and has three purposes: empathetic listening, crisis prevention and referral information.

It will be directed towards members of the university community with any type of problem. This service is anonymous and confidential and will be provided between the hours of 7 pm and 7 am daily.

In September there will be an extensive training program for telephone counsellors, in which they will develop the ability to handle all calls or refer them to a suitable professional agency. Extreme cases will be referred to professionals, on call at all times.

Training will involve acquiring useful factual information and more important, a sensitivity to the mental problems callers might have. Experts from the community and from other distress centres in Ontario will conduct the training program.

TAK needs volunteers, either to train as telephone counsellors or to help with the administrative details. The only criterion is a sincere interest in people. Introductory meetings are being held at 2 and 7 pm in the second floor lounge of the Union and there will be a workshop on Saturday to give the volunteer an idea of what will be required and what will be involved in the formal training session in September.

Whether or not a volunteer becomes directly involved with TAK the sessions could be useful: they may make him better able to handle the sort of near crises often encountered with friends.

Summer school gets rep

Summer school students will have more voice in how the university is run, if the arts and science faculty board approves a recommendation which it will consider this afternoon.

The proposal, which comes from its procedures committee, is that the Queen's Summer School Association be considered a Departmental Student Council, entitled to appoint a student representative to the faculty board -- which is the body that determines curriculum and policy in arts and science.

QSSA elects an executive each August to govern students at the six-week summer session of the following year. All students in the July-August session are QSSA members.

The change would not give any more representation to May-June session students, who are assumed to be represented through existing DSC's, the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society and the AMS.

. . . in nursing

The special programme Queen's offers to graduate nurses will be abolished starting this fall.

Under the programme, which the university senate killed recently at the request of the School of Nursing, graduate nurses (those who have an R.N. qualification from a hospital nursing school) can obtain a Bachelor of Nursing Science degree from Queen's in three years.

High school graduates get a similar degree in a four-year-programme.

The separate programme is "under-subscribed and therefore too costly to maintain," nursing dean Dr. Jean Hill told the senate. There are 10 places open for entrance to the programme each year.

Graduate nurses will have to take the four-year programme in future if they want the B.N.Sc. degree.

. . . in film

Film studies courses will continue to be administered by a distinct department, which is now established on a permanent basis as a result of a Senate motion passed recently.

The motion was based on a report of the Faculty of Arts and Science, whose Faculty Board decided in January that film studies should be an independent department (it had been part of the English department until five years ago), that the department should develop to the point where it has four full-time staff members, and a that a third faculty member should be hired for the 1972-73 year.

This last decision was a matter of some debate, since it had originally been suggested that expansion of the department beyond the present two staff members should be deferred because of the cost involved. However, a strong show of student and Faculty support for the department resulted in the decision to hire the third staff member for next year.

Students should "hang in there" in their search for God, the moderator of the United Church of Canada said Sunday in Grant Hall. The Rev. Dr. A. B. B. Moore was addressing an audience of about 150 at the annual Queen's baccalaureate service.

It is difficult to find God in the space age, he said, "but the way is there even as more mountains of knowledge tumble in on us."

"The present thrust of man's investigative power is carrying him into the farthest reaches of the earth and into the darkest corners of his psyche," Moore said. "The structures of society, political, economic, racial and cultural, continue to submit to man's search."

But God will find man through the reality of truth, purpose and Christ. Man's achievements in all his fields of investigation are for others, not only for himself, Moore said.

"This is the direction and meaning of life committed to the reality of Christ. And in him we find the truth for which we search and the purpose we would serve."

Moore, elected moderator of the United Church last year, also congratulated graduating students, in whose honour the baccalaureate is held each year, on their forthcoming acquisition of "that magical piece of paper".

He is a former parish minister, president of Victoria University at Toronto, and member of the commission on church union.

Pregnancy and drugs

Thalidomide revisited. . .

by Leslie Kaye

Despite claims by North America's two FDA's (Federal Drug Administration) that they stringently test every new drug before it is sold on the open market, another drug suspected of causing fetal deformities has been found. The new drug (which is not really new; it has been on the market for ten years, but its effects have just been discovered) is called impramine, or Tofranil, or 29 other names. While the findings of Dr. Wm. McBride, who also discovered the effects of thalidomide, are not yet confirmed, the problem is too great to be ignored.

The medical consultants to Consumer Reports state that, in ordinary circumstances, the best type of drug to take during pregnancy and potential pregnancy is no drug at all. Potential pregnancy is defined as when a women is having sexual intercourse and is not using contraceptives. Unfortunately, the medical profession has been proven to be rather lax on this account.

Before 1962 physicians generally believed that the placenta was the great guardian of fetuses, except, perhaps, in the case of measles. Then there came thalidomide to end that happy dream. It has been shown through research that the placenta is not only a sieve to almost any drug, but in the case of digitoxin, dihydromorphine and trychlorethylene, fed to pregnant animals, the drugs can be found in even greater concentration in the fetal brain, heart muscles or other organs than in the maternal tissues.

In some cases drugs are necessary during pregnancy. A diabetic mother must continue her treatment, although her doctor can change her regime from an oral diabetic drug to a carefully calculated dosage of insulin. Other such drugs may be absolutely necessary if the mother is to survive her pregnancy.

Testing of new drugs by injecting them into lab animals has served a valuable purpose by arousing suspicion about the possible effects, but the tests are not, and cannot, be foolproof indicators. Whenever a drug is administered to either a lab animal or a human patient, its fate depends in considerable part upon the enzymes already present in the animal or human body. Different species of animals, including man, are not similar in enzyme content, so minute but harmful discrepancies may be missed. No drug can properly be declared safe until it has been administered to pregnant women under controlled situations, and these women bear healthy children. Obviously, there are strong moral objections to the kind of testing.

Several common drugs are known to cause problems during pregnancy. Dr. Sidney Gellis, pediatrician-in-chief of the New England Medical Centre Hospitals, states:

"Barbiturates have been shown to cause excessive bleeding in newborn infants. They of course can, when taken prior to delivery, produce excessive drowsiness and respiratory difficulty in the infant immediately after birth. Several of the antihistamines, remedies against nausea, and anti-depressants have been suspected of producing abnormalities..." he notes that aspirin and other salicylates taken in large amounts can cause bleeding, phenacetin may cause breakdowns of red blood cells, vitamins can be consumed in overdoses or if the mother takes too much during pregnancy, the child will need excessively large amounts to function normally after birth.

Just before the thalidomide disaster, a study in California showed that an "incredible number of drugs" (The Medicine Show) prescribed by physicians to 3072 women who were pregnant. Nearly 11,000 drugs were prescribed in all. 244 women received no prescribed drugs, 563 had only one drug prescribed, 617 received more than five drugs each, 121 received ten or more. A few received twenty or more different drugs. None of these calculations include self-prescribed drugs bought over the counter, or drugs that had been prescribed previous to the pregnancies. No allowance was made for drugs acting in tandem. Many of the drugs were superfluous (for skin conditions, colds, appetite depressants, etc.), although some of the drugs were no doubt essential for the woman's health.

This type of research has not been replicated since. It is hard to tell whether or not the thalidomide disaster sufficiently shocked most doctors into taking greater care, or whether the disaster is far enough into the past to have been forgotten. Such research should be done.

The following precautions should be taken by pregnant, potentially pregnant, and nursing mothers:

+ No chemical known to science has been proved to be entirely harmless for all pregnant women and their babies during all stages of pregnancy. Hence, do not take any drug unless there is a specific medical need for it.

+ "If there is a medical need, however, and if your physician prescribes a drug to meet that need, take it scrupulously, in the amounts and at the times specified. Don't increase or lower the dose; don't discontinue sooner or continue longer than directed. Remember that your unborn infant's health can be adversely affected by your indulgence in unprescribed medication.

"If you are potentially pregnant, be sure to tell your doctor so whenever he is prescribing a drug for you. If your doctor refers you to someone else while you are pregnant or potentially pregnant, be sure to tell the second doctor too.

+ "During pregnancy and potential pregnancy, curtail the use of over the counter "home remedies" as well as drugs available only on a doctor's prescription. Even common self-prescribed medicines like aspirin, for example, should be taken sparingly- except on your doctor's advice. The same goes for vitamin preparations.

+ "Interpret the term "drugs" broadly to include many things besides oral preparations and injections- for example, lotions and ointments containing hormones or other drugs that may be absorbed through the skin; vaginal douches, suppositories and jellies; rectal suppositiories; medicated nose drops; and so on.

+ "A number of drugs exert their adverse effects during the first weeks following a missed menstrual period- the weeks when you are likely to be wondering whether you are pregnant. Hence discontinue all prescribed remedies within a few days after an expected menstrual period fails to occur, and recheck with your doctor concerning drugs prescribed for you previously.

+ "Mothers who breast-feed their babies should continue to excerise prudence until weaning time. Numerous drugs taken by the mother are secreted in her milk and reach the nursing baby." (The Medicine Show)

Most malformations are caused by factors other than drugs. Drug hazards are not stressed because bad results are likely to occur, but because, when they do, they can be so devastating, and could have been so easy to avoid.

Southern Afric

by Frank Okoh

Southern Africa is more than a geographical unit; it is also the only remaining area of Africa excluding Portuguese Guinea in West Africa where European-ruled states predominate. During the past decade, the ties among these European-ruled states with African majorities have grown. There are historic roots to this growing nexus of alliances, communications, investment and protection, roots which grew in the nineteenth century when the Portuguese and the Afrikaaner seemed destined to suffer subjugation under "Bantu and Briton." The fear that unites Southern Africa's whites is not new, but the closer unity in action has been caused by events that have not received much attention- the rise of guerilla movements in the Portuguese colonies. For over a decade now, Portugal has waged a war which in proportion to her resources and population is a bigger thing than the Vietnam war, but very few seem to have noticed.

Portuguese propaganda has been successful in creating the illusion of a lush-tropical paradise. Amilcar Cabral, the New Guinea guerilla leader, tells of his experience at an All-African Peoples' Conference in Tunis: "One African delegate to whom we tried to explain our situation replied in all sympathy, 'Oh, it's different for you. No problem there- you are doing all right with the Portuguese.' "

The Liberation Movements all started in the 1960's. It is no coincidence that this was the same decade that saw the attainment of independence by many African countries. After a careful class analysis, the Imperialist countries, notably Britain and France, decided that if they did not make a deal with the reformist Nationalists, they would have revolutionaries to deal with. The Portuguese reaction was different. They have always regarded their colonies as part of metropolitan Portugal and as an official once said, "For us to grant independence to our overseas provinces is as unthinkable as America giving independence to Alaska." With that kind of thinking, it is no surprise that the authorities resorted to violence against anyone who talked of independence.

Peaceful demonstrations were brutally attacked. On June 7, 1960 at Mueda (in Mozambique), there was a major demonstration against Portuguese rule. This demonstration, though passing unnoticed by the rest of the world, acted as a catalyst on the region. Over 500 people were shot down by the Portuguese soldiers, and many who up to that time had not considered the use of violence, denounced peaceful resistance as futile. As everywhere else, the very severity of repression created the necessary conditions for the development of a strong militant, nationalist movement. The excesses of the regime destroyed all possibility of of colonial rule for some time to come.

The Portuguese reacted predictably to the first signs of guerilla activity. "A band of reform which, by improving conditions a little, might have secured the main interests bandits. Good Portugue the im-portance of the population. An army captain is said to have replied to the following quote from Chairman Mao, "Guerillas are like fish in the sea...", with a cryptic "Dry the sea." Unfortunately for him, it is no easy task to dry the sea. Armies are reduced to trying to win over people's hearts, so to speak. "Today the possession of territory is unimportant; it is the population that is important...", Admiral Rogerio de Castroe Silva, director of the Naval Institute of War at Lisbon, said in 1969. "The people are not fighting for ideas, for the things in anyone's head. They are fighting to win material benefits, to see their lives go forward....", Amilcar Cabral, the guerilla leader, has said.

It is little wonder that both sides lay emphasis on what to do with the masses. On the colonialists side, there is now widespread regroupment of the population into strategic villages known as "ALDEAMENTOS." For example, in the Cabo Delgado district of Mozambique, the Portuguese established one of these, destroyed all crops and herded 250,000 people into settlements defended by troops and militia. People are being driven into such hamlets all over Angola, Mozambique and Portuguese Guinea. An intensive effort is now being made by the Portuguese to win the support of the people in the aldeamentos and in the urban areas. Education and health facilities and other modernizing programmes have been significantly speeded up. The guerillas can justifiably claim to be responsible for these changes.

The guerillas, on the other hand, are doing their best under very difficult conditions to improve the lot of the people in the territories they control. As they liberate more areas, they begin to need help of a different sort from their sympathizers abroad. It is still important to denounce Portuguese imperialism but it is more fruitful to help alleviate the hardships of the victims of imperialism. Medical supplies, school supplies, clothes, blankets, etc. are needed. It was in recognition of these needs that the World Council of Churches contributed a substantial portion of its "funds to combat racism" to the Southern African liberation movements. The African Liberation Study Group here on campus is raising money for the same purpose.

Has the rise of the Liberation Movements done any good? It has been pointed out how the rise of the movements has created a situation of "dual power" in the colonies. This alone is a good thing. The Portuguese are beginning to realize that military power alone is not enough if Portugal is to continue to exercise any control over its colonies. Previously governor generals of the colonies were told to bear in mind their civilising mission among the Africans, but on May 20, 1968, at the swearing-in ceremony of a new governor for Portuguese Guinea, the Minister of Overseas Affairs had this to say: "The well-being and prosperity of the masses has a high priority in administrative goals." This could be just rhetoric but it is certainly a far cry from the patriotic rhetoric of Salazar that declared that Portugal- black or white- did not care for material things. The willingness of the Africans to support the guerilla movements has made the authorities think again.

Even more important than the changes the Portuguese have been forced to make are the changes the liberation movements have brought about in the areas they control.

The rise of the liberation movements has caused another change in Portugal's attitude. Before the 1960's, Portugal was very wary about letting other powers into its colonies, either as missionaries or investors, with the result that the resources of the colonies went largely untapped. However, as a result of the war in her colonies, Portugal has been forced to involve other countries in the colonies. It is easier to get NATO weapons if the safety of the investment of NATO nationals is in jeopardy. As a result, mining and manufacturing has mushroomed in the colonies. Portugal always knew that it had a good thing in possessing the colonies, but the discoveries made since the war have made them really precious.

Ironically, one effect of the people's fight to shake off colonial shackles has been to expose the tremendous potential of the areas unvolved and to heighten Portugal's desire to stay. Huge hydro-electric projects, Kunene in Angola, Cabora Bassa in Mozambique, are being jointly developed by the Portuguese and South Africa and will provide a vast flow of power, some to be sold, much of it to be used in further development, which will encourage white immigration. This explains why the movements oppose all this "progress." With the inflow of white immigrations, their task becomes harder. Very few people in the position of the whites in Southern Africa will hesitate to support a government that assures them so comfortable an existence.

However, even if the Portuguese authorities succeed in attracting more whites, it still has the problem of its limited man power. Even though it can and does recruit black troops, the assignments the troops can undertake are limited. The Portuguese, for obvious reasons, do not trust them. Portugal is a poor country that depends heavily on its allies. A change in the political climate in the allies' countries will dramatically effect Portugal's ability to carry on. A sustained public campaign against support for Portugal is needed. The withdrawal of Swedish and Italian companies from the Cabora Bassa project was victory for public protest.

More organisation and public education will be necessary if the international supporters of the Southern African regimes are to be forced to change their ways. Victory for the liberation movements is inevitable, but popular action by progressive elements can help bring it about more quickly. A fund raising campaign being held at Queen's offers one way for people to express their solidarity with the struggle in Southern Africa.

Two Canadian companies side with the oppressors

Two Canadian companies, the Aluminum Co. of Canada and Reynolds Cable Co., Ltd., are involved in the building of the Cabora Bassa hydro-electric power development, an involvement which constitutes a violation of Canadian law. Yet, the Canadian government has refused move against their involvement.

The Cabora Bassa project is being built by a consortium of South African, German and French companies which has contracted with a Portuguese company, Quintas Y Quintas, for fabricated wire and cable.

Quintas Y Quintas, in turn, made arrangements last year to buy 12,000 tons of aluminum rods for this purpose from Alcan and Reynolds.

It appears quite clear that these sales violate the United Nations sanctions against trading with Rhodesia, which sanctions became part of Canadian law by government order-in-council of Dec. 20, 1968. The regulations provide, in effect, that no one in Canada shall directly or indirectly trade with anyone in Rhodesia.

The most relevant provision as far as Cabora Bassa is concerned reads: "No person shall knowingly do anything in Canada or in any other place to promote or that is calculated to promote the export from Rhodesia of any goods produced or manufactured in Rhodesia to any other place."

There is a great deal of information, public and official, that indicates that the project will be a major impetus to the Rhodesian economy and a great stimulus, during and after construction, to the export of Rhodesian goods and manufactures. For instance, a brochure written by the chairman of the National Export Council of Rhodesia, describes the dam as "probably one of the greatest opportunities ever to come the way of Rhodesian manufacturers."

It is so clear that this project will help Rhodesia, in fact, that Britain, Sweden and Italy have either forbidden or discouraged their corporations from participating in its construction, on the grounds that the mandatory UN sanctions against Rhodesia forbid it, and even the U.S. government's export-import bank has indicated that it is now prepared to assist U.S. companies to participate in construction.

Canada, too, is committed under the UN charter not only to enact the Rhodesia sanctions but to enforce them, and it is the responsibility of the federal minister of justice to initiate prosecutions.

No such prosecutions has been initiated.

Letters:

Physical Education or secretarial science?

It's "show a little sympathy for a fourth-year phys-ed student" week. You will be able to recognize one of these poor creatures easily; he or she will be typing or reading the typed copy of his or her fourth year thesis, agonizingly measuring the width of the margins, weeping over an accidental split infinitive or pouring over the essay handbooks to ensure that the footnotes and bibliography are correct.

The reason for this activity is simple; the rules which govern the marking of theses (which are a degree requirement) in phys-ed stipulate that 50 per cent of a student's thesis mark will be based on his or her perfection in spelling, grammar, punctuation, underlining, properly centering typed copy on a page and using the established form in footnotes, bibliography and table of contents.

Which means that the content, all the research, thought and writing skill, account for only 50 per cent.

Credit for this intriguing marking scheme appears to go to the head of the thesis committee in phys-ed, Jake Edwards, who alone will be marking the secretarial aspects of the theses.

Lest you over-hastily jump to the conclusion that it is assinine for the culminating work of a person's four years in phys-ed at Queen's to be marked 50 per cent on its appearance, pause and consider what the implications would be if the faculty let up on its severe standards. After all, would you want the school kids of this country to be told to do push-ups by someone who cannot punctuate? Or to have football teams coached by people who cannot footnote?

The fact that these regulations will force many students to type their own essays, whether or not they can type (since, with half your mark riding on the typing job, who would want to farm out such a key task to a mere typing service) or that a brilliant idea would count for as much (or as little) as several misplaced commas, must not blind us to what seems to be really important in Mr. Edwards conception of the phys-ed school. Form, grace, precision, style... by these shalt thou be judged.

Jocks of Queen's unite, and join us in a rousing chorus of that song that must be a phys-ed faculty favourite- M I C K E Y M O U S E !

No reply

Dear Editors:

In the past two or three months, I have written inquiring letters to the Minister for External Affairs, the Minister of Finance, the Solicitor General, the National Parole Board, and the Office of the University Campus Planner at Queen's.

I have received courteous and even informative letters in reply from all but one of those places.

Guess which of my letters has not been answered.

You're right.

Children's Aid

Dear Editors;

May we commend you on the service rendered by describing local resources available to women whose pregnancies are undesired.

We would like to bring to the attention of your readers the fact that alternatives other than abortion or keeping the child do exist, ie: adoption placement or temporary foster care. These facilities are provided by Children's Aid Societies, as are other forms of assistance such as referral to maternity homes or private boarding homes for the expectant mother. Our services also include objective counselling by social workers; which is not weighted either in favour of terminating the pregnancy or in favour of carrying the child to term.

Children's Aid Societies have many years of experience in helping unmarried mothers to reach decisions suited to their needs as well as to those of their children. In Kingston we are located at 173 Princess Street, telephone number 542-7351.

AMS Court

Dear Editors;

The recent letters concerning the AMS Court have brought to mind one very important question concerning the Court. This concerns the apparent conflict of interest in the case of one junior justice.

It is incredible that a member of the newly elected Outer Council is also a member of the AMS Court. Incredible because it is the Outer Council which appoints the Court in the first place, upon the recommendation of the Internal Affairs Commissioner, and which can ultimately overrule decisions to prosecute.

Surely the junior justice involved must see the difficulties which could arise from this. A decision should be made to either remain on the Court and resign from Outer Council, or to remain on Outer Council and resign from the Court. Only in this way can the neutrality of the Court be maintained if it is called upon to ajudicate.

Perhpas the Judicial Commission might instruct the Court to rule on the right of a justice to sit on Outer Council while still serving the term on the Court. Perhaps some "reform from within" should be made.

Ed. notes

Dear Editors;

I have noticed of late (and with some dismay), the increasing use of editors notes to reply to letters to the editors which appear in the Journal. On occasion, you have bordered on boorishness in your refutation of the points of view expressed by the missives (sometimes misguided) that appear in the Letters column. Perhaps I might suggest some guidelines to follow in the future

- Don't debate opinions expressed in the letters. Notes or points of fact are entirely reasonable. Most of your readers are eminently capable of arriving at their own opinions on the validity of a letters postulates.

- Don't ridicule the opinions of others; an elementary maxim of courtesy.

- If you don't have anything to say, say nothing. Your comment on Peter Adam's letter of last Thursday said very little to the point and in my opinion was unworthy of you.

- Don't take any negative comments on the Journal as personal slights. Your counter-attacks usually have a very strident quality.

To sum up, notes if necessary, but not necessarily notes-apologies to Mackenzie King.

-Stephen Probyn

(Ed. note: Thanks for keeping us on our toes. Our basic policy fits the one you outlined, but sometimes we forget, or, in a fit of Toronto Sun-ishness, we ed-note everything in sight.)

"Take two aspirin and stay in your bed"

The Chickasaw Environmental Association in Memphis, Tenn., recently announced the results of an important experiment the group carried out- determining whether Vitamin C can cure a river of water pollution.

Researchers fed 1,000 milligrams of Vitamin C to one polluted stream, 500 grams of a buffered aspirin compound to another, and a placebo to a third stream. After 50 days, water from each stream was tested.

According to John Walley, "The pollution level of each water sample was found not to be materially altered." In conclusion, the group stated, "River pollution may be harder to cure than the common cold."

Tremblant Weekend

--A Queen's Tradition

By John Telgmann

Last Friday five buses filled with enthusiastic skiers, left for the weekend of skiing at Mt. Tremblant -- the biggest ski trip ever in the Club's history.

The buses did not get far when most of the passengers asked that they stop at the King Street Brewer's Retail. After numerous cases were stowed away and the buses on their way, the rowdiness began and did not end until 11:30 pm Sunday.

The buses loaded with 230 skiers had different destinations in the Tremblant area since several hotels were completely accommodated.

Saturday morning was a rise and shiner to hit the icy slopes by 9:30, but the ice did not seem to discourage too many skiers. Many sore muscles and bruises proved very sorely that the conditions were not good. Saturday night several of Tremblant's pubs offered the appropriate remedy. Many parties sprang up in the St. Jovite Chalet rooms. Ray again brought his stereo equipment which kept the more exhausted skiers up late and woke up the keeners in the morning at 7 a.m.

Sunday morning was a rise, but in most cases not a shiner, as people stumbled off the buses and onto the slopes. Snow had fallen most of Saturday night, providing good conditions on Sunday to the satisfaction of everyone. Unfortunately most people were quite tired. With the weekend nearly over at 4 pm Sunday, a large group of hot-shot skiers lined up on the top of the Mountain for the last run -- a schuss to the lodge -- a 4000 ft. vertical drop at speeds up to 50 mph. Pete Martin won the informal event with outstanding speed and lots of guts.

The buses sadly rolled out of Mt. Tremblant, but happily picked up some beer (a present from the Manager of Hotel St. Jovite) to see the students back to campus.

Reminder Concerning the Application of the New Academic Rules to Students Beyond Year I

The new rules governing temporary withdrawal and permanent withdrawal stated on pages 14 and 15 of the 1971-72 Calendar will take effect, for all students on a degree program in the Faculty of Arts and Science, on September 1, 1971. The new rules will not apply retroactively until 1975 and thus failures and attempts accumulated before September 1, 1971, will not be counted until 1975. Students who take only four courses this year must pass three (i.e. three full courses or the equivalent in full and-or half courses).

off the record

By Dick Loney

The addition of Larry Knechtel to the rock group named Bread could spell the end of a lot of superb album production by some of your favourite artists, if he's restricted to any kind of exclusivity clause by his mates. Try to imagine Simon & Garfunkel's award-winningest Columbia l.p. "BRIDGE OVER TROUBLED WATERS" without Knechtel -- it's like the Bruins without Esposito and the guy on the right point.

Larry's talents on piano in particular -- but also on harmonica and bass on more than a few albums -- as well as on guitar and anything with a keyboard attached to it, have been only fully recognized, until recently, by the music-trade people; while it's true that many of us have unknowingly appreciated his playing on the multiplicity of albums embellished by his musicianship.

But make no mistake -- Bread was not an ailing musical institution on the pre-Knechtel period. Even the departure of Robb Royer, who teamed with encumbent Bread-man James Griffin on a lot of excellent compositions, did not phase the solidity of this four-man powerhouse of American rock.

In addition to the new pianist and Griffin, Bread is guided by the tunesmithing and pleasing voice of David Gates, who just happens to handle guitar, bass moog and violin with as much distinction as any previous musician out of Tulsa, Oklahoma; while the fourth talented segment of the group is filled by Michael Botts their right-on percussionist.

Fourth album in a distinguished discography for Bread is entitled "BABY I'M A WANT YOU", (Elektra EKS-75015) after the hit of the same name. Another chart-topper is included -- their current AM outing "Everything I Own", and to say that these two songs which surged to the pinnacle of the hit marketeers' ratings are not the set's best, only points up the truth that you cannot find a bad cut on this Bread album.

There are twelve songs, of which your ear might be inclined toward -- "Dream Lady", "Diary", "Daughter", or the raucous country-oriented "This Isn't What The Government", or the politico-rocker, "Mother Freedom". To recommend cuts, however, is to solidly endorse the entire collection. If you're inclined toward the soft-rock stylings which trademarked the earliest Beatle albums, combining an exciting ability to lace a song with a strong back beat, or soothe it into submission with Mancini-like strings -- do yourself a favour and pick up on an oddity -- a twelve-song workout by the most engaging and talented of the current crop of American rocksters -- Bread -- they sing purty too!

Speaking of Larry Knechtel, it is ironic that some of the premier cuts on the hot-selling solo Paul Simon Junket (while Art G. is picking up a bit of Carnal Knowledge) just happen to feature the harmonium, electric and grand piano of the same Larry K. Paul will doubtlessly be praying that Bread will be lenient in allowing Larry to pick up some extra "bread" by doing studio sessions in the future.

Songs from Simon on this album are very listenable, in particular when he re-unites the quartet that allowed "BRIDGE" to sell many millions of copies. "Congratulations" works Paul's exciting folk guitar, Larry the K's pianos and organ with the bass and drums of Joe Osborne and Hal Blaine respectively. "Papa Hobo" is a song of Paul's which has been reworked considerably since not a few people were turned off by the personality, or lack of same, which Paul displayed when performing it on the Carson talk-show some months ago. He may be a repulsively ignorant little rodent, but he sure can sing & play -- and that's what comes across on his album -- perhaps the success had expanded Simon's hat size, but then that's just show biz.

"Mother and Child Reunion" is the hottest item lifted from this collection, but it is interesting to see that Paul has picked up a guitar player who worked on the second McCartney album -- one Dave Spinoza -- and fits him in on "Run That Body Down" and "Me and Julio". Simon's guitar and Knechtel's keyboards are united on the lilting softness that underlays a well-needed musical put-down of amphetamines -- "Taking downs to get to sleep — and ups to start you on your way". The tune is called "Everything Put Together Falls Apart", perhaps lifted from the Yeat's poem "The Second Coming".

Maybe it'll be a while 'till Simon gets back with Garfunkel, but in the event that it doesn't happen, we are fortunate in having the authorially-inclined half of that dynamic duo pumping out the odd solo album -- PAUL SIMON - Columbia KC-30750.

It's been eight years or more in coming, but the Five Man Electrical Band, from Ottawa, have finally made it in the record business -- their new album seems to be an announcement that the time has arrived for these five young men to savour a bit of the success which a lot of far-less-talented Canadian groups have been hogging. Appropriately titled "COMING OF AGE", the original concept for the album had been jelling in the mind of lead guitarist-composer Les Emmerson for some time.

As far back as two or three years ago, Les introduced a song from the stage of what he always playfully referred to as "Grant Tomb", and now the same tune is one of the hottest cuts on the album -- "Julianna". Their release is handled by MGM's subsidiary Lionel Records in the States (Polydor Records in Canada-2424-047).

It's all been uphill for the 5-Man E. Band since they were driving through the corn-country of the American mid-west last June, and were jolted from as sound a sleep as four guys and one tired driver can indulge in, while touring in a dilapidated '61 Meteor. The sweet sound of success that blared in full AM Radio-activity was the sound of WLS in Chicago plugging their song "Signs" as a "Hit Of The Future". The whirlwind tour that kept the five guys from any leisure until their Christmas return to an Ottawa holiday did much to place the group in the eye of the American record-buying public. ("Signs" went on to sell a million and a half copies).

"COMING OF AGE" leads off with a by-play between Moog Synthesizer, and the smaller ARS electronic-impluse creating machine, simulating at its best the full-toned brass sound of a large horn section. the title tune allows Les and pianist Teddy Gerow ample opportunity to strut their intricate guitar and piano solo-weaving, while Brian Rading fills in on bass, and the Belanger brothers shade in the percussion.

"Find The One" is a ballad-style offering (all tunes are penned by Emmerson) which features Les up front vocally, while Rick Belanger handled the lyric on "Coming Of Age".

"Absolutely Right" is that Brazilian-beat rocker that followed the single success of "Signs" on the charts with Emmerson's voice blending in with the coral-like Beach Boy voicings of the other four electrical bandeers. "Country Girl" is a tripartite exploration of three of the musical blends which current rock derives from – "Country Girl of Mine" presents Les singing about "where his roots are" -- which definitely falls into the country bag. Les began his career knocking around the business-end of a lead guitar for Hughie Scott, who still manages to pack crowds in the Ottawa-Hull territory -- and the country-roots that Les sings of recall the early gigs he worked at such meccas of country-solidarity as Antler Lodge, Rideau Ferry, Ont.

The second son in the threesome brings Rick's bluesy voice in on a hard-straight-rocker called "The Devil And Miss Lucy", which tells of the country girl's disillusionment as she becomes a city girl. The final ballad segment is entirely the property of drummer Mike Belanger, who displays incredible range in singing "She Used To Be My Woman" -- the farewell to the revamped country girl.

"Julianna" and "Friends & Family" open up side two which also features a little studio fun with various members of the families of the group and some friends thrown in on vocal support on "Isn't It A Long Hard Road". A chronicle title "Me And Harley Davidson" leads into the reprise of "Whole Lotta Heavy" which fades out into a rephrasing of the opening moog notes of the album -- making for a rather open-ended or circular effect which prompts one to flip the record over and do it all again. Truly an album that stands up to continuous play, COMING OF AGE by Ottawa's Five Man Electrical Band.

TORONTO — People who "live better electrically" are indirectly polluting the environment and sowing the seeds of a world-wide resources shortage, Toronto science writer Leonard Bertin said Saturday.

In a lecture for the Royal Canadian Institute, Bertin claimed the ever-increasing demand for electricity is worsening air pollution by increasing the activities of heat and smoke-belching electrical generating plants.

And at the rate at which fossil fuels such as coal, oil and natural gas may be consumed to produce electricity and other forms of energy over the next 100 years, the world could eventually face a disastrous shortage of resources, Bertin warned an audience at the Univesity of Toronto's Convocation Hall.

Bertin, U of T science editor also emphasized: "These same fossil derivatives that we burn so wantonly as fuels are also our principal source of raw materials for countless items used in medicine and industry."

But "far from being concerned at this apparent extravagance, the power utilities adopt an attitude that the more energy they deliver, the lower will be the unit cost of electricity."

QUEBEC — More than 10,000 union members massed at the Coliseum Monday night to show support for the three labor bodies representing 210,000 public and para-public Quebec employees.

They met to back their demands in wage negotiations between the government and the three labor groups, just three days before a vote that could authorize a 24-hour general strike.

The common labor front, comprised of the Confederation of National Trade Unions, the Quebec Federation of Labor and the Quebec Teachers Corp., was formed last year in an effort by the unions for a single bargaining team to negotiate wage settlements.

The government has refused to meet at a single bargaining table, arguing that it cannot negotiate nurses' salaries alongside those of teachers and Hydro workers.

TORONTO — Ontario Place will raise its admission fees because it lost $2.2-million during its first year of operation.

Admission for adults will rise from $1 to $1.50 while fees for students will increase from 50 cents to 75 cents. Those over 65 and under 12 will continue to be admitted free.

Trade and Industry Minister John White, who managed to smile throughout a heated press conference Monday, admitted he was not satisfied with the first year's performance, which meant that almost $1 per head was lost for each one of the 2,300,000 persons who visited the site.

He said several changes, including hiring of a full-time manager, plus construction of additional facilities, were planned.

TORONTO — McClelland and Stewart, the largest Canadian-owned publishing house, recorded its biggest sales and profit in 1971, despite being on the verge of bankruptcy at one point last year.

President Jack McClelland credited a $961,000 Ontario government loan for giving the company enough working capital "to publish some good books" and make a net profit of $228,470 on net sales of $4.8 million.

TORONTO — A one-man inquiry into the closing of the Toronto Telegram last year has been set up by the Ontario Government.

Labor Minister Fernand Guindon said Monday he would make a statement in the House Tuesday about the appointment and would table the terms of reference of the inquiry.

The Toronto Telegram ceased publication at the end of October last year, putting about 1,200 people out of work.

The investigator will be Donald Douglas Carter, a law professor at Queen's University. Mr. Guindon said outside the House the inquiry will begin on April 23.

OTTAWA — Indian Affairs Minister Jean Chretien, interviewed Sunday on a television program, dismissed as "stupid" a government report that said his department is allowing oil exploration in the Northwest Territories to take precedence over the interests of the local inhabitants.

Chretien said the matter of resource development in the north must be kept in perspective.

He said it was possible— as had been shown on Banks Island—that oil exploratory seismic work and native trapping could continue without either hindering the other.

OTTAWA — Food prices continued their upward climb last month, sending the cost-of-living index up by more than another half-point.

Statistics Canada today reported the consumer price index rose to 137.3 in February from 136.7 in January. The food index rose to 137.6 from 136.4.

In other words, it cost $13.73 last month to buy what $13.67 bought in January for a broad spectrum of consumer goods and services of all kinds.

Progressive Conservative Leader Robert Stanfield Tuesday night unveiled an election strategy based on the creation of jobs and trims in government spending before more than 2,000 cheering supporters at the Royal York Hotel.

The Opposition leader, in good form as he talked to Conservatives who paid $100 a plate to listen, said restoration of the confidence of businessmen and the unemployed in government policies was the main task before the party.

While taking jabs at some spending programs of the government of Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau, Stanfield gave what he called "commitments" in six areas. Most of them involved getting the economy moving again.

"Jobs can be created where they must be created, in the private sector, by dealing with the main weakness that exists there now," he said. "That weakness is lack of confidence."

He promised incentives that would appeal to the initiative of Canadian businessmen.

"We will give them a chance to perform, and that is a commitment."

"No fight against inflation will be waged in callous disregard of the cost in jobs. That is a commitment."

BARCELONA, Spain — Yves Geoffroy tried to commit suicide while in custody, Spanish police said Wednesday.

The convicted wife-killer who fled Montreal Christmas Eve while on leave from prison to marry, was arrested with his new bride in their hotel Sunday.

"Well, I'd rate Muskie and McGovern as small 'l' liberals, Humphrey as a large 'C' Conservative and Wallace as a large 'B' Bigot."

THE WORLD

MANCHESTER, N.H. — Senator Edmund Muskie turned back a surprisingly strong surge by South Dakota's Senator George McGovern to win the New Hampshire primary Tuesday. The Maine Senator, however, failed to get a majority, putting in question his standing as the front-runner for the Democratic presidential nomination.

In the Republican primary, President Richard Nixon crushed the opposition in the first direct referendum on his administration and his policies. He decisively defeated Representatives Paul McCloskey of California and John Ashbrook of Ohio.

With almost all votes counted these were the standings:

Democrats: Muskie 32,125 votes, or 48 per cent; McGovern 23,983, or 36 per cent; Mayor Sam Yorty of Los Angeles, 4,407, or 6 per cent; Edward Coll, 245 votes, or less than 1 percent; Representative Wilbur Mills of Arkansas, 3,145 write-in votes, or 5 per cent; Senator Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, 694 write-in votes or 1 per cent.

Republicans: Nixon 53,139 votes, or 69 per cent; McCloskey 15,228, or 20 per cent; Ashbrook 7,517, or 10 per cent; Comedian Pat Paulsen 798 votes, or 1 per cent.

NEW YORK — Premier Pham Van Dong of North Viet Nam planned to go to Paris to push the Viet Nam peace talks but the trip was aborted by a January speech by President Richard Nixon, columnist Joseph Kraft says in The New Yorker magazine.

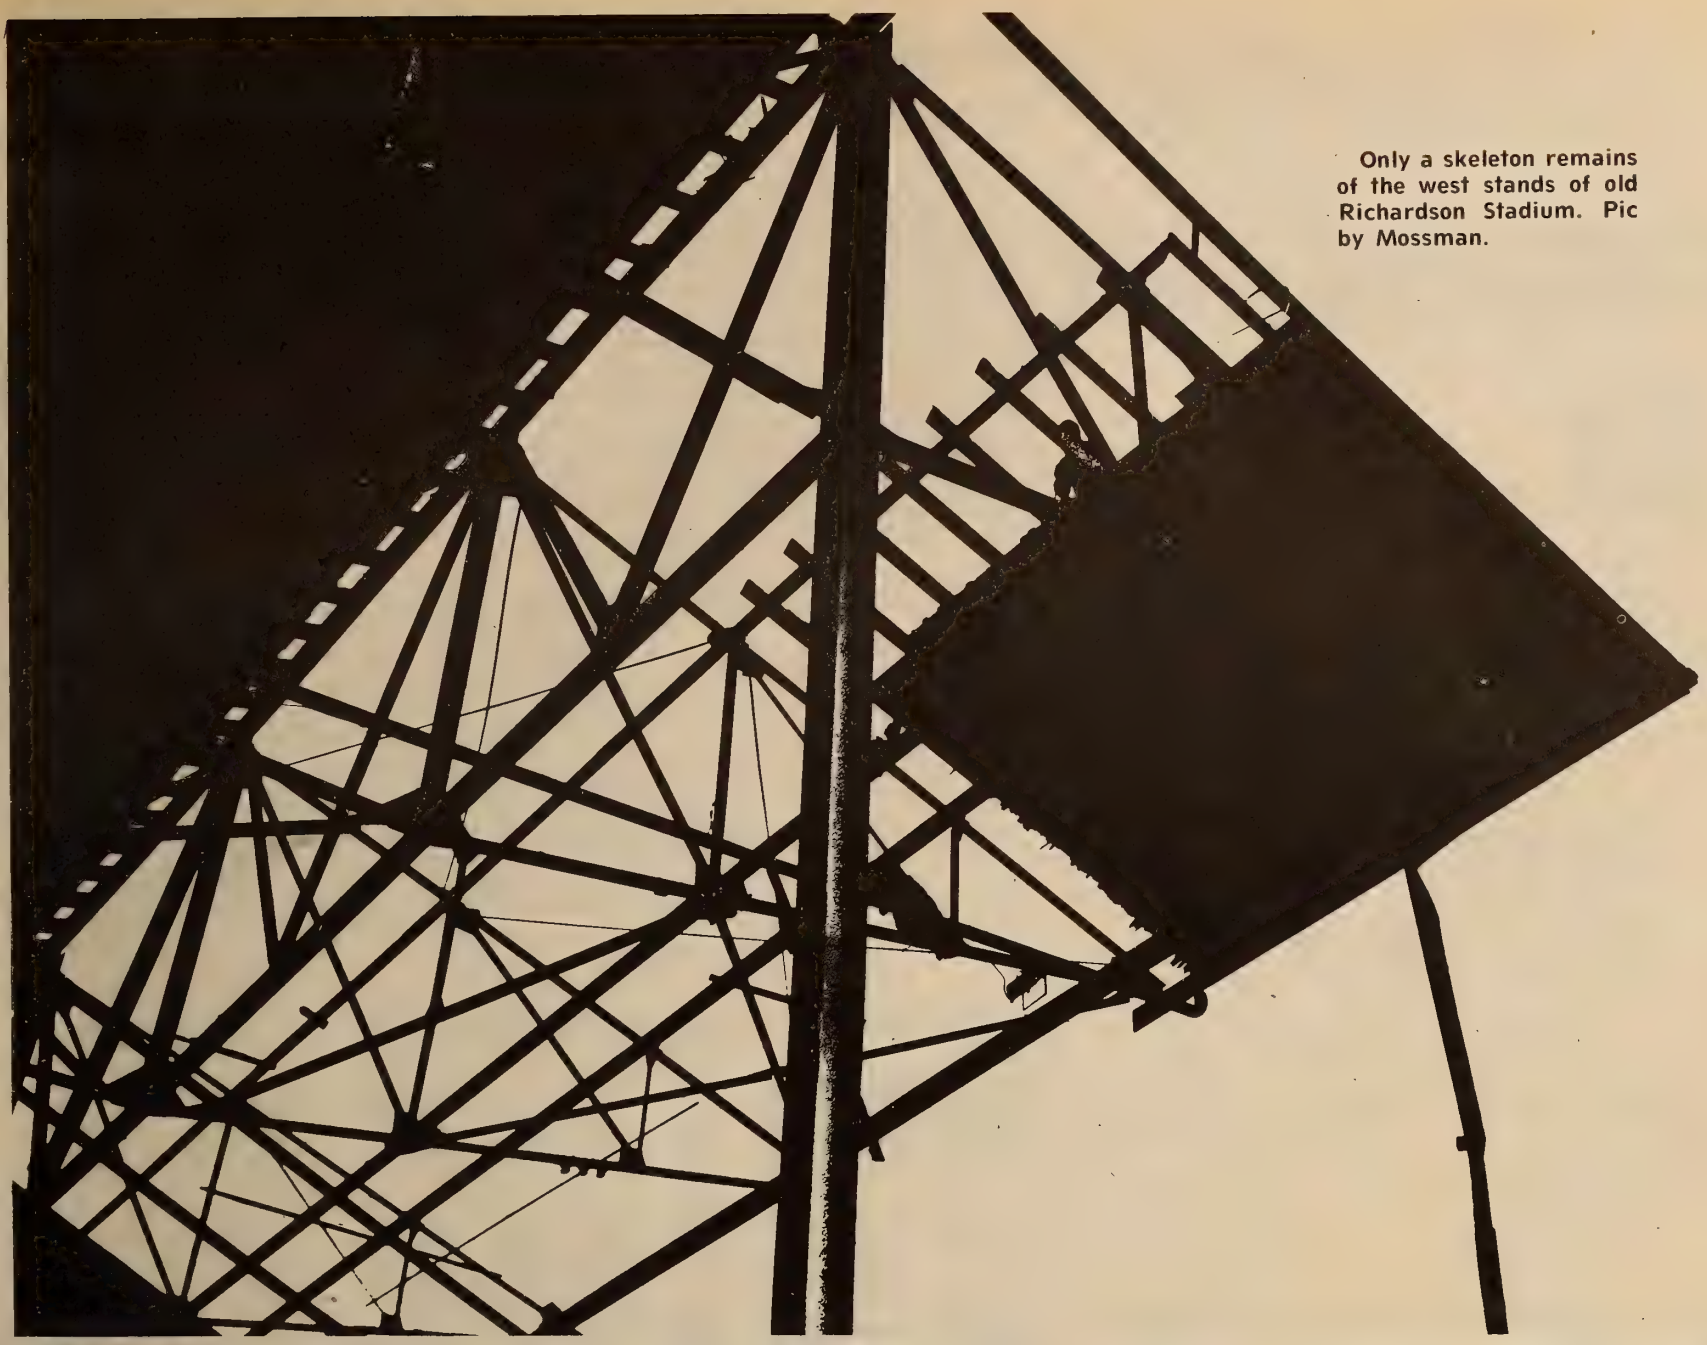
Kraft, who accompanied Nixon to China, says he learned from a European ambassador in Peking that Dong had agreed with Chinese Premier Chou En-lai to make the trip.

In his Jan. 25 speech Nixon disclosed a secretly offered Viet Nam peace plan calling for the withdrawal of all U.S. forces within six months after agreement by Hanoi to free all U.S. prisoners. He said North Viet Nam had thus far rejected or ignored the proposals. The president also revealed that his chief foreign policy adviser, Henry Kissinger, had made a doxen unannounced trips to Paris to present the U.S. proposals.

Hanoi was angered by Nixon's disclosure and claimed he broke a promise by revealing the Kissinger talks. Kraft says the European ambassador reported that relations between Chou and Dong are good and that there has been intense traffic between Hanoi and Peking in the last few months.

BELFAST — A manhunt continued throughout Northern Ireland Monday for the terrorists who bombed a crowded restaurant on Saturday, killing two women and wounding 136 other persons—many of them gravely.

There was only one minute's notice given that a bomb had been planted in the popular Abercorn Restaurant, but it wasn't enough, said police who received the tip-off.



The bomb exploded in the middle of the restaurant, where an estimated 200 persons—mainly women and children—were having tea.

Five persons lost limbs. Rosaleen McNern, a 22-year-old girl who was shopping for a trousseau for her August wedding, had both legs and an arm blown off and was blinded in one eye.

BELFAST — Alarmed by bombings in the crowded city centre that caused almost 200 casualties during the weekend, Ulster Premier Brian Faulkner Tuesday issued instructions to owners of stores, restaurants and other public buildings which put Belfast on a virtual war footing.

BELFAST — Fifty-two people, most of them women, were injured Monday by a bomb that exploded behind a movie theatre in central Belfast. Minutes later, another blast wrecked a Londonderry hotel.

"Cut out waste," minister tells academics

Ontario's minister of colleges and universities told a meeting of student council presidents Friday that he shares the Wright Commission's desire to "cut out waste".

George Kerr told the meeting that the government is already doing this by slowing the growth of university budgets to make sure that administrators are efficient in their spending.

Kerr said he recognized "the rightful concern among academics about interference with the autonomy of the university community". But because education costs are rising, he said, the government must control where its money is going.

Government pays 70 to 90 per cent of university operations in Ontario at present.

Kerr suggested that universities should reduce sabbatical leaves and increase class sizes slightly.

Using statistics from the Economic Council of Canada, one student commented that a natural ceiling was coming. "Since costs and enrollment will stabilize by 1980, isn't it the wrong time to cut back?" he asked.

Kerr replied, "We're not cutting back. Student fees will rise only so the opportunity can be provided for more to go to university."

March 31 is the deadline for submission of briefs to the Wright Commission before it compiles its final Report on Post-Secondary Education in Ontario. Commenting on his frustration with the early date, Rob Mackenzie, former student president of the University of Western Ontario, told the meeting, "It shows that the commission has little intention of making any major changes."

But, Kerr said, the commission has been asked to extend the date -- and "I have no doubt that it will."

No drug charges

Royal Canadian Mounted Police drug searches in three Queen's residences had led to no charges by Sunday afternoon.

And charges under federal law seemed unlikely -- although "there are some people in the men's residences who are very scared," student affairs director Dr. Jim Whitley told The Journal.

RCMP officers with warrants searched a room in McNeill House and a room in Morris Hall last Wednesday evening and took away "some pipes", a Morris resident said.

Also on Wednesday, they attempted to find an Adelaide Hall resident to search her room. That search was made Thursday night. The woman whose room was searched is not a drug user, dean of women Mrs. Evelyn Reid said Sunday, and nothing was taken there.

Mrs. Reid said she expected no more police visits.

There have been no drug searches in residence for at least five years. In 1967-68 the Inter-Residence Council decided it would discipline Leonard Field drug users who were not caught by the police.

But there is no record of such discipline.

University punishment for non-academic offences was discussed last year when the senate's special committee on discipline discussed policy. The chairman of that committee, arts and science dean Dr. Ronald Watts, told The Journal Sunday that drug laws "apply as much to the university as they do in any other part of the country."

"I would repeat that the report (of the discipline committee) says, which is that the university is in no way a sanctuary from the laws of the country."

Watts said he could not comment on last week's residence searches.

Men's res picks chairman tomorrow

The Inter-Residence Council, which governs men's residences on the central campus, will elect its officers tomorrow for 1972-73.

There are two candidates for chairman: Steve Brereton, second-year economics major, and Peter Wells, third-year chemistry major.

Both candidates are stressing the need for more integration between the IRC and the Women's Residence Council.

Brereton said relations between the two councils should be more diplomatic, and pointed out the need for more joint activities, either by brother and sister floors or at a broader level.

Wells said more cooperation is needed to make IRC-WRC events successful. Inter-council relationships, he stressed, should be objective, not depending on personalities.

Wells, a member of the 1971 arts and science orientation committee, said the IRC must cooperate more closely with the orientation committee to avoid conflicts like those that have arisen before.

Brereton was a member of the Brockington House central committee this year. He said his major contribution to the IRC would be a critical analysis of residence life, to make it a more viable part of the community. "Residences should be more than just living quarters," he said.

Both candidates expressed an interest in coed residence projects. But, Wells said, the IRC should be distant and cautious once Morris Hall has opened on a coed basis. "Keep an eye on what is going on, but don't be constantly leaning over their shoulders."

Brereton said Morris should remain under IRC jurisdiction, because of its location on Leonard Field and its status as, he said, an IRC project.

Anti-abortion man to speak

David Diehler, the man who won an Ontario High Court injunction on behalf of a foetus, will be the target for questions about abortion fomorrow night in Stirling Hall.

Law professor Stuart Ryan will lead the questioning in the discussion, which is sponsored by the Graduate Student Christian Fellowship. Medical spokesmen are expected to be present as well, and the audience will be invited to ask questions.

Diehler will be asked to say when he thinks a foetus becomes a human being -- when, if ever, does abortion become murder? If a foetus is not a human, on the other hand, when in its post-natal stage does it become so? And in either case, does the convenience or necessity of another person justify ignoring any rights the foetus might have?

Diehler argued that a foetus does have rights, and persuaded the High Court recently to issue an injunction, on behalf of the foetus and its father, forbidding an abortion which the mother wanted.

When does a foetus become human? Grounds of argument range from legal to psychological. The debate with Diehler begins at 8:00 tomorrow night in Theatre D of Stirling Hall.

Student league founded; delegates avoid sit-in

by Jennifer Grass

The Ontario Federation of Students was founded in Toronto last weekend -- but only after a long day of gruelling constitutional debate and an abortive attempt to move the session from the International Student Centre at the University of Toronto to the U of T senate chambers, where a sit-in was in progress.

Toronto students were protesting the policy under which undergraduates will be denied access to the 900,000 books in the John Robarts Library at U of T when it opens next fall. About twelve members of the OFS founding conference joined the Simcoe Hall sit-in; the rest stayed at the original meeting.

One of them, Queen's AMS ex-president Patrick Riley, commented, "I do not wish to act illegally for something I know little about."

OFS will take the place of the Ontario Union of Students, which "failed due to lack of solidarity and commitment", according to Bob Spencer, retiring president of the Students' Administrative Council at Toronto.

The new federation was criticized at first by student representatives from Trent University. Trent's student president, Sue Gannage, commented, "Student council members here are foisting the Ontario Federation of Students on their student bodies without their support."

Riley responded that "Queen's wishes a formal body to be established to negotiate with government, and hopes that all who have a mandate to join will do so." He pointed out that the AMS at Queen's is permitted, unlike some student governments, to join a federation without calling a student referendum.

The AMS executive last month authorized Riley to bring Queen's into the OFS.

Most conference members admitted that the OFS was to be an organization of student councils but that "these do represent students' interests."

Arguments centred around the federation's philosophy and its financing, but often degenerated into squabbles about wording. The "statement of purpose" was tossed aside when delegates found it too specific.

A new version, written by Riley, emphasized two functions for OFS: "a method of communication through which member associations may improve and maintain the quality of their internal operations and coordinate operations between members", and a forum which the members can use to negotiate with the Ontario government about educational policy.

The OFS will be financed by a 15c per student contribution from member universities -- six of them committed a total of about $10,000 on Saturday. It was agreed that the federation could try to raise outside funds as well, up to 50 per cent of the operating budget.

That limit was put in effect when some delegates warned that such money might come from the provincial government and might have strings attached to it.

The conference discussed a demonstration planned for March 28 in Toronto, in protest against some of the financial proposals of the recent Wright Commission Report. Member student councils agreed to consider taking part; but Rob Mackenzie, former student president at the University of Western Ontario, commented, "I don't think it will do any good, except perhaps alienate a lot of people."

The conference concluded by confirming details of its structure and electing an executive. By the end of the meeting, eleven student councils had agreed to join OFS: the Federation of Students of the University of Ottawa, the University Students Council of the University of Western Ontario, the Student Union of the University of Guelph, the Student Council of Fanshawe College, the Students Administrative Council and the Association of Part-time Undergraduate Students of the University of Toronto, the Student Union of Ryerson Polytechnical Institute, the Student Councils of York University, Glendon College, and Carleton University, and the AMS of Queen's.

Civil engineer Bob Hughes will be president of final-year applied science for 1972-73.

Science 73, 74, and 75 have completed choices for their year executives for next year. Besides Hughes, the Science 72 executive will include Peter Pangman as treasurer, Jim Sidwell as social convenor, Tom Kennedy as year scribe, and Mike Stewart as AMS rep.

Science 74 will be headed by president Kevin van Koughnett and treasurer Barry Garner, along with Bob Carson as social convenor, Ken Shewan and Ted Bogle as AMS reps, Warren Workman and Phil MacIntyre as science formal reps, and Marg Latham as year scribe.

Gord Hobbs will be president of Science 75; his executive will include Paul Hewitt as treasurer Kevin Coleman as social convenor, Colin Dennis as assistant secretary, Paul Roberts as science formal rep, Joan Eaton as year scribe, and Pat Chance as AMS rep.

Nationalism

The Graduate Student Society and the economics DSC are sponsoring a day-long discussion on Canadian economic nationalism this Saturday.

The grad day conference is an annual affair, with experts coming to Queen's to discuss an important topic. This year there will be panel discussions with authors, academics and politicians outspoken in the foreign-ownership debate.

The morning session will feature Barnie Danson, parliamentary secretary to prime minister Pierre Trudeau. Danson has said that Canadian secondary industry is being stifled by a lack of capital and managerial aggressiveness; he advocates an integrated attack on the problem using government support through such programmes as the Industrial Development Bank.

Other panelists then will be Percy Bishop, an editor of Canada North Magazine; Willis McLeese, an ardent internationalist businessman; and Flora Macdonald, Queen's administrator and founding director of the Committee for an Independent Canada.

The afternoon panel, chaired by principal Dr. John J. Deutsch. will include R. Gordon Fairweather, chairman of the Conservative Party committee on sovereignty; economic consultant D.W. Carr; and Allan Heisey, publisher of a McLean-Hunter trade magazine.

The conference will conclude with W.H. Pope, an economics professor with proposals on how to regain Canadian economic sovereignty, and John Redekop, a political scientist Medicine and rehab students reelected student senator John DesMarteau last week, for a term lasting until 1974.

DesMarteau, who has represented the two groups on the university senate since 1970, received 148 votes. First-year rehab (occupational therapy) student Laurie Hayhurst had 126.

DesMarteau is a member of Meds 74.

Restlessness grows within the Soviet Empire

The tribes are restless these days along the western marches of Russia's empire, and the men of Moscow are obviously kept busy trying to keep on top of it all.

Their troubles are both inside and outside of their official frontiers. Understandably, they are pursuing a tougher policy against dissidents inside than against deviationists outside. But they are busy both inside and outside trying to damp down the restlessness which seems to have sprung up since the day Richard Nixon let out the fact that he himself would be going to China.

The latest move has been a surprise softening of attitude toward the government in Romania. But while trying to placate the restless client of empire by kindness, the opposite technique of arrest and repression is being applied to the Ukraine, Lithuania, and Latvia, where even good local Communists seem to be remembering that they were not always ruled by Moscow.

The Chinese are, of course, not aloof from this restlessness on the far side of their Russian neighbor. If the Russians want to deploy soldiers and guns against them in the heart of Asia, they can deploy propaganda and dissent against Russia on the far western flank. It is a matter of pressure and counterpressure, and the Chinese are deep in the counterpressure business right now.

One form reportedly is the financing of Ukrainian nationalist literature put out by Ukrainian emigres in Western Europe and Canada and smuggled into the Soviet Ukraine. There seems to be a steady flow of such material which the Russians are unable to prevent. They can arrest those inside the Ukraine who they think have been infected. There obviously has been some such infection because there seems to be a busier output and circulation of "samizdat" literature in the Ukraine right now than in any other part of Russia. One result has been a wave of arrest of intellectuals in the Ukraine paralleling what happened earlier in Russia itself.

Another Chinese move has been to resume relations with Spanish Communists who are themselves in close relations with the official Communist Parties of Romania and Italy. The Romanians seem to have arranged a visit to Peking last December by a delegation of Spanish Communists which established a sort of state of co-existence between the two Communist clans.

Thus Peking is now playing a more active role among the old and established Communist parties in Western Europe instead of fighting them with splinter. Maoist parties. And the net effect seems to be to reduce Moscow's authority over the older parties.

Russia has always had a "minorities" problem from the day the czars began conquering neighboring countries and peoples. These conquered tribes are passive in periods when Moscow is strong and pushing outward. They become restless when there is external pressure on Russia which gives them room for maneuver.

Perhaps most interesting in the news about such matters of recent days is the sudden reversal of Moscow attitude toward Romania.

Right up through last December Moscow was glowering at Bucharest and continued to talk and act as though it might some day do there what it did not so long ago to Czechoslovakia. The tanks were ready enough, just on the other side of the Romanian frontier.

But of recent days the cold frown has been replaced by the benign smile. Just why, is a Kremlin secret. But it is a reasonable surmise that doing to Romania now what was done to Czechoslovakia in 1968 would be "counterproductive" from a Russian point of view. It could perfectly well cause most European Communists to turn in revulsion from Moscow and join up with Peking. It would also rearouse now largely dormant fears of Russia among West European countries.

So Romania can perhaps pursue its semi-autonomous way with relative impunity. Moscow's only recourse is to try to regain with kindness the relations which it nearly alienated by attempted intimidation.

But this semi-autonomy enjoyed by the Romanians is envied on the other side of the frontier in the Ukraine. Why shouldn't Ukrainians, with a rich and ancient culture and history of their own not enjoy some autonomy as well?

Half the people living inside the frontiers of the "Union of Soviet Socialist Republics" are in fact conquered and subject peoples held down by the dominant Russians. It is Moscow's Achilles' heel. Back during the "cold war" John Foster Dulles used to aim at that very Achilles' heel. Washington does very little of that now. But the Chinese have taken over and seem to understand the technique quite well.

by Alan Broadbent

I found myself in the offices of an earnest young capitalist the other day, a chap who had decided to exploit the apathy of the Kingston academic community.

He had started one of those professional essay writing enterprizes. Students would come to him with essays they needed written for one of their courses, and for a fee he would arrange to have the thing written. To do this work, he would engage the services of graduate students, particularly those who had been handicapped by the Ontario Student Awards people.

I chanced by the office when I was looking for advice on my income tax form, not having a grasp of negative number theory, and had found that the tax office had moved to accommodate the thousands who share my lack of understanding.

The chap took me for a student needing his service, and he told me to sit down, he was just running out for some coffee.

I took a seat in his office, and waited for his return.

Suddenly, the phone range. I glanced at the ringing instrument, not wanting to get involved with it. It persisted. I tried to ignore it, but eventually it got to me, and I answered it.

A meek voice at the other end said, "Is this Bucaneer Booty, the essay writing firm?"

"I think so," I replied.

"Listen, I got a bit behind this year, you know, due to Homecoming Week and the Snowball festivities, and I need a paper on the "Social Aspects of Hypocrisy". Can you handle this for me? I'm willing to pay quite a bit for the thing."

Quite confused as how to answer, I muttered, "Well, I... the guy who..."

The voice at the other end of the line hurried on, "I can pay plenty for it, and its not due for three weeks, so there is plenty of time."

This struck me as somewhat odd, so I asked him why he didn't write the thing himself if there was so much time to do it in..

"Well, it isn't really my kind of topic, and anyway, I didn't go to the classes in which we covered hypocrisy," he answered. "Anyway, there are a few weeks of skiing left, and I don't want to miss them."

Succumbing to his logic, I took his name and told him I would have the manager call him. I then sat back to ponder the situation.

In mid ponder, the phone rang again. After ten rings, I picked it up, anxious for the voice of Bell Canada to cease its tintabulation. There was a rather fervoured voice at the other end of the line.

"I want to congratulate you people for the superb job you are doing in bringing the agents of pig authoriatarianism and repression to their knees."

"Thank you," I replied, wishing I had remembered my beret, one of the more suitable items of clothing to be wearing while receiving such a comment. However, I was slightly confused, so I asked, "What part do you like the best", hoping this would bring some elucidation.

"Why, subverting the pig-intellectual-elite from the middle-class university system as they try to subjugate the minds of the people with their bourgeois master-slave relationship. You will devalue the evaluation system, thereby bringing the university crashing to the ground, soundly smashing the heads of the pig-professorial elite. Right-on, brother."

He then hung up, and I was left to sort out exactly what the Bucaneer Booty Company was up to. Just as I had begun to think that this really was a revolutionary ploy, the phone rang again. I picked it up quickly, hoping to find the other pieces to this puzzle.

"Good afternoon," a phlegmatic voice posed. "This is Professor Tweed, from the university. I have my list. Albertson, C+, Carter, B-, Davis, C, Geoffry, B-, Henderson..."

"Hold on," I said hastily, "What is this list?"

"I see," Tweed said, "You must be a new fellow. I phone in once a month with a list of my students and what kind of marks I think they should receive. I recognize that students do this sort of thing, and I just want to make sure they submit the right kind of paper. I just don't think I should have to take the time to trace who is getting their work done for them, so I have settled on this somewhat convenient methodology for handling the situation."

Well, I hung up on him, old Tweed, and left the office to find the tax office. And on the way, it occurred to me that it is no wonder that people question universities, for if these are the kinds of things that go on here it is no wonder there are questions to be asked.

A reminder about health insurance

The new combined Ontario government health insurance programme comes into effect on April 1. This plan, the Ontario Health Insurance Plan, or OHIP, combines the coverage available presently under OHSIP and Ontario Hospital Insurance, and will make use of only one insurance number, the old Ontario Hospital Services Commission (OHSC) number. If you do not have an OHSC number at present and are over 21 years of age, you should apply immediately for one to ensure that you are insured after April 1. Application forms are available in banks and hospitals, or from the Student Health Services on Stuart St.

If you are under 21 and are single, you are covered under your parents OHIP coverage.

Quite likely, as a student, you will be eligible for premium assistance and won't have to pay anything for health insurance. If your taxable income for last year was zero, you pay no premiums. If your taxable income is under $1,000 you pay only half premiums ($11 a month) if single, and if married, you pay half premiums if your taxable income was less than $2,000.

Lines

Dear Editors;

Last Saturday, having got all "greased up", we (the Pink Flames) headed to Grant Hall to enjoy the festivities of Cruisin' '56. However, we never did get inside. At 8 o'clock, we had line up, but not until well after 9 were we informed, by the symbolic gesture of closing the door, that the Hall was full.

While we had waited patiently in line, at least 100 people broke into the line ahead of us or pushed in at the door as the line entered the building.

Unfortunately, this is not a rare occurance at Queen's events. One need only recall attending a concert at Jock Harty Arena to remember the sometimes frightening pushing and shoving, or recall Variety Night and Om-Pa-Pa as examples of being disappointed at the door.

Admittedly, the ideal answer to this problem is to have some place that will better accommodate the crowds, but we are not asking for the apparently impossible. However, several improvements could be made.

We recommend that all events be policed by AMS constables, outside the event to prevent line crashing. The constables should also control the excessive pushing and shoving which is unbecoming of "mature" students.

Secondly, we recommend that the organizers of all events should estimate the capacity of the facilities for their event, count the crowd outside, and inform those beyond the cut-off of their chances of gaining admission to the event. This would appear to be a common courtesy, particularly in winter.

Finally, we recommend to all students that when you plan to attend a function at Queen's that you have an alternative event in mind, preferably not a Queen's event.

Hopefully, these recommendations will lead to better rapport between the organizers of events and their patrons.

Mr. Lea

Dear Editors;

On March 7, the Journal printed a letter by Alan Mackie stating that Mr. Lea, the nightman at Victoria Hall, had punched and kicked an R.M.C. cadet on Saturday, Feb. 12. According to Mr. Lea, he in no way assaulted the cadet. Neither the W.R.C. nor the residence administration have ever had cause to question Mr. Lea's conduct. He has a difficult job, and is often called upon to deal with hostile persons. He does the job well and he is held in high regard by virtually all the residents of Victoria Hall. He should be commended, not maligned. I suggest that the Journal look into this matter carefully and that Mr. Mackie provide some verification for his statements. If he fails to do so, the Journal had better print a retraction and an apology. It is surely your responsibility to check the validity of everything you print. Slander is a serious offence.

Kiloran German, President, W.R.C.

Push

Dear Editors;

With respect to Mr. Alan Mackie's letter (Journal, March 7, 1972,) concerning the eviction of an RMC cadet; it appears that in the heat of excitement that such a moment may have caused, Mr. Mackie has succumbed to an urge to crusade. It is true that in the early morning of Feb. 12 an RMC cadet was forcibly (ie. taken by limb) turned out of Victoria Hall rather efficiently by Mr. Lea and Mr. Dolan. At no time was he punched and kicked while inside the building. Rather, after his eviction, the door was locked by Mr. Dolan and the cadet actually suffered worse damage from the gentle entreaties of his two college companions who, in their own indubitable style, rendered their friend insensible and loaded him into a college-bound taxi.

Far from being run by Mr. Lea alone, Victoria Hall is run by the WRC and the residents of the building. Since many of the residents are women between the ages of 18 and 21, it is highly unlikely that their environment has yielded them any knowledge of the proper way of bouncing unwieldy drunks and other parephenalia. This task falls to Mr. Lea or any other night man on duty in Women's Residence and that's their job.

Come now, Mr Mackie; you didn't think they were there just to mop the floors, did you?

-Trevor Titheridge.

Wright Report

Dear Editors;

The recently released Wright Report is an unbelievably insensitive and inhumane document. Is there any justification for cutting off the poor from any hope of attending university? Yet if Mr. Wright had specifically set out with this goal in mind, he could not have done a better job. If any of these suggestions are seriously considered or actually enacted, it would represent a giant step backwards in the educational field. Perhaps Mr. Wright would like to see education made a private matter again, for the rich only. Here at Queen's, I sometimes wonder if matters are not approaching that stage already. Let us hope that the government will not make the mistake of implementing these proposals and thereby cause the universities to become more elitist than they are now.

-R. Bishop, D. Boyce

Pirate papers

Dear Editors;

Would you please explain your logic in printing the following two statements in the February 29 issue:

"NOTE: University regulations provide quite severe penalties for academic dishonesty (which includes plagarism)." (page 2)

"PIRATE PAPERS writes essays FOR YOU (phone number)." (page 4)

-George Glumac

(Ed. note: The first statement was run as a warning about the dangers involved in making use of the products which Pirate Papers was advertising. We have since adopted the policy of not running any ads from organizations which sell term papers, since we find the idea of buying degrees reprehensible and do not want to act as a forum for such groups to advertise.)

Commie plays

Dear Editors;

In a Back Page article on Mar. 7 (about a LIP grant to a Hamilton man to produce two pró-Communist plays) you forgot to mention that the "two pro-Communist plays are by Bertold Brecht. Even the Globe and Mail did not omit this fact.

A white judge in Australia ruled recently that the wilderness occupied for thousands of years by dark-skinned Aboriginals in northern Australia does not, in fact, belong to them. "The whole earth," said the judge, "was open to the industry and enterprise of the human race, which had a duty and right to develop the earth's resources. The more advanced peoples were therefore justified in dispossessing, if necessary, the less advanced."

5 New Queen's Records

Queen's on top in indoor track

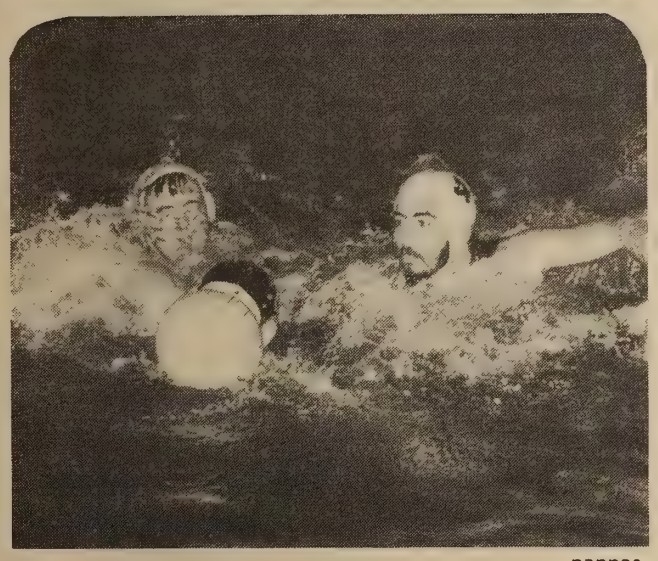
A strong showing by field event competitors and overall team depth led Queen's Indoor track team to an overwhelming victory in the first-ever OUAA indoor championships, held last Friday at Toronto's CNE arena. The Gaels were 55 points ahead of runner-up York, and well ahead of the rest of the field. Twelve schools competed.

Sprint star Hugh Fraser captured the 50-meter dash in 5.8 seconds, while teammate Gord McLellan (remember him?) was given 4th spot in 6.0, a decision which aroused some disagreement amongst the judges. Hurdlers Don Price and Dave Jarvis were 2nd and 4th in the 50-m high hurdles, with Price clocking a time of 7.2 sec. Jarvis, usually a threat in this event, had a bad start and was lucky to make fourth.

Middle-distance runner Brian Aiken took second in the 800-m run in 1:58.6, and added a 4th in the 400-meters. Bob Warner was fifth in the latter event.

Two veteran Queen's competitors, Brian MacDonald and Brian Milne, broke the existing 1500-m mark, finishing 2nd and 3rd in times of 3:55.6 and 3:57.1 respectively. Both these times rank amongst the fastest for the 1500 in Ontario this year.

As mentioned earlier, a young group of field men began to match the efforts of the older track men, with obvious results. Don Price left the hurdles long enough to set a new Queen's high jump mark with a leap of 6'2", a personal best good for 2nd place in the meet. Veteran Bob Lingwood and rookie Jim Barnett grabbed a 2-3 finish in shot-put. Lingwood threw 46'10", well below his best mark, while Barnett hit 43'7", his best competitive effort to date. Finally, long-jumpers Axel Becke and Glen Milligan finished 1-3. Becke's winning jump was 22'4½"; Milligan was a scant 2½" behind.



To cap the day's performance, the perenially-strong 4 x 400m relay squad of Fraser, Jarvis, Warner and Aiken set a new school record of 3:24.0 on the way to an easy first-place finish. The second-place team was a full six seconds behind.

The Queen's Women's Track team also grabbed top spot in the O.W.I.A.A. Indoor meet. The Golden Gals accumulated 64 points to finish well ahead of Laurentian, with 36, and showed a clear domination in the six-school competition.

The Gals collected three firsts. Sprinter Irene Harris easily won the 50-metre dash, and ran a strong leg to spark the 4 x 100m relay squad (with Janey O'Rourke, Barb Platt and Aileen Kirby) to another win. The third win for the Queen's Gals was a surprise. High jumper Bev Pierce came out of retirement for the meet, and ended up setting a Queen's Indoor record of 5'2", beating out Canada's fourth-ranked jumper, Louise Hanna, in the process.

Marion Spence placed 3rd in the 50-m, then set a new Queen's record with an 8.2 clocking in the 50-m hurdles. Newcomer Jo-anne Roland, competing in her first event for Queen's, managed a 3rd, as did Aileen Kirby in the long jump.

Queen's domination of these indoor track championships bodes well for next fall's outdoor meets. This is particularly true for the men, where only a weak showing in the field events cost the Gaels an OUAA title. If the young field men continue to improve, and Hugh Fraser and company maintain their high standards, then '72 could be the year.

Waterpolo first in Ottawa Valley League

Queen's is now on top of the Ottawa Valley Division of the Ontario Waterpolo Association, after a successful double-header against the strong Pinecrest team on Saturday, March 4, at the Queen's pool. This followed two wins (7-3 and 5-3) against the Canterbury team from Ottawa on February 20.

Both games against Pinecrest were, as expected, fast and well-fought exhibitions of waterpolo. Pinecrest had an excellent Hungarian centre-forward, who the Queen's team found difficult to contain and who scored 11 of their 15 goals. The first game resulted in a 12-6 win for Queen's, with Rob Patterson getting four good goals. The second game saw Queen's just winning, 11-9, in the last quarter. Pinecrest had lead from the second quarter after Queen's had an initial quick three goal advantage in the first period. Patterson scored another three goals in this second game and other leading scorers were George Craig and Simon Battler. The two wins were a real team effort with thirteen players turning out for the games.

Two games against Canterbury are scheduled for Saturday, March 25, at Queen's. At that time the Women's Invitational championships will also be played, with 14 teams competing for the title.

Intramural Wrap-up

Queen's Reps at Intramural Conference

At the third annual Intramural Conference, this year held at Brock University, representatives from Queen's - Anne McDonald, Susanna Trebuss, George Smith and Ross Feldman - met with forty delegates from 18 Ontario Universities.

Discussion centered around problems encountered by Intramural programs. Specific topics included: open competition vs unit competition, awards and point systems, and participation.

The Bews program impressed other universities with its efficiency and participation rate. However, it was seen as a highly competitive system, a factor attributed to the Queen's tradition. The philosophies of several other universities differed from this - for example, Waterloo, which has a more recreational approach.

The W.I.C. program was highly regarded by other women's programs. Aspects with which they were particularly impressed were the W.I.C. organizational system and the W.I.C. calendar.

It was found that lack of participation in women's intramural sports (something which has certainly been evident at Queen's) is a universal problem. It was suggested by Peter Hopkins, Intramural Director at Waterloo, that our women's program would possibly be more effective if it were more open and less competitive. It was also thought that more co-ed activities would be an asset. Brock's Director, Bob Davis, suggested that shorter schedules, demanding less long-term commitment from girls would improve the default situation. These ideas will definitely be considered by W.I.C. for next year.

Bews Final

by George Smith and Dale Johnston

March 26 is the date this year for the Athletic Banquet. Dessert will be served first this year, as the pub will be open 1 hour before dinner. Tickets are $1.00 and are available from all sticks.

Nominations for the Edwards Award (outstanding contribution to Bews) will be accepted until noon Thursday March 16. All nominations should be submitted to Larry Brawly in the P.H.E. Centre.

Sports Shorts

In interfaculty hockey Commerce was a shoo-in for the championship, beating Engineering 2 games to 1. They will be awarded the newly-donated Commerce Cup for hockey. Thanks to the Commerce Society for the donation.

Meanwhile, in intramural hockey, Commerce again won the championship, (5-4) in a two-game, total-point series against Chemical. An unidentified Engineering player was ousted early in the game for wearing bobskates and winking at the ref.

W.I.C. Banquet--Coming Up!

Another year of W.I.C. activities will be ushered out on Sunday, March 26 at 5:30 p.m. with an informal dinner in Ban Righ Lower Dining Room. The banquet will feature (in addition to an actual good meal at Ban Righ) the presentation of awards and the introduction of the new executive.

Tickets for this feast are $1.00 per person and may be obtained in Ban Righ dinner lines, the P.E.C. Locker Wicket or from Claire St. Arnaud (544-1431). May we remind Residence students that this would be a cheap Sunday dinner, and apartment-dwellers that, for once, someone else would do the dishes!

A W.I.C. executive for next year has been formed - most positions having been filled by acclamation (or recruitment, as the case may be). Chairman will be Marie Johnston. Claire St. Arnaud and Janie O'Rourke are Awards Convenors; Sue Foster and Betty Jong are the Officials Convenors; and Susanna Trebuss is Publicity Convenor. Best of luck to the incoming executive!

Volleyball and coed bowling are the only remaining activities. Volleyball semi-finals are on Tuesday night. at 7:30. P.H.E. vs Meds, and Arts '73 vs Law. Immediately following, P.H.E. will play Law and Meds will take on Arts '73.

In 10-pin bowling, Mining I and Law '74 are in the finals. May the team with the best set of balls win.

Waterpolo finals are underway with four teams competing in a round-robin. They are Comm '73, Meds, Bus. Grads, and Law '72; while in curling it is Comm '75 against either Law '72 or Law '74.

Rickets Glen Conlan is competing against Lock McLachlan for the badminton singles. Where Conlan's light head aids in his quick return against McLachlan's wicked birdie, Conlan is more popular with the fans because of his resemblance to the young Rick Nelson.

In singles paddleball, it is Tony William champion and Nick Gudewell runner-up.

The finals in basketball are Meds-38, PHE-44.

Encore for Vaghy's

by Geoff MacGibbon

Last Friday evening, March 10, the Vaghy String Quartet gave a concert in Dunning Hall, playing to a good sized audience. The program consisted of two modern works and one repertory item: String Quartet No. 1, by Peter Re; String Quartet No. 2, by Charles Ives;, and String Quartet Opus 96 (American), by Dvorak.

The Quartet by Re, composed in 1956, proved to be a short, well-balanced piece, more traditional in style than many twentieth-century works. Restrained in mood, it had a clear and flowing melody line which made for easy listening; I thought it a well-chosen hors d'oeuvre for the richer courses to follow.

To the uninitiated, Ives presents a rather baffling combination of chromatic melody and harmony, apparently random sound, and popular American tunes such as "Turkey in the Straw" and "Columbia the Gem of the Ocean". Unfortunately I cannot claim to have plumbed the profundities of String Quartet No. 2 (composed 1907-1913); but some clue to the way it should be heard is provided by the titles of the movements: Discussions (Andante Moderato); Arguments (Allegro con Spirito); and "The Call of the Mountains" (Adagio). It was obvious that the music and its communication to the audience meant a great deal to the performers, and I was left with the strong desire to hear it again.

With the second half of the program, the Dvorak String Quartet Opus 96. I feel I am on safer ground. Dvorak composed this work in 1893, shortly after his New World Symphony, and the two are similar in many respects. A feature of this quartet is its extensive use of the pentatonic scale, commonly found in folk songs; as is well known, Bohemian folk music provided much of Dvorak's inspiration. In mood the work is naively gay and spontaneous, and it was given a very enjoyable and musical rendering by the Vaghy String Quartet. By all the usual criteria of chamber music, such as dynamics, phrasing and ensemble, this was a performance of a very high standard; the audience responded by requesting an encore.

WOW

Comic Canada

By Henry Mietkiewicz

Michael Hirsh and Patrick Loubert
The Great Canadian Comic Books
Peter Martin Associates

During my occasional visits to museums of art or natural history, I invariably ask, "Why do they bother displaying those awful paintings by unknown artists along with the good stuff?" or "Does anybody really want to see two thousand brontosaurus molars?" "What does the general public care for a roomful of chips from assorted Roman vases?" I eventually convince myself that these things must be of value to somebody, that they are very old remnants of past societies and that they are more useful on display than in a dusty crate in the basement.

Such is also my rationalization for the publication of The Great Canadian Comic Books. Having been raised on and thoroughly spoiled by a diet of Superman, Batman, Green Lantern, The Human Torch, Iron Man and The Flash, I had a strong urge to toss aside the Canadian funnies as I would a mouldy orange. Then I remembered the museums and took a look inside.

No, I was not surprised, inspired and totally overwhelmed. But I was mildly amused. As a comic book and nostalgia freak I soon became interested in what little comic material this country had once churned out. But now that I've found out, chances are I'll never return to it again. The book will lie on my shelf — like a museum piece.

On the whole, The Great Canadian Comic Books is well edited and laid out and easy to read. Spanning a wide variety of subjects, it offers a good number of characteristic samples of each genre. Clive Smith's chapter frontispieces are highly imaginative and worthy of much acclaim. And the colour pages also add some refreshing moments to parts of the adventures of Whiz Wallace and Dart Daring and to a truly dazzling array of covers reproduced from Dime, Wow, Triumph, Commando, Active and Joke Comics.

As far as explanations go, the introductions to each chapter by editors Hirsh and Loubert are merely adequate. But Alan Walker's Historical Perspective which opens the book is excellent in all respects. It clearly explains how Canada began producing her own comic books during World War 11 when an embargo was placed upon all non-essential material imported from the United States. Walker also points out the contributions of Canadian comic book pioneers Cy Bell, Leo Bachle, Edmund Legault and Adrian Dingle.

By 1945 Canadians had gotten so used to their own comic books that they were prepared to keep on buying Wow and Triumph despite the lifting of the embargo. However, publisher Cy Bell needed financial aid and appealed in a letter to the Government for help in establishing "in Canada, by Canadians with Canadian money, a colour printing plant to produce Canadian craftsmanship in direct competition to the flood of American printed newspapers, magazines, periodicals and books". The Government declined. The rest, Walker sadly indicates, is history.

It is in the comic material itself that The Great Canadian Comic Books falls down. With the possible exception of Nelvana of the Northern Lights, Dixon of the Mounted, Derek of Bras d'Or and Johnny Canuck, most of it is not worth a second glance. A great deal is understandable) copies from and by far inferior to its American counterpart. Especially atrocious are the humor magazines featuring Patrick the' Plumber, Professor Punk, Shadrak the Salesman and, hold your breath, Injun Moe" the last of the jivin' moron Moe Hawks". Gasp, wheeze.

Another negative factor is the monotony of the plots. Because these stories were written in the War Years, many of them revolve around the eradication of Naziism.

Furthermore, the editors make the serious error of publishing only one or two complete stories. In their zeal to give us a panoramic view of Canadian comics they have printed snatches and snippets from all over the place. The reader ends up knowing next to nothing about comic book figures like Johnny Canuck who even now have the potential of becoming modern-day cult heroes.

Although The Great Canadian Comic Books may spark the memories of its 50-year-old readers, it does precious little for the under-30 crowd.

OTTAWA - The federal government set the stage Thursday for a showdown with Auditor-General Maxwell Henderson over complaints that his annual report is being delayed by inadequate staff and the government's accounting errors.

Allan MacEachen, president of the Privy Council, accepted a New Democratic Party motion in the House of Commons directing the Commons Public Accounts Committee to hear Henderson's complaints and make a report by March 29.

Henderson said he could not meet the deadline for submitting the 1970-71 annual report to Finance Minister John Turner for tabling in the Commons because he did not have enough staff to complete a thorough study of government accounts in time, and because there were more errors than ever in the accounts.

OTTAWA - Canadian youth deluged the state secretary's office Thursday with 40 bags of mail, representing 15,000 to 20,000 applications for summer work under the $34 million Opportunities for Youth program.

TORONTO - The Ontario Legal Aid Plan will end up paying between $100,000 and $130,000 in fees and expenses to the lawyers who defended 13 Kingston Penitentiary inmates tried last November for murder, informed sources said Thursday night.

Legal aid officials flatly refused to disclose either the size of the bills sent in or the amounts they were prepared to pay for work done at the four-day preliminary hearing and 17-day trial in Kingston arising from the riot deaths of two prisoners last April.

But on the basis of figures supplied by the lawyers themselves, there were indications that the accounts as submitted would reach $150,000 by the time they were all in.

TORONTO - Air traffic controllers, whose 11-day strike in January shut down airports across Canada, and cost airlines an estimated $32 million a day in lost revenue, are believed to have been awarded a 16.5 percent wage increase over a 27-month contract.

MONTREAL - David Rockefeller, chairman of New York's Chase Manhattan Bank, said Thursday his bank would "consider it seriously" if asked to lend money to Quebec's James Bay hydro project.

Rockefeller, speaking prior to a meeting with Quebec Premier Robert Bourassa last night, said "it would certainly seem possible" that the subject would be discussed with Bourassa.

So far, he said, the bank hasn't been asked to lend money for the project.

However, he added, "We are very interested in Canada and we do a good deal of business here. If the project shapes up as we would hope, we would consider it very seriously."

Commenting on Canadian proposals to screen foreign investment, Rockefeller said he hopes any such measures brought in by the Canadian government would be minimal.

OTTAWA - The federal Health Department has decided to crack down on radio and television advertising of children's vitamin products in Canada.

Within a few weeks, Health Minister John Munro is expected to make public a list of half a dozen "guidelines" that have been drawn up by his officials and that manufacturers of children's vitamin products will have to follow to get necessary approval for advertisements for radio and television aimed at children.

The guidelines, according to one Government official, will rule out such tactics as: suggesting that children urge their parents to buy specific products; movie stars, athletes and other personalities endorsing the products in specific ways; and offering free giveaways in connection with purchase of the products.

ST. JOHN'S - The Newfoundland Government has refused to approve payments of some bills incurred by Javelin Paper Corp. Ltd., including a $6,000 expenditure for transportation of former Premier Joseph Smallwood and members of his family to Florida, according to The Telegram.

The newspaper quotes John C. Doyle, head of Canadian Javelin Ltd., parent company of Javelin Paper, as saying the expenditures are justified. It says other bills questioned by the Government are for a $250 shipment of smoked salmon to a Montreal company and a $100,000 payment to a New York lawyer.

Javelin Paper is building a linerboard mill at Stephenville, Nfld., with some financing guaranteed by the former Liberal Government.

The new Progressive Conservative Government is investigating financial arrangements with Canadian Javelin.

The Telegram quotes a Government spokesman as saying several bills submitted by Javelin Paper were impossible to connect with the mill project.

TORONTO — Eric Kierans, former communications minister in the Trudeau government, said in Toronto Wednesday night that no Canadian should have the right to sell a business to foreigners without government approval.

Kierans, who resigned from the cabinet last April over economic differences with Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau, said legislation to prevent Canadians from selling out to foreigners was the only way for Canada to regain control of its own economy.

TORONTO — The Ontario Workmen's Compensation Board has dropped at least $560,000 in penalties against General Motors and Ford during the past two years.

The penalties for poor safety conditions were cancelled after the two firms withdrew from a group of industries that was planning an attack on the board's efficiency and fairness. The two had helped to organize the lobby.

The WCB presented Ford with a $260,206 penalty two weeks after the lobby was formed. And word went out that GM was next with a $300,000 penalty.

OTTAWA — The National Parole Board is tightening its standards for granting parole following a 50 percent increase in parole violations in 1971 over 1970. Board chairman T. George Street said the 1970 level of paroles may not be seen again.

Parole violations increased to 1,509 last year, from 1,004 in 1970. "If the failure rate gets too high, you're a bit more cautious," he said in an interview yesterday.

"We may have reached the optimum number of inmates released in any one year who can benefit from full parole," he stated.

THE WORLD

WASHINGTON — U.S. disarmanent negotiator Gerald Smith said yesterday he thought there was a "reasonable prospect" of reaching an initial arms control agreement with the Soviet Union before President Richard Nixon visits Moscow in May.

But under questioning by the House of Representatives foreign affairs committee, he emphasized that he hesitated to make specific predictions.

The Strategic Arms Limitation Talks resume on March 28 in Helsinki.

WASHINGTON — Top officials of the 29 biggest airlines in the United States were summoned to Washington Friday by President Richard Nixon and ordered to work out an immediate program to halt the bombings and hijackings of aircraft.

New, tighter security measures were to have gone into effect in June, but Nixon ordered the timetable moved up following the bombing of a Trans World Airlines (TWA) plane this week and a rash of bomb threats that disrupted air travel throughout the world.

TWA confirmed last night that it had been negotiating with an extortionist who threatened to blow up more planes unless he was given a $2 million payoff, but the company president said no money had been paid and he believed the threat had "run its course."

PEKING — China today launched its first official attack on the United States since President Richard Nixon visited Peking last month.

Calling for an end to air raids on North Viet Nam, China said in a statement that "the current wanton bombings by U.S. aircraft on Vietnamese territory only indicate that U.S. imperialism is sinking ever more deeply and inextricably in the quagmire of its war of aggression and is putting up a deathbed struggle."

SALISBURY — Rhosesia's African National Council (ANC), the organization that persuaded thousands of blacks to oppose the Anglo-Rhodesian independence settlement terms was to form a political party today.

The ANC, formed last November, originally pledged itself to fight the settlement terms and then disband, but now its leaders have decided that the ANC can carry on opposition to white rule in Rhodesia and one day form an all African government.

TAIPEI, Taiwan — Chiang Kai-shek has "accepted with pleasure" a nomination by his party to run for another term as Nationalist Chinese president. The nomination assures him of re-election.

"I am advanced in years now, but in view of the country's being in the time of crisis I have no choice but to continue to serve my people," the 84-year-old Chiang told three representatives of the ruling Kuomintang party. They had gone to his suburban residence to inform him of the unanimous nomination and asked him to accept. He'll be unopposed in the March 21 election.

ATHENS — The Soviet Union has privately warned Greece against deposing President Makarios of Cyprus, who is facing an Athens-backed challenge to his leadership, reliable sources revealed Wednesday.

The 59-year-old leader of the eastern Mediterranean island is expected to respond this week to Greek demands he hand over a small arsenal of recently imported arms, and his response could determine whether tensions abate or lead to civil war between the island's Greek and Turkish communities.

PEKING — Three days after President Richard Nixon ended his visit to China, Premier Chou En-lai apparently made a lightning visit to Hanoi. The premier returned to Peking, according to diplomatic sources, with the first fruits of the president's China trip.

UNITED NATIONS — The UN Development Program is expected to cancel all its projects in Taiwan soon, as a result of mainland Chinese demands, sources with the UN agency indicated Friday.

Queen's shares in Toronto's crucial library

Queen's is making an indirect contribution to the John Robarts Library, the $42-million research library which has produced controversy and two sit-ins at the University of Toronto.

Every Ontario university is being charged for a small share of the 800,000 square feet in the Robarts building, which is to open in 1973. It is conceived as a central research resource both for U of T and for the other universities of the province.

Controversy has developed at Toronto over the conditions under which U of T students will be allowed to use the library.

Queen's students -- graduates, at least -- will be able to use it, too, just as they now can use the Sigmund Samuel Library which U of T has outgrown. Graduate students with an identity card issued by Douglas Library can use the Toronto libraries, though they can borrow books only by interlibrary loan.

Because of this arrangement, Queen's has made responsible for 16,000 square feet of the Robarts building.

This does not mean that Queen's will pay the approximately $800,000 allotted to construct that space. Rather, the government will pay it, but the 16,000 square feet will be subtracted from buildings for which the government would otherwise pay on the Queen's campus.

Other Ontario universities are receiving similar handicaps, proportional to the number of Ph.D. students they have in the humanities and social sciences, the areas which the Robarts library will serve.

The 16,000 square-foot area is about one and a half times the area of the 2S level in Douglas Library, or twice the area of the health sciences library in Theological Hall.

The Robarts library will contain 900,000 volumes when the building is completed and the books are moved in. Toronto students have been fighting for full access to them, as well as to the 200,000 volumes which will remain in Sigmund Samuel Library primarily for undergraduate use.

After negotiations and two sit-ins, acting U of T president Dr. Jack Sword gave in to them Monday night.

Some 75 students had occupied the senate chamber in U of T's administration building, Simcoe Hall, in protest against the administration's previous policy, which had been that only grad students would be allowed to use the Robarts stacks.

Undergraduates would have been forced to request their books at a front counter, and the general public would have been allowed no use of the library at all. The protesters wanted both these restrictions removed.

The demonstrators were removed Sunday by Metro Toronto police; eighteen were charged with petty trespassing, and four of those with obstructing or assaulting police.

The senate chambers were reoccupied Monday by about 800 students after a meeting of students anf faculty in nearby Convocation Hall. That evening the protesters, who included Students Administrative Council president Bob Spencer, won a promise from Sword and senior administrators that they would ask the senate to make the library open to all students, and to the public for a small fee.

Sword also asked that the trespass charges be dropped.

He added that the university would not call in city police "except after all means of negotiation have been tried and unless there is a clear and present danger to the essential functions of the university".

Wednesday, The Globe and Mail said Sword and his administrators had "completely capitulated", demonstrating a "vacuum of authority left by those supposedly in authority".

Sword is acting president until June 30; he is to be replaced by newly-appointed president Dr. John Evans.

The Law Society has announced its 1972-73 executive, which will be headed by Wally Petryshyn as president and Suzanne Hanson as vice-president.

Other executive members will be Brian Rose as treasurer, Shirley Bernard as secretary, Ann Carlsen as social convenor, Ross Dunsmore as senior AMS rep and John Aitkin as junior AMS rep.

The senior law year will be headed by president John Barkwell and vice-president Leslie Lane. Law 74 will be headed by Gordon Bobesich and a temporary vice-president, Fred Helter.

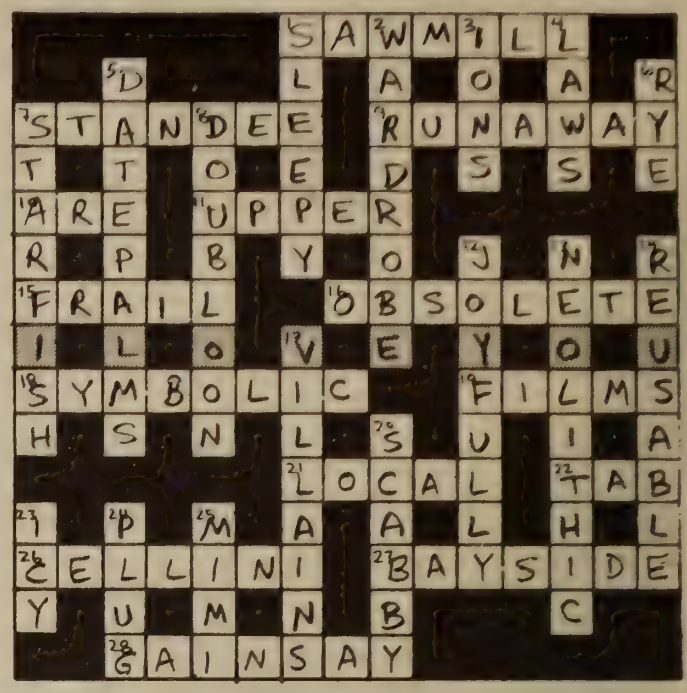
IRC chairman

The new Inter-Residence Council chairman is Steve Brereton, a second year Economics student. He defeated Peter Wells, in the IRC election Wednesday.

Ban Righ alarm

Friday morning firemen were called to Adelaide and Ban Righ Halls in the latest in a series of false alarms which have plagued the old women's residences since early fall.

The eight alarms between September and Christmas were caused by an oversensitive alarm system, Debbie Bramm Adelaide-Ban Righ block chairman told the Journal. Since the system was repaired, short circuits have caused several more alarms, she said, partly because of the age of the buildings. Ban Righ Hall was built in 1923 and Adelaide added in 1951.



MacDonald runs

Flora MacDonald, active Conservative at Queen's and in federal politics, is running for Parliament. She announced Wednesday that she would seek nomination as Progressive Conservative candidate from Kingston and the Islands in the next federal election.

She is administrative assistant in the politics department, on leave this year for an executive training course given by the Department of National Defence.

Her statement Wednesday said she wanted to run for Parliament because of "the Trudeau government's contempt for parliamentary institutions and its ineffectiveness in dealing with the problems of middle and lower income groups."

Student loan system may be revised next year

by Bob Mutrie

There will be major changes in the Ontario Student Awards Programme next year, according to a student member of the government committee responsible for student award policy.

But the committee member, Paul Johnston, said in a recent memo to Ontario students that the changes, which he says "bear no relation to realities either social or academic", are being made by the Treasury Board and by George Kerr, Ontario's minister of colleges and universities.

Johnston says the total money to be given out in Ontario Graduate Fellowships will be cut by almost 15 percent this year, from $3.5 million to about $3 million, despite earlier government assurances that as much money would be available in 1972-73 as was given out this year.

The other changes, he says, will be in the OSAP plan for undergraduates, under which at present students who qualify may receive loans of up to $600 and grants if they need more money than that.

That $600 maximum will be raised next year, Johnston says, to "an undecided level", meaning that students will have more loan and less grant. Queen's assistant registrar for student awards, D.N. Ellis, told The Journal this week that he also understood the $600 figure would be raised, but did not know how much.

An unidentified member of the Committee on Student Awards -- probably Johnston -- said in the University of Toronto newspaper, The Varsity, last week that the figure next year would probably be $800 or $1000.

Unidentified staff members of the department of colleges and universities said in the University of Toronto newspaper, The Varsity, last week that the figure next year would probably be $800 or $1000.

Johnston says there will be two reductions in the amounts students are assumed to need when their OSAP awards are calculated. Local transportation costs will be pegged at $2.50 per week next year, rather than $85 per year as at present -- but with an extra $2.50 per week, up from $15 per year, if a student lives more than ten miles from campus.

And, he says, the $30 per week maximum now allowed for room and board will apply to all students. Until this year, those living in residence had their full residence fees paid; at Queen's these amount to about $100 per year more than the $30 weekly limit.

Ellis confirmed this and said that the government apparently considers residence life "a heightened lifestyle or a luxury". But, he said, at Queen's it is a necessity, not a luxury.

Johnston comments on other potential changes, including new regulations on when marital status takes effect, and on the conditions under which foreign students are eligible for Ontario Graduate Fellowships.

He also points out that there will be no loan system for part-time students again next year. Speaking to The Journal on Wednesday, Johnston said this went against the recent recommendations of the Wright Commission, which called for more support of part-time university education.

A grant system for part-time students would be costly, Johnston said, and he suggested that the government feels, "Why should we get into this area when there isn't much pressure on us?"

Ellis mentioned one change in OSAP regulations which Johnston's letter does not mention: the government now defines the length of an academic session for which graduate students may receive loans. The $900 standard loan will now apply for a two-term period of 30 to 37 weeks, he said.

Johnston's letter criticizes the government for adopting new policies without consulting the Committee on Student Awards. The committee has been "castrated" and "the interests of the university community were ignored," he says.

Ellis said the changes represent a possible "uptight programme" on the part of the government, trying to stretch money as far as possible.

The minister of colleges and universities has no obligation to take the committee's advice. Ellis pointed out; it is only advisory. "Obviously the committee failed to convince him."

Speaker analyses Nixon trip

Chinese society is more complex in its heritage than North American society, and has a better idea of where it is going. From that starting point, Dr. Peter Neumoff of McGill University spoke at Queen's last week on Strategy in China and the Nixon visit".

Chinese society can be characterized as an old society with a new vision, Neumoff said, captured in the slogan of Chairman Mao Tse-tung, "Make the old serve the new."

An understanding of Chinese tradition is therefore essential for an understanding of China today, Neumoff stated. Chinese culture emphasizes man and his essence, rather than law, he said, and life rather than materialism.

Neumoff declared, "This is the antithesis of our culture."

He said the Chinese follow a principal of human emulation -- one should look to men for judgement, not to metaphysics. Stress is placed on the relationship of man to man and there is no emphasis on individualism, he continued.

This "infra-structure" relationship gives rise to the "mass line" theory, Neumoff said, which looks to the masses of people for support. This vision of where the society is going is strongly connected to a relationship between the leader and the population, he continued.

Why, then, did U.S. president Richard Nixon want to visit China? According to Neumoff, he had several motives. First, since China is emerging from a period of instability, such talks would be welcome. Furthermore, all men are basically the same in Nixon's view, Neumoff said; he sees the Chinese military leaders as a replica of the Pentagon, and envisions "McNamaras emerging from the rice paddies".

By his trip, Neumoff said, Nixon betrayed the United States commitments to nationalist China; Taiwan now can "become a condominium under Japan and the United States", he said.

The Chinese motives for letting Nixon come were simpler, he said: they wanted to "unmask the hypocrisy of the adversary".

He said a poem by American humorist Art Buchwald summarizes their feeling:

As the sun sets over the Yellow River
And the moon rises in the China Sea
I reach to the stars with both hands
Knowing I will be on American T.V.

AMS told that it's down on women

Two students told the AMS outer council Wednesday night that women are discriminated against when the student government makes committee appointments.

Ann Lancaster (fourth-year sociology) and Dianna Gilbreath (third-year phys ed) announced that of the appointments presented Wednesday in the annual set-up of AMS committees, 85 percent were going to men.

After some criticism from vice-president Wally Palmer and several commissioners (the men responsible for the appointments), the comments on discrimination were noted for the record and the education commission agreed to study the matter.

All the appointments were approved as presented, except for one position -- liaison between the AMS and the student senators -- which was abolished on the urging of former vice-president Victor Bradley, who said this was the responsibility of president Greg LeBlanc.

Bradley spoke often during the meeting -- acting as a private student after two years on the council, first as engineering rep and then as vice-president.

Included among the appointments were the five commissionerships (cabinet positions): Ross Dunsmore in education, Ken Wong in external affairs, Bruce Trotter in internal affairs, John Green in campus activities, and Jim Thompson in services.

One appointment met with some opposition: that of Orest Olijnyk as director of the Queen's Entertainment Agency. Retiring director David Merrick had applied for reappointment and was defended by Bradley and others, but the council voted strongly to keep Olijnyk.

In other business at the first meeting for newly-elected representatives, the council voted to ask the university senate's academic development committee to study a system of credit or non-credit courses on important human issues.

It agreed to run a review of council structure, as has been done annually for some years.

And it agreed to have a special committee examine the procedures for giving out Tricolor Awards. This year's procedure has met with some criticism on campus because retiring AMS president Patrick Riley was among prominent students who did not receive Awards.

In its annual ritual, the council elected a new speaker: retiring grad rep Graham Millington. Meds rep Andy Pipe, entering his fourth year on council in a succession of positions, was re-elected deputy speaker, amid an "old home week" atmosphere to which the presence of many former council members contributed.

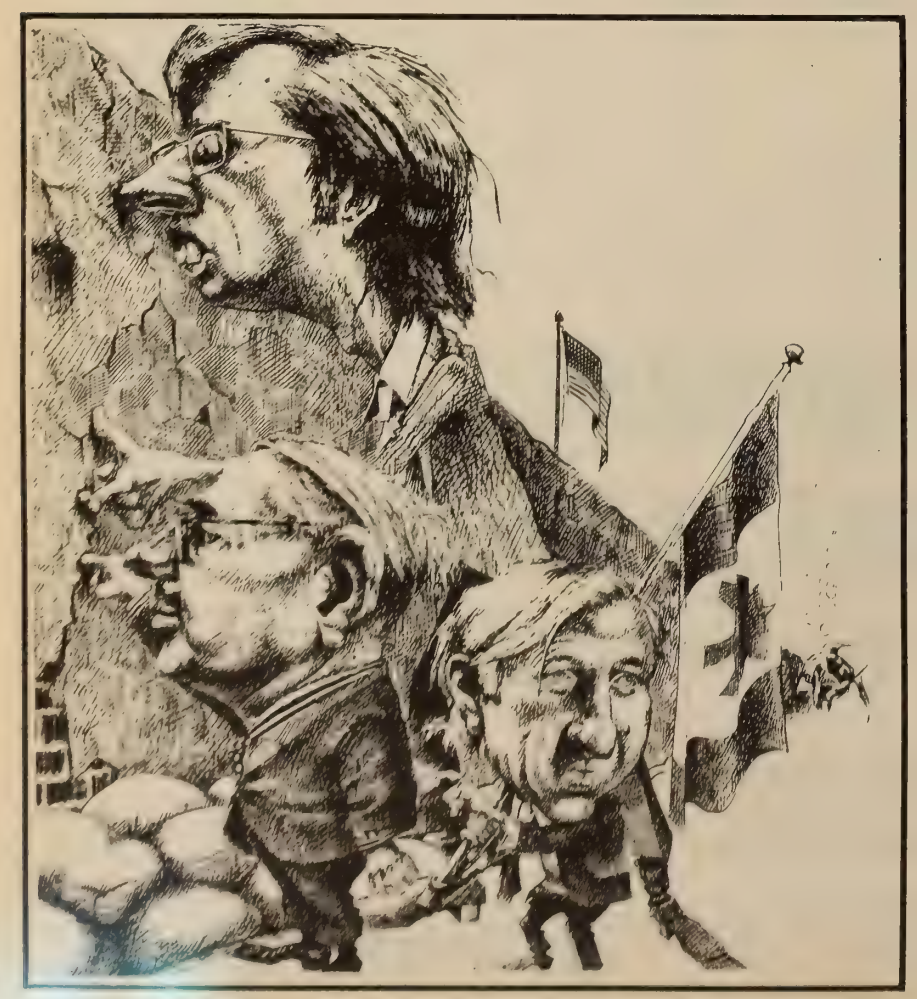
Every nation but Canada controls foreign investm

(The following description of the way countries other than Canada have treated foreign investors is taken from the Report of the Interdepartmental Task Force on Foreign Investment, which reported to the Ontario government last November. This article indicates that most other countries of the world have done more to protect their national sovereignty than Canada.)

Japan's Economic Nationalism



Japan is the country most often cited as the one whose policies towards investment from abroad have been diametrically opposed to those followed by Canada. From the first days of its industrialization, Japan has travelled the road of economic nationalism. And there is much to suggest that its policies were more instinctive reactions to circumstance rather than the results of explicit cost-benefit calculations. This is openly acknowledged by the Japanese government:

> Japan's modernization was carried out to counter the impact of the West. In the nineteenth century, when the influence of European powers moved with increasing momentum toward the East, the Japanese people came to feel that their independence was being threatened. A way of thinking, not in terms of the clan, but in terms of the state, i.e. a national consciousness, was engendered out of this sense of danger. The maintenance of independence thus became, to every Japanese, the most important national purpose. This nationalism enabled the people to transcend the idealogical conflicts that cannot be avoided in periods of violent change.
> The confrontation between the groups advocating an open-door policy and those advocating the exclusion of foreigners was a bitter one that sharply divided public opinion. It was, however, a confrontation on the question of how best to preserve national independence.
> It is, of course, doubtful whether the inflow of foreign capital would really have brought about Japan's economic subservience to foreign interest. Indeed, a reasonable degree of foreign investment might well have accelerated economic development.
> Nevertheless, the major portion of capital required for economic construction had to be raised at home. In this sense, the decision of the Meiji leaders to raise capital by collecting a land tax from the farmers, despite their bare subsistence level, was indeed commendable.
> In any event, as can be seen in these....examples, if these leaders found certain measures necessary for economic construction, they carried them out however difficult and unpopular they might be. In this way, the energies engendered by a growing sense of nationalism were guided by these leaders with a strong sense of responsibility. (Japan in Transition, One Hundred Years of Modernization.)

In early 1969, Japan became the world's third economic power and government regulations restricting investment from abroad have since softened slightly. However, the door seems to have been opened to foreign investors only in those industries where competition with Japanese corporations would now be very difficult, if at all possible.

The general requirement that foreign capital own less than a controlling interest in Japanese companies has often been mentioned by Western investors or would-be investors as the most serious impediment to locating plants in Japan. But there has also been another deterrent to foreign firms - that of too much government control. The Japanese government plays a key role in business: it plans the strategy of industrial development and strictly supervises the implementation of its recommendations. There arises out of this, foreign investors complain, an inability to implement their own business policies.

Japan is doubtless an extreme case of a country pursuing very rigorous nationalistic policies towards investment from abroad. Most other Western countries also try to prevent foreign investors from assuming too powerful a position in their economies.

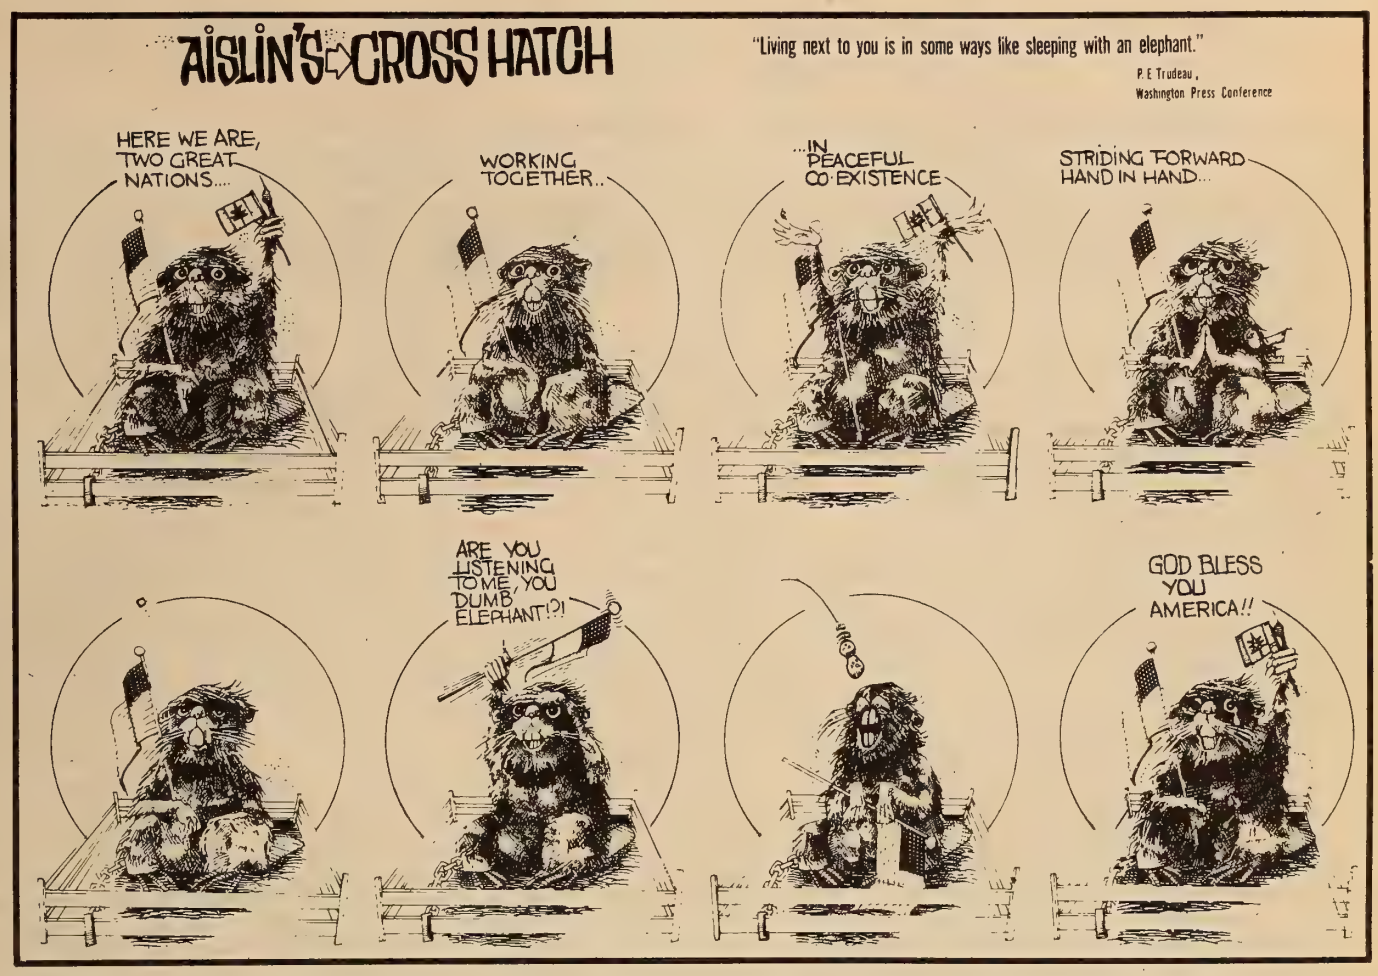
The Scandinavian Countries

In Sweden, foreign companies need government permission before setting up any enterprise. As in most other European countries, foreigners cannot operate businesses dealing in mining, real estate, railways, telephone, television or radio systems. Foreigners, including Swedish foreign-owned companies, need special governmental permits to acquire natural resources, such as forests and mines, governmental permits to acquire real estate, waterfalls and mineral resources. In practice, however, the permit to acquire natural resources, such as forests and mines, cannot be obtained. Permission is always refused when there is reason to suspect that speculation in property values might occur. With respect to renting and leasing property, non-Swedish nationals are generally not discriminated against.

The other commonly cited obstacles to foreign investment in Sweden concern government regulations over the management of foreign-owned enterprises. According to these regulations; the managing director and all members of the board of directors must be residents and nationals. Under the Swedish Companies Act, a waiver may be granted permitting as many as one-third of the directors to be foreigners, and attempts have recently been made to further modify these requirements, but special governmental permits allowing deviation from the general rule are still required.

In Norway, foreign enterprise is prohibited from investing in natural resource development and restrictions are imposed on ownership of real estate. However, there seem to be fewer government restrictions on foreign investment for the purpose of offshore oil and gas exploration. As in other Scandinavian countries, special permission must be obtained from the central government for all direct investment from abroad and there exists a legal requirement that at least half of the foreign subsidiary's board of directors be residents of the country.

Other West European Countries



As far as natural resources are concer the problem of foreign ownership control does not exist in most Euro countries. Coal mines have either b nationalized (United Kingdom, France have been firmly held by domestic mi companies (West Germany). In Fra and Italy, natural gas exploration production has been in the hands of st owned energy concerns, Gaz de Fra and ENI (Ente Nazionale Idrocarbu In the Netherlands, where large depo of natural gas were found in 1959, a sortium under the name of Nederla Aardolie Maatschappij (NAM) is charge of the operation. It is ow equally by the Royal Dutch Shell Company and the Standard Oil Co. of Jersey, but the Dutch government ha strong, if not decisive, voice in setting pricing policies for the gas produced. Exploration for petroleum and natural in the British sector of the North Sea been conducted by more than 25 Brit foreign and international consortia, a number of gas fields have already b brought into production. All deliverie gas, however, must be made to the Council, a governmental agency comp of 12 area gas boards, and this agency the exclusive right to purchase natural for distribution.

In manufacturing, merchandising services, foreign investment is allowe most West European countries, but i subject to more or less restric governmental supervision.

The mix of policies designed to regu investment from abroad is differen each country. There are m nationalistically-minded countries, s as France, and more liberally-min such as West Germany (at least for time being). Present policies, howe seem to suggest that foreign investors welcomed, provided they do not ass positions of strength which could lea the domination of key industries or wh could effectively frustrate indepen national policies.

In most countries, permission must obtained by foreign investors from government in order to set up subsidia The policies pursued in treating plications are generally flexible - eve France. At present, the French gov ment keeps the door half-open. manufacturing facilities proposed foreign companies are welcomed, but for take-overs of domestic companies treated differently. The French gov ment prefers internal mergers acquisitions by foreigners. It may permission to set up plants in sele areas, e.g., in the Marseilles area or Ardennes, but not in the overpopul Paris region or the industrialized no All major investments from abr whether in the form of new plants or t overs of French companies, have to prior approval from the Ministry Finance, and this form of supervi allows the French government to co the direction of structural change domestic industries.

The practice in recent years has been foreign bids for take-overs of large Fr companies were refused, while permis for the acquisition of firms having m shares of the domestic market granted. The policy on foreign investm has, thus, been very much a part of other policies on industrial competition and rationalization.

In Britain, the Industrial Reorganization Corporation has been instrumental in blocking a number of major foreign take-overs. Although its activities centred much less on restrictive moves than on sponsoring mergers among British companies, it was, nevertheless, guided by the principle that the nation should retain a strong presence in all major manufacturing industries.

Trend Towards Nationalism Throughout the World

Harold B. Scott, United States Deputy Assistant Secretary of Commerce, speaking to the Annual Conference of the Canadian Importers' Association in March 1971, admitted with regret that there is a growing trend to nationalism throughout the world, based on an emotional reaction to foreign investment and a fear that decisions taken in other countries may adversely affect local interests. It may be useful to review briefly the forms which this nationalistic trend assumes in developing countries.

Mexico seems to have developed a relatively simple, but stringent, set of rules restricting investment from abroad. No foreign investment is allowed in five exclusively state-controlled sectors (oil, basic petrochemicals, electricity, railroads, and telegraphic and radio-telegraphic communications), nor in the eight sectors restricted to 100 percent Mexican-owned companies (credit institutions, insurance companies, bonding companies, investment companies, radio and television companies, automotive transportation on federal highways, gas distribution, and forestry exploitation). Twenty other sectors are reserved for companies with majority Mexican capital (minimum 51 percent): fishing and fish-breeding; sea-food packing plants; mining; secondary petrochemicals; basic chemicals; rubber manufactures; steel; cement; glass; fertilizers; cellulose; aluminum; food processing and packing; publication of books and magazines; production and distribution of soft drinks; production, distribution and exhibition of movie films; publicity and propaganda; urban and inter-urban transportation; maritime transportation, and air transportation.

Steel, cement, glass, fertilizers, cellulose, and aluminum industries were added to the list of sectors requiring Mexican majority ownership in 1970. The decree limiting foreign capital participation in these industries provides that Mexicans or Mexican corporations shall hold a majority share of capital in firms classified under these industries, and that such firms shall be administered principally by Mexican citizens.

In the past, Mexico has been regarded as unique in Latin America for its insistence on national control of all major domestic industries. Recently, a number of other countries on that continent have taken steps to follow the Mexican example. In an agreement ratified on June 30, 1971, the members of the Andean Pact — Colombia, Chile, Peru, Bolivia and Ecuador — outlined a common policy on foreign investment. This policy is scheduled to be implemented gradually, over a period of 15 to 20 years. After that time, certain basic service industries, such as the public utilities, banking, insurance and transport, and certain types of heavy industry, such as steel and metal refining, will be forbidden altogether to foreign investors. In everything else, foreigners will be allowed to participate to the level of 49 percent. The repatriation of profits and capital in any year will be limited to 14 percent of capital employed. In return, foreign investors will obtain certain guarantees, access to foreign exchange for the remittances they are allowed, and due compensation if and when they are expropriated.

In British circles, the Andean Pact Agreement has been welcomed as preferable to the irregular pattern of nationalizations in a number of South American countries which struck at foreign-controlled copper and iron-ore mines, oil fields, financial institutions, and agricultural land holdings. It must be remembered, however, that the provisions of the Andian Pact Agreement represent minima, and that the nationalistic regimes of Peru, Bolivia and Chile may require the minimum local participation well before the 15-year deadline.

Other examples of economic policies with various degrees of bias against foreign control can be cited, especially from Arab nations, India, Guyana, and the Carribean Islands. Unfortunately, the circumstances in these countries do not provide good parallels to Canadian problems. However, the direction of governmental policies in Australia is of considerable interest. Foreign investors express the view that the Australian economy is going through a "nationalistic phase". There is considerable pressure for 50 percent domestic ownership of any enterprise, but the urging for local participation applies mainly to the extractive industries. Still, there seem to be frequent cases where a figure well below 50 percent local participation is regarded as acceptable. However, foreign-controlled Australian subsidiaries are prevented from borrowing on the domestic market unless advance approval is obtained from the Federal Treasury Board and from the responsible Minister; this is not easily secured.

It would lead us too far to try to describe the extremely complex picture of laws, regulations and policies pursued by various governments in their endeavour to promote national growth with as little cost to national independence as possible. Canada's case is unique in that this country has so far systematically rejected economic nationalism even in its moderate forms. (A handful of economic sectors considered sensitive to Canadian political opinion have not been penetrated by U.S. capital because of stringent laws restricting foreign investment. These sectors include banking, finance and trust companies, broadcasting and communications. Railways and other utilities, such as power plants and electricity networks, also have had very low foreign investment due to the establishment of Canadian National Railways and provincially-organized electric power authorities. All other industries were open to investment by non-residents. This policy, often described as "open-door", has resulted in the gradual growth of non-resident ownership and control in the Canadian economy.)

The conviction has prevailed in Canada that any restrictions on the inflow of foreign capital would seriously impair the country's economic growth and the prosperity of its citizens. There is no doubt, indeed, that Canadians have reached a high standard of living, but there is not much evidence to the contrary to suggest that countries practising a fair degree of economic nationalism have not also been successful in this endeavour.

CANADIAN FOREIGN CONTROL POLICY

Since at least September, Pierre Trudeau has been promising his foreign investment policy "any day now", "shortly," "in a matter of days" etc. The Canadian people are still waiting for it; but then, they've been waiting about 105 years now.

Lorca's Perlimplin, A Very Pretty Valentine

by Sandy Naiman

Federico Garcia Lorca's poetic drama, "The Love of Don Perlimplin and Belisa in the Garden", is subtitled, "An erotic lace-paper valentine" and the Queen's Drama Department's thirteenth edition of Chronicles produced it with this subtitle very decidedly in the forefront of its mind, under the direction of Mr. Richard Trousdell.

The production is very pretty. In fact, it is the prettiest the studio has seen this year. Mr. Russ Waller's set operates basically around a circular red platform, above which is suspended the suggestion of an orantely arched canopy and from which falls a translucent white organza curtain.

This setting echoes the Spanish environment where the lyrical fantasy cum farce is placed. Juxtaposed onto this luminescent focal point are the contrasting rich textures of black velvet and the flimsiness of crepe paper and lacy, doily-like flowers and frills.

The production looks like its subtitle, a lace paper valentine, and coupled with the clever use of candleight for both the accompanying musicians and balladeer and the stage, and Lorca's melodious, flighty yet suggestive poetry, the picture is transposed subtly into the realm of the sensual and the erotic.

Paper was extensively used throughout the production. Long white streamers, hung from the curtain rod, served as a doorway as well as the branches of trees in the garden. Kleenex flowers adorned the tall candle holders on each side of the stage area. The Sprites, played by Mr. Norm Campbell and Miss Lorraine Forbes, wore aluminum foil diamonds attached to their green leotards. This versatility, as well as the clever allegiance with the play's subtitle provided a unity which was unexpected but surprisingly charming. Besides designing the production, Mr. Waller also played the aging and supposedly cuckolded December groom, Don Perlimplin, innocent in the art of physical love and yet profoundly able to initiate his sugary white Belisa into the mystical arena of spiritual love. When he dies at the end, in her arms, she is no longer just a trembling, shimmering hollow, awaiting fulfillment from her imaginary lover, but a tragically actualized soul, in his eyes.

He, through a martyrized suicide, has given her his soul and hopefully his ability to love, as well.

It is the poignance of this withering resolution which transforms the initially dreamlike lyricism of Lorca's tale into a nightmarish ritual.

Mr. Waller's performacnce, both as designer and actor, demonstrates his overall visual understanding of the play, as well as his emotional mastery of a character not often found in today's idiosyncratic non-poetic drama. Not many heroes in the modern canon have Perlimplin's innocence and his profound wisdom. Usually the reverse is true.

Unfortunately, Mr. Waller's enthusiastic performance is not matched by his childish, naive bride, portrayed by Miss Ibby Price. Physically, Miss Price epitomizes the idealism and the delicacy of Belisa, but as the play progresses and she is supposedly becoming lustful and wanton in her impatient desires to consummate her relationship with her illusive lover, she does not change. Her character is stationary, constantly spoiled and still childlike.

It is unclear as to whether the limitations of Miss Price's understanding of her role or her inability as an actress are responsible for this rather inconsistent detail in her characterization. Surely it is the director's responsibility to ensure that his cast has complete understanding of the material being interpreted. However, Mr. Trousdell may not have agreed with such a literal interpretation of Belisa's character and thus chosen not to develop it.

Miss Bev Humphries, as Marcolfa, Perlimplin's housekeeper, was believably maternal and weepy in getting her master married off, before she died.

The Sprite's, Miss Forbes and Mr. Campbell, were the only possible link between audience and actors and they spoke with the profound innocence of children, as they played their imaginary cat's cradle. They giggled and bounced about as they quietly but surreptitiously set up each of the scenes by lowering and raising the organza veil which covered the bridal bed. They snuffed out and relighted the aforementioned candles and even squeezed into the periphery of the plot by slipping Belisa one of her treasured but forged letters from Perlimplin, alias her lover.

The Sprites were so light and gamin that they crossed over the realm of reality and in my mind anyway, seemed very small and almost as translucent as the organza veil which they manipulated so well.

It is intriguing too, that Mr. Trousdell had all the actors and actresses in white face, as was his cast in last November's major production of Jean Genet's "The Balcony". This technique sets up a strange barrier between illusion and reality. Lorca seems to be exploring the territory in between and Mr. Trousdell's having all the characters in pseudo-masks, gives them not only the painted quality of a fancy valentine, but also, generally suggests a more surrealistic path of insight into Lorca's poetry.

The costume crew was ingenious in its use of paper in constructing the elaborate clothing of the actors and actresses, caught within the folds of this lacy paper valentine.

Both the wigs of Belisa's mother, splendidly played by Miss Andrea Smith and Mr. Waller, were made of white paper curley cews. Miss Smith's skirt was fashioned from black crepe paper to create a huge wide quasi Spanish hoop surrounding her physically and engulfing her symbolically in her delusion that Perlimplin's money will bring Belisa happiness.

Although Miss Smith is only on stage for a short period of time, her radiance and her manipulative manner manages to capture Belisa, the Marcolfa and Perlimplin, as well as the audience.

Mr. John Reeves, who directed the musical side of the production as well as playing the harpsichord managed to counterpoint the stage business just enough to accentuate its delicacy without crushing it, melodramatically.

Miss Karen Skidmore's voice, synchronized with the lips of Belisa, reminded one of some mystical cosmic influence surrounding the relationship developing between the bride and her groom and almost foreshadowing some deathly event.

It is unfortunate that this tight, beautifully paced and well-timed production was not set exactly one calendar month back, on St. Valentine's Day instead of on March 14, the day before the Ides of March.

It is also unfortunate that the play is not named "The Erotic Lace Paper Valentine" and subtitled "The Love of Don Perlimplin and Belisa in the Garden". Although the production is pretty to watch it may be more papery than poetic. But anyway, Queen's Chronicle Number 13 is about as much like a valentine as a play can be and everybody loves valentines.

Ryan—Bitter Grounds

by Dick Loney

Allan J. Ryan brought his unique, definition-defying guitar and song stylings to the Bitter Grounds Coffee Emporium at the Union last Friday and Saturday nights. At his own insistance, he deemed his performance be referred to as a 'concert", in lieu of calling it a "couple of extended sets". Claiming that his presentation evoked a particular mood Ryan was most adamant that his act be viewed as a totality so as to grasp the proper feel.

Perhaps such mood-probings are the exclusive property of balladeers with a finer definition of voice than Ryan displayed, or maybe he merely selected tunes which reflected his own mood on this particular Saturday night. Whatever the motives were, the result of an evening with Ryan was a definite stamp of approval for his comic subject matter handling and his talent for composing some pretty hilarious nonsense songs.

The side of Ryan which he insured this interviewer was a vertiable untapped source of mood and feeling fared somewhat more indifferently in getting across to his listeners. Thankfully, and perhaps with strategic dexterity, he saved the worst for last--a multi-tempoed probe of his own psyche which seemed to be pleading that identity-seeking query "Who Am I?" This tune never seemed to reach the heights which Ryan touched with such numbers as his so-called "Alternate National Anthem", "My Canadian Maid". A voice which was not able to infuse his final "suite" with much of the softness required for ballads was more than adequate, however, for the raucous thing he did about "The Day The Gravediggers Struck on New York".

Ryan's ability with a comedic lyric and a light toe-tapping tune seemed to be his forte, as he breezed into a topical ditty about the perils of love on a water bed.

Allan J. Ryan represents the calibre of entertainers which the Bitter Grounds is making an honest effort to bring to the Queen's Campus. This weekend (both Friday and Saturday nites) they will be showcasing the talents of David Whiffen, who penned such classics as Tom Rush's "Driving Wheel", and also "More Often Than Not", from the latest Ian and Sylvia session. Reputed to be an exceptional guitarist, and a solid performer, Whiffen will surely merit the buck-and-a-half you'll be asked to lay down when entering the portals of Bitter Grounds.

Allan J's clearly-articulated introductions to his own compositions almost took one back to the patter-between-numbers style of so many of the folk groups of the early sixties, and yet his ode to his late-grandmother, which he entitled "Leapin' Lily", had some detail which was as laughter-provoking as it was inventively original. At his best on such novelties, Ryan chose to revive another antiquated, but fun-gimmick, of "lining out" the lyric to his "Canadian Maid" song, and encouraging a sing-along once the audience had mastered the seven lines.

On stage, Ryan alternated between six and twelve-string quitar, while backed on bass, and some particularly complex intertwining guitar patterns on the "water-bed song", by a sideman named Billy (later identified as Bill Barker). Off stage, Ryan was quick to point out that his normal stage show incorporated a classically-trained pianist who studies in Montreal.

His initial Columbia album, recorded in New York about September of 1970, was released in February 1971, and since then, with the exception of laying down five sides last summer, Allan J. has been working on his stage show in depth; all the while waiting for the recognition which is slow in coming to struggling artists, particularly if your birth certificate points to a Canadian citizenship.

Waterpolo Still First

Queen's took both ends of a double-header with Carleton last Sunday, 8-1 and 14-3, to retain first place in the Ottawa Valley Division of the Ontario Waterpolo League. Archie Nesbitt, coming off a hand injury that forced a month's layoff, led the Gaels with 5 goals. Jim Dooley added 4, while Gord Hurd and player-coach Simon Beitler potted 3 each.

The Gaels have two league games remaining, against the last-place Canterbury squad. The matches will be played as a double-header here at Queen's, starting at 6:00 pm, March 18. Spectators are welcome.

Queen's will host the Eastern Canadian Women's Open Waterpolo Tournament for the first time, on March 25 and 26th. To date, entries have been received from 14 teams, including squads from Halifax, Regina, and London.

Lifeguard Competition Here

Queen's will host an invitational Lifeguard Competition between a team from Richmond Hill and a campus contingent, in the Queen's Pool, between 12 and 2, March 18th. There will be individual competitions and Team relays, including a "Situation competition" from 12:15 to 1:15 pm. The pool will be open to Queen's students for a free swim during this latter period.

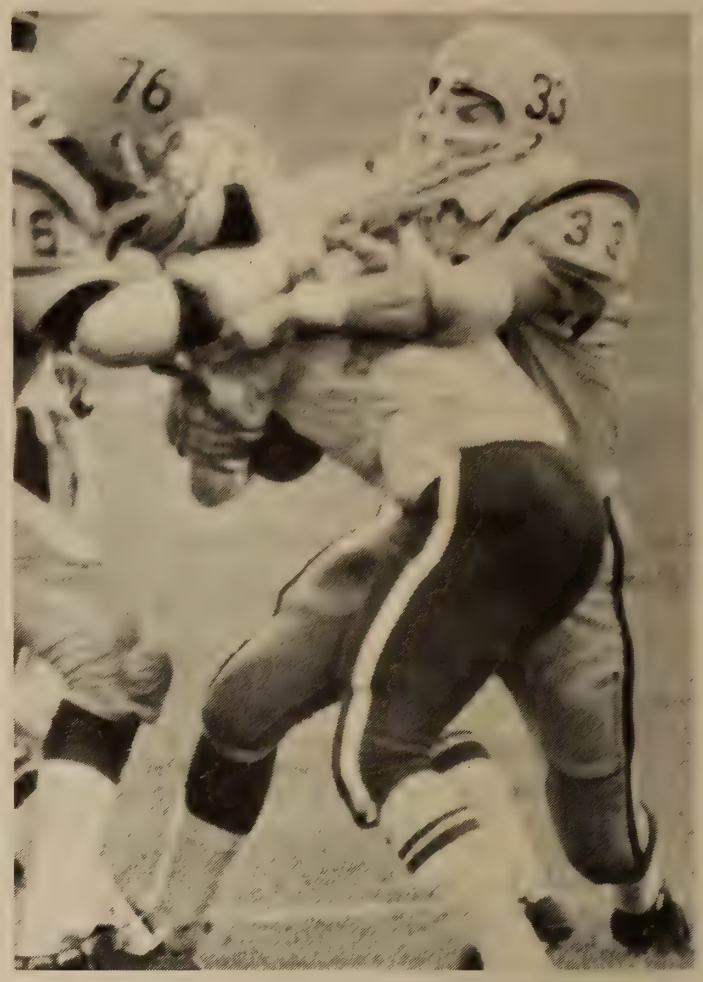
Ex-Gaels try Pro Ball



A good half-dozen former Gaels could be sweating it out in pro football training camps this summer. Toronto Argos signed Doug "Tree" Walker, a 6' - 7" defensive tackle earlier this week, while linebacker Ron Faulkner will probably be giving the Double Blue another try come June.

Montreal Alouettes signed ex-Gael Cam Innes, an all-star centre for Windsor last fall, and Ottawa Roughriders are talking to Gael linemen Jim Sherritt and Al Dresser.

The Riders lost Canadian centre Doug Specht with a broken neck in a car accident, and will probably lose Moe Racine, another veteran Canadian lineman, through retirement, so both Dresser and Sherritt could get good shots on offense--although Sherritt has a well-known preference for the defensive side of football.

The big news concerns Mike Lambros, who might just become the second Canadian to stick with an N.F.L. team. The Atlanta Falcons are currently negotiating with Lambros, much to the discomfort of the Edmonton Eskimos, who grabbed Lambros as the second player picked in the C.F.L. draft.

The Falcons see Lambros as a potential outside linebacker and punter-the Atlanta kicking "specialist" averaged about 35 yards per kick last season, while Lambros' average was over 40.

Mike Lambron (33) -on his way to the BIG leagues?

'ASK YOUR PROF TO COFFEE WEEK'

Goodwin House

by Janet Ritchie

The placement office is across from Ban Righ Hall.
So was the music house.
And so was the annex.
Goodwin House has entertained them all.

It was there before Ban Righ, in fact -- built before the turn of the century, as the home of Dr. William L. Goodwin, who was dean of the school of mining (later the faculty of applied science) from 1893 to 1920.
His wife was one of three enthusiasts who started a crusade in 1900 to assure women's residences at Queen's, and finally built Ban Righ.

In 1925, Goodwin House began its career as the first of six residence annexes for the overflow from Ban Righ, and later Adelaide and Chown Halls.
Until 1966, Goodwin House accommodated up to thirty girls each year, along with a warden (don) in a closely-knit sorority atmosphere which most of them loved.
The first woman graduate of Queen's,
Annie Fowler, was the first warden of Goodwin House.

Rules and regulations abounded when Goodwin House opened in 1925.
The warden enforced
a complicated late-leave system, and daytime windows became nighttime entrances.
Smoking was prohibited in deference to public opinion in Queen's eastern Ontario constituency, and to fire insurance rules -- which resulted in the girls' innocent explanations that yes, they'd been smoking, but they'd puffed the smoke up the chimney.
The rules were somewhat modified over the years, and after Mrs. Beatrice Bryce became dean of women in 1959, they were generally relaxed.

Goodwin House became the object of peeping toms, and a temporary shelter for stray animals, until they were ejected
by watchful housekeepers.
For a while the house was looked after by Mein Gott, a janitor so called because of his frustrated exclamations as he struggled with the antiquated plumbing system.

Victoria Hall's first year of operation, in 1965-66, ended that stage of the career of Goodwin House.
It was the fourth of the six annexes to be replaced.
Temporarily it was vacant
as much-needed repairs were made.
Then for three years,
until December 1970,
it assumed the role of Music House.

Finally it contained offices --
most recently, since last August,
Career Planning and Placement.
When the term ends
it is to be torn down, to make room for a new music building
as part of the arts-social sciences complex.

Its name survives in two namesakes:
Goodwin House, the formal title of Victoria Hall's A Wing, and the new mining engineering building, which is to be named Goodwin Hall, in honour of the old dean of applied science.

Top: a recent view of Goodwin House from the southeast corner (pic by Seagram). Left: Goodwin House life in its residence days, as portrayed in Tricolor 54.

Lo, the winter is past, the rain is over and gone; the flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land. (Spring began yesterday.)

'Second Coming'

"Frosh week isn't for frosh alone," Sue Dowler told the Journal.

As an alternative to the faculty society orientation programmes, "the Second Coming" is being organized by Sue Dowler, Roy Kirkpatrick and Laurie MacFeeters for freshmen and returning students alike.

They will be organizing daily cooking classes for those setting out for apartment living and seminars on birth control. In addition there will be fence painting, kite flying, roller skating and a camp-out. General university evaluation programmes and all night movies will also be provided.

The project has received a $200 grant from ASUS and hopes to receive additional financial support from other faculties and the AMS.

Stop essay sale

The Council of Ontario Universities announced in their recent newsletter, the Monthly Review, that they are seeking means of curtailing the distribution and sale of term papers.

The Monthly Review suggested that faculty vigilance should be combined with legal regulations to discourage expansion of term papers as a business.

COU has requested that the affiliated Council of Dean's of Ontario Faculties of Law consider the implications of business enterprises preparing and obtaining manuscripts for sale to students. COU also requested that they recommend a suitable course of action.

Trustees retire

Mrs. D. W. Boucher and Col. R. D. Harkness are retiring from the Queen's Board of Trustees this spring.

Col. Harkness joined the board in 1936 and has served in a number of positions, notably as chairman of the Executive Committee and Chairman of the Board from 1963-69.

Both Col. Harkness and Mrs. Boucher have represented the benefactors of Queen's, Mrs. Boucher since 1948.

Commerce exec

Over 150 students attended the Commerce Society General meeting Wednesday night at which the results of the Year Society Election's were announced.

The new president of Commerce '75 is to be Richard Chown, social convenor is Scott Wilson, Secretary Treasurer is Jody Ness and Athletic Stick, Bruce Pollack.

The Commerce '74 executive includes Lain Knowles, President; Norm McPhedian, Social Convenor; Dave Eagleson, Secretary-Treasurer and Bob Sedgwick, Athletic Stick.

The new Commerce '73 executive includes Dale Johnson, President, Andre Lalonde, Social Convenor; Greg Thompson, Athletic Stick; and Alan Coxwell, Secretary-Treasurer.

The meeting was concluded with some remarks from C. A. Lawrence, Student Advisor for the School of Business. He asked the students to help faculty find new direction in the revision of courses. He said he recognized the fact that students desired an increasing choice of options

Summer Journals expected

The Queen's Journal will continue publishing past the end of classes this spring.

Preliminary plans call for two-issues-a-week publication to continue until most students finish classes, April 7. There will be one paper in each of the three following weeks (study week and two weeks of exams).

Papers will be published occassionally through the summer.

They will be distributed on campus as usual; and will be available by mail, for a handling fee.

Journal editor announced

Jennifer Grass, second-year English student, will be the 1972-73 editor of The Queen's Journal.

She was selected Friday by a special AMS committee; the appointment is to be approved next week by the AMS outer council.

Miss Grass is assistant news editor of The Journal this year. She was the only applicant for the 1972-73 editorship.

She said Sunday her plans included continuity of The Journal's news function and expansion of its services in the areas of the arts and off-campus news.

Asked to comment further on her appointment, Miss Grass said, "How much shall I leave on page 3 for that damn editorship story?"

New editor for G.W.

Kevin van Koughnett of Science 74 will be editor of Golden Words, the Engineering Society's newspaper, next year.

Van Koughnett was chosen Thursday by the outer council of the Engineering Society.

He is photo editor of GW this year and is the 1972-73 president of Science 74.

South Africa

A fund raising campaign for the liberation cause in South Africa will begin March 20-25. It is being organized by the South African Liberation Study Group.

Throughout the week, pamphlets explaining "the plight of the subjugated peoples" will also be distributed, Frank Okoh, a member of the Study Group said.

DSC's discuss function

by Pat Muldoon

The general meeting of DSC reps held Wednesday night discussed the allocation of funds for next year's DSC's and acquainting first-year students with the DSC structure.

The basis for the meeting was a poll distributed to DSC chairmen by Neil Guppy, a fourth year phys-ed rep. The questionnaire, answered by only 14 of the 26 reps contacted, was about the role of the DSC's in the future. Few chairmen anticipated change in the basic DSC structure.

In order to make first year students aware of the function of the DSC, upperclassmen will make brief speeches in each class during the first week next year. It was also suggested that DSC elections be postponed until November so that students could get to know each other better. This year, many of the reps elected knew little about their duties and, as a result, attended few meetings.

Chairman of the meeting, Ellen Slavin, Natural Sciences Councillor, said the main function of the DSC lies in working within the individual departments. The original purpose of the DSC, as defined in its constitution, was to arrange for student participation on Departmental and Faculty boards. Some departments, such as chemistry and physics, integrated students into existing channels. The constitution, in fact, stressed that there is a minimum amount of work which each DSC should perform. In very few instances was there a defined "maximum."

Since the DSC's were set up by faculty boards, it was felt that the board should provide the funds for their continuation. But if this were the case, then the board could decide where the money should be spent. Although no decision was reached, the DSC's next year will probably obtain their funds from ASUS.

The DSC is student-oriented, not faculty-oriented. Therefore, the elections next year will be conducted by students, not professors. Each faculty member has also been informed of the aims and procedures of the DSC. In this way, faculty as well as DSC reps will know the limits of DSC power.

Since the ratio of graduate students to their professors is almost one to one, the DSC structure will remain at the undergraduate level only.

An adequate annual income for all

Social planning experts put $5,000.00 as the minimum income necessary for a family of two parents and two children to live above poverty level. Yet today, a family of four on welfare is forced to exist on less than $3,960.00 a year with adjustments made to this figure for up to, but not over 6 children; while the working poor in Ontario receive no help at all.

To restore the working poor and welfare recipients to a condition of well-being and dignity in accordance with common standards of human decency, the Ontario Anti-poverty Association proposes that the following steps be immediately taken by the Ontario government.

For the welfare recipient:

+ A complete overhaul of the province's welfare system making it a right and not a privilege, recognizing that it is the failure of society and not the individual that makes public subsidies necessary.
+ Enactment of legislation giving welfare recipients the right to have grievance committees, selected by recipients, in every welfare office, with these committees empowered to issue emergency aid.
+ The establishment of a minimum annual income of $5,000.00 required for a family of four.

For the working poor:

+ Aid to bring their present income to an annual minimum of $5,000.00 for a family of four.
+ Increasing Ontario's minimum wage to $3.40 an hour for both men and women.
+ The initiating of federal and provincial full-employment policies and programmes that will provide meaningful jobs for those who are able to work. This would include:

1. Increased development of secondary industries in Ontario so that our natural resources are processed into finished products here.
2. Compel the auto industry to produce an all-Canadian car here.
3. A one-year moratorium on plant shut-downs and mass layoffs.
4. A moratorium on consumer debt and mortgage payments for as long as a person is jobless.

The Honorable William G. Davis,
Prime Minister of Ontario.

I endorse the programme of the Ontario Anti-Poverty Association and I call on you to immediately adopt the legislative programme as outlined above as the first step to alleviating poverty in Ontario.

Name Street Address City or Town

If you are at all concerned about the problems of poverty and about the kinds of ideas suggested by this petition, please cut out the above copy, sign it, alone or with friends, and bring it or mail it (by campus mail no stamp in a campus mailbox,) to the Queen's Journal. We will forward them to the Organized Poor People of Kingston, who will take them to Toronto and to the government.

If 2,000,000 Ontario residents are going to sign this petition, it will require at least 3,000 Queen's students and staff signatures.

by Bill Johnston

On May 19, the Ontario Anti-Poverty Organization hopes to present to the Ontario government a petition bearing two million signatures, demanding that the government take a number of positive steps to eliminate poverty, including the establishment of a guaranteed annual income and the raising of the minimum wage.

All the proposals contained in the petition (at left), as well as the idea of the petition itself, were approved at the January Conference of Ontario Poor People, a conference attended by over 200 representatives of some 80 local welfare rights and poverty groups. It was funded entirely by the delegates to the conference, since the government turned down an application for money to fund the meeting.

The Conference and the Ontario Anti-Poverty Organization (OAPO) was designed to bring together both the working poor and those on welfare or unemployment insurance in order to get them to work together throughout the province. Bringing these two groups together is, in itself, an important step, since it means the breaking down of the myth, long held, that the working poor are being exploited by those on welfare; the aim is to get both groups to see that they are being exploited together, that their poverty is a result of our social and economic systems.

A provincial council, consisting of 60 seats, was also created at the conference to co-ordinate the activities of the many local poverty groups in Ontario. Only 27 of the 60 seats were filled, in order to allow room for new organizations to have representatives on the provincial council. The Council, with its office in Toronto, also puts out a newsletter of impressive quality which serves to keep the various member groups aware of what groups in other localities are doing. The major task at present, however, is the gathering of signatures for the petition.

"If we get two million signatures, there is no way the government of Ontario will be able to ignore us," an OAPO member said at the news conference held last Thursday to mark the beginning of the Kingston signature gathering campaign. They are counting on the signatures of Ontario's 1,000,000 poor people, plus 1,000,000 more from various other people concerned about the unequal distribution of income in this province and country. Numerous groups are being approached to approve the petition, including labour unions, church groups, city councils, university groups, students councils, service clubs and other organizations. Many have already pledged support.

The petition was drawn up, in the words of the first OAPO newsletter, "not to foolishly challenge government or big business, but to regain their (poor peoples) fair share, a decent and honest share of their contribution in making this province of ours as rich as it is."

The proposals contained in the petition may appear at first to be extreme, but this is not so. They all reflect the basic philosophy of the OAPO: that poverty and unemployment are societal problems, not those of the individual. Those living in poverty or on welfare do so, in almost every case, not because of some failure on their part but because of a failure of society or of our economic system to provide sufficient work or outlets for sufficient work training or sufficient support for those who cannot work. A person is not on welfare or living in poverty because he or she is lazy or unwilling to work, but because there is no work or no work which pays a living wage.

Figures produced by, among other groups, the Economic Council of Canada and the federal Department of Health and Welfare, give credence to these OAPO claims. The poor try to find work, and most succeed. Three quarters of all poor families have more than one wage earner, and two thirds of all poor families obtain most of their income from wages, salaries or self-employment. Most of those receiving welfare cannot work. 41 per cent are permanently disabled, 26 per cent are mothers caring, by themselves, for dependent children, 9 per cent are aged, 8 per cent are temporarily disabled and 3 per cent are working poor getting income supplements. That leaves 13 per cent who are potentially employable. 54 per cent of these were laid off, 11 per cent lost their jobs through strikes, 13 per cent lost their jobs through pregnancy or family difficulties, 11 per cent lost their jobs for miscellaneous reasons and only 11 per cent quit their jobs. Thus, only 11 per cent of 13 per cent or 1.43 per cent of the total of those receiving welfare could possibly be malingerers. Many of these 1.43 per cent may well have had good reasons to quit their jobs.

> "One really exciting thing about the Ontario Anti-Poverty Organization is the bringing together of the people on welfare and the working poor, breaking down the myth that the welfare recipients were exploiting the working poor, when in fact they are both being exploited together." - Bobbi Sparks

Since they do not see poverty and unemployment as the fault of the individual, but rather as the fault of the society (or government or economic system), the OAPO feels that welfare and income-support programmes should be accepted as a right the poor are entitled to as citizens of a society to which most of them have contributed a great deal, not only through their labour but also through their taxes because of the regressiveness of the Canadian taxation system (ie, it taxes those least able to pay more heavily- as a percentage of income- than those better able to pay.) Welfare and income support should not continue to be regarded and administered as though it were a privilege the poor received out of the generosity of the provincial or federal government.

Overhaul the welfare system

Thus, the first proposal, to overhaul the welfare system in accord with these general ideas, arises. An equitable system would do away with the many humiliating aspects of the present welfare system: the suspicion, overt and obvious, on the part of welfare bureaucrats, that the poor are trying to rip off the system; the needless house searches to ensure that female welfare recipients are not living with some man; the needless delays in payments of funds; the proliferation of departments to handle specific claims and payments, which helps to confuse people and makes it more difficult for them to receive all the benefits due them; the family splitting provisions of the Family Benefits regulations, which give a woman more money to raise her children with than General Welfare Assistance, but which require that the woman's husband have deserted her before she can receive Family Benefits payments; and the strong disincentives to welfare contained in bot and Family Benefits.

Grievance Committees

The second proposal, committees to be set up in an attempt to make sur welfare recipients are not happens now. Such a co volunteer workers chosen themselves, would have office, possibly through formation table in the o mittee members would be of a welfare recipient or that person gave them committee would also directives requiring that e by the office to a person office's decision not to gr the emergency aid lasting appeal had been heard a peal Board. in poverty and established their guaranteed income figure at 100 per cent of the poverty line.

The $5,000 for a family of four would apply right across the province, regardless of where a family lived, with no allowance being made for the higher cost of living in some localities compared with others. The major reason for this decision seems to be to achieve simplicity and low administration costs; the complexity and cost of calculating, at regular intervals, the cost of living for various localities would far outweigh the benefits of a regionalized amount of payment. Varying the amounts of payment would also cause problems for families that moved. (It is worth noting, in relation to the costs of administering welfare, that, of the seven billion dollars being spent each year on social welfare in Canada, only about 9.2 per cent reaches the poor; the other 90.8 per cent is eaten up in the costs of administering the plans.)

Guaranteed income for workers

The fourth proposal is really just an elaboration of the third: no one should make less than the poverty line income ($5,000 for a family of four). However, the suggestion of providing income supplements to bring working poor people up to an income of $5,000 for a family of four is a marked departure from present practice. The working poor are left out of virtually all income support schemes, and are often financially worse off than those receiving welfare, especially since welfare recipients may receive free or subsidized services for such things as dental care or eye tests, which the working man must pay for out of his own earnings. Although the municipal welfare offices can provide benefits to those who hold jobs, (with arrangement being worked out to establish how much of a person's earnings he can keep while he is on welfare), very few municipalities do this because to do so would reduce their welfare budget. The Ontario government provides no incentives to a local welfare office to help the working poor, either.

Minimum wage of $3.40

Many people, Trudeau included, would immediately conclude that nearly everyone who earns less than $5,000 would stop working if a guaranteed annual income of $5,000 were introduced. Although there is no real evidence to support the contention that people are basically lazy and would not work if they were not forced to by economic necessity, it is realistic to assume that some work incentives would need to be created to ensure that people would continue to work, even if they could get by without working. It was partly for this reason that the figure proposed for a minimum wage in the fifth proposal was set at $3.40 an hour. At this amount, a person who had a regular, 40 hour a week job, would earn just over $7,000 a year, an amount sufficiently above the $5,000 guaranteed annual income figure to make work an attractive choice.

At the current minimum wage in Ontario, $1.65 an hour, a regular worker would receive $3,432, not too bad perhaps if a person were single, but below the poverty line (set by the Senate Poverty Committee, using 1969 figures) for any size family, including a couple. The current minimum wage is clearly far too low to keep anyone out of poverty (and over 10 per cent of all wage earners in 1969 were paid less than $1.65). Even the federal government, by paying $2.75 an hour in its winter works incentives programme, has implicitly admitted that current minimum wage rates are not adequate to support a family. The proposed $3.40 rate would keep a family of up to six members above the poverty line (assuming that a person had a permanent job.)

Full-employment policies

The proposal to increase employment is made in recognition of the fact that high unemployment is far more detrimental to poor people than high rates of inflation (which the federal government is much more concerned about), and that unemployment falls hardest on that group of the population which is already economically weak, those at the bottom of the income scale. The first three parts of the sixth proposal are designed to increase employment opportunities; the last is designed to lessen the burden of unemployment for those without jobs.

Of the seven billion dollars now being spent each year on social welfare programmes in Canada, only about 9.2 per cent reaches the poor; the other 90.8 per cent is eaten up in the costs of administering the plans.

The proposal to develop secondary industries to process Canada's natural resources in Canada has been made by countless people before for a large number of reasons. At present, with most of the resource industries in Canada owned by foreigners, especially Americans, most of our natural resources are merely extracted here, then removed to the U.S. where they are refined. Extractive industries are capital intensive, using a lot of machinery, but only employing a few, highly skilled workers. Processing of natural resources would employ a larger number of workers, and, if more processing were done here, the opportunities for people to find employment would increase. (It would also allow the government to collect greater taxes from the resource companies in order to pay for such programmes as a guaranteed annual income.)

The production of an all-Canadian car proposal suggests that the amount of Canadian input into the production of automobiles be increased over the next several years, from the present 60 per cent (stipulated by the Auto Pact) to 75 per cent immediately and 100 per cent eventually. Again, the effect would be to increase the number of jobs available.

The moratorium on plant shutdowns or layoffs is proposed as a way of forcing companies to accept the obligation they have to their workers, to help them realign their lives after a layoff. A layoff or plant shutdown can seriously disrupt a worker's life, particularly if he has worked for a company for many years, and is of the age at which he is too young to get a pension but too old to be likely to find work. Yet, it is not uncommon for companies to close down operations or to move them to new locations simply because it will yeild a profit, and without any thought being given to the effect on former workers or the municipalities left behind. Often, too, layoffs occur to make up for a management blunder, such as, for instance, over-producing in one year, then laying off workers the next year until the huge inventories have been reduced.

An example cited by the OAPO is the INCO layoff of workers at the Sudbury plant, where 1,965 workers have lost their jobs or will lose them this spring. Many of the employee's benefits, supplied for them while they were working, disappeared when they were laid off. There is little work in Sudbury, so many of the men have gone on welfare, a cost to be borne by the taxpayers. Yet, INCO is a company which made $94 million profit last year, and $208 million the previous year. It is a company which has benefitted greatly from the fact that the government's tax laws allow petroleum and mining companies huge tax deductions, which amount to over $300,000,000 of taxes foregone every year. It is a company which has also greatly benefitted from the Ontario government's suppression, for many months now, of a report which clearly indicates that pollution from INCO is responsible for completely destroying the fishing industry (and the livelihood of many fishermen) in the lakes within a fifty, or perhaps even one hundred, mile radius of Sudbury.

In effect, the proposal wants to make people aware of the fact that big corporations, like INCO, are welfare recipients on a far grander scale than the poor are.

The moratorium on layoffs would only be for one year. The OAPO expects that, having been shown that the government is serious about unnecessary layoffs, the corporations will begin to plan properly to avoid or at least lessen the severe impact of, layoffs.

The moratorium on debts while a person is jobless is intended to reduce the impact of losing a job. A person suddenly out of work loses a great deal all at once: his steady income disappears, money for food, rent, heating and clothes is in short supply, and many things bought on credit, including perhaps his house, can be repossessed when he is unable to pay his monthly installments. The moratorium would lessen this string of bad luck.

It could be argued that, with this proposal, a person would be better off not working, charging things but never having to pay for them. The mere suggestion that this could be done points out something else the OAPO feels should be corrected: the fact that companies at present do not adequately research their applicants for credit, and thus may grant credit to someone who will not be able to meet more than a few payments before running out of money. It would be more fair to the buyer if the company properly checked on his or her ability to meet payments, and refused credit in doubtful cases, rather than granting it too easily. Proper researching of credit would undoubtedly also reduce interest rates, and would prevent the situation of unemployed person charging many items but never paying for them.

Not an end to poverty

The OAPO does not expect the impossible from the mere signing and presentation of a petition. As was noted in their first newsletter: "This petition will not end poverty in Ontario, but it does mark a very important step we (ie, all poor people) all must take. We must have the power over our lives and the force behind the decisions which we make. Too long now, they have been made by other people. We can only look at our condition and ask whether those decisions have been to our benefit or not. The time has come for us to make our own decisions. They can't be any worse, and who knows, they can be a great deal better."

vay the government of Ontario will be able to ignore us."

Trudeau government - deplorable lack of concern for consumers

The Department of Health, Education, and Welfare in the U.S. has proposed something long awaited by consumer advocates throughout the world. They have proposed a $23,000 study to find out why tots fall off tricycles. The title of the proposed study is "The Evaluation and Parameterization of Stability and Safety Performance Characteristics of Two- and Three-Wheeled Vehicular Toys for Riding."

Meanwhile, the Ottawa government of P. E. Trudeau has indicated, in its typical foot-dragging way, no intention of carrying out similar essential research here. This clearly unacceptable lack of action is only one more example of the lack of interest in the little people displayed by the Trudeau government.

He's now Premier Davis

Bill Davis, premier of Ontario, has been making some changes in his office staff lately, and at the same time has changed the name of his office, from the Office of the Prime Minister to the Office of the Premier, all with notable lack of fanfare.

Does this move suggest a sudden burst of humility from Davis? Or perhaps a return to reality, after a Walter Mitty-type flight of fantasy? Or maybe the change is an indication of Davis' future aspirations: perhaps he plans to take over the position of one Robert Stanfield and lead the federal Conservative Party on to national victory...in which case, of course, he would have no need now to pretend to titles which he has not yet earned but which he expects will one day be within his grasp.

Maybe he just felt like a change.

The biggies in banking

Athletes, musicians, artists, novelists and many other performers in the public spotlight have their ways of recognizing the greats among them. One group in Canada, however, usually manages to escape such honours. They are the financial wizards of the country.

To overcome this, the March edition of Maclean's published a list of the Top One Hundred of the banking world. Two persons prominent in the affairs of Queen's managed to make that 'honour roll.' One is the principal, John J. Deutsch, ranked number 47 (according to the assets of the companies of which he is a director.) Deutsch's main corporate interest was listed as Queen's University, his second and only other one being the Bank of Commerce.

The other Queen's person on the list is W. E. McLaughlin, a member of the Queen's board of directors, who also sits on 22 other boards and was ranked number 1 on the list (total assets of the companies he is involved in comes to $31,389,000,000.) McLaughlin is chairman and president of the Royal Bank, the richest in Canada, and is also on the board of General Motors Co. (Detroit.)

P.H.E. editorial

Dear Editors;

I am writing with respect to the Queen's Journal article dated Friday, March 10, "Physical Education or Secretarial Science." The audacity that an individual would direct both false and unfounded criticism toward any faculty, school or individual, and remain anonymous is to me appalling. The entire article is filled with misrepresentations and distortions of fact.

The fourth year student paper is a requirement for graduation which receives no more weighting than any other full term Arts and Science or Physical Education course P.H.E. 456 is a course which has been designed and accepted by the faculty of the School of Physical Education. Recommendations for change may be submitted through one or many possible channels: course evaluation forms, the staff-student liason committee, the PHESA executive or by directly approaching the Physical Education faculty. Regardless of the merit of the present evaluation scheme, to slander an individual in order to emphasize an opinion is unjustified.

Further to this, I take exception to the sarcastic tone the anonymous author directed toward the role our graduates fulfill. To elaborate here would require more time and space than the Journal could warrant in its editorial section; however, it will suffice to say that this misinformed and biased presentation is as ludicrous as the article's closing statement "Mickey Mouse."

-Rob Beamish, PHESA President

(Ed. note: The editorial in question 'credited' one professor with developing the thesis marking scheme which was criticized. Actually, it appears that most of the faculty members support the mickey mouse marking method, which gives equal marking weight to style and content of the thesis. We apologize to Prof. Edwards for unfairly singling him out.)

A.M.S. money

Dear Editors;

Now YOU can help spend over ONE MILLION DOLLARS!

The Irish Sweepstakes? The $64,000 question? Perhaps the Great Train Robbery.

No, it's actually a matter of the fatted calf. Out here in the Queen's wilderness we ponder anew the interesting fact that our Alma Mater Society, with one million dollars allegedly wedged securely in its pocket, asked for a fee increase in a referendum scarcely a month ago. Now we find that same society advertising its largesse and inviting one and all to come roll out the pork barrel again.

One cannot say that it is untypical of the manner in which the mind of the student political heavy works. Far from it--you know, mass participation and all that is IN. But to actually advertise for rip-off artists to spend--not spend with discretion, but merely spend--the student's hard-earned buck is really carrying things a bit far. If the only attraction of the positions which the AMS is attempting to fill is that of satisfying a delirious urge to spend, spend, spend, wildly, frivolously, or otherwise, participation as an ideal seems a trifle hollow. Not that I feel that most student government officials deserve to be castigated for the manner in which money is allocated. But the implications of this advertisement are rather shocking.

Perhaps the students should hire an Auditor-General--Maxwell Henderson might be able to keep our spenders in line, even if he can't beat Pierre at this game.

Yours in earnest contemplation concerning how they managed to come up with the amazing figure, ONE MILLION DOLLARS,

J. Christopher Woods

(ED. NOTE -- Perhaps the AMS practices deceptive advertising, but its cash flow and assets do total over the million dollar mark when you count all the fees it directly and indirectly levies, the receipts of the pub, the receipts for rent of forty or fifty apartments, Tricolor, Journal; the Student typing service, and Heffalump. In all, the AMS can only itself spend $5.30 per student and whatever profit it may make on other enterprises (usually bloody little).

International Club elections

Dear Editors;

Re: International Club Elections,

March 1, 1972.

I wish to disassociate myself from these elections held by the above-named club; in which I was nominated in absentia and subsequently elected president 1972-1973 without my consent.

Your reading public must know that I am not (nor have I ever been) a member of the International Club. And the fact that certain member(s) have used my name in this manner, without adequate explanation so far, has caused me, my friends, and the African Club in particular, slight embarrassment.

I have, therefore, rejected this position and demanded an apology from this club.

South Africa liberation

Dear Editors,

I found the article in Friday's Journal on liberation movements in Southern Africa both unrealistic and far from the truth in various aspects. The political situation in Southern Africa cannot be discussed by generalizing the situation in the Portugese colonies. The political approaches, the actual situations and the general relationships between black and white differ vastly from state to state.

As most South Africans and as Mr. Okoh, I also believe in the liberty of all people. Every nation must have the opportunity to govern their own land and determine their own future.

Instant solutions are not possible. Co-operation must be on a basis of equality of everybodies identity and rights. This is the only way to achieve lasting, long term development and prosperity in Africa.

I also see a need for public education. The world needs unbiased information as to the true situations in the different Africa States.

A.P. van der Merwe.

Transcendental meditation is catching on at Queen's

Transcendental Meditation is probably the fastest growing campus movement in North America. Now established, as the Students' International Meditation Society (SIMS), in several hundred colleges and universities across the country, SIMS also has been well received at Queen's University. Starting as a club under the AMS in September, SIMS has instructed over 150 persons in the technique of Transcendental Meditation (TM). The success among students of Queen's who have started TM has been well voiced. They have expressed their feelings about the technique as being "peaceful", "natural", "part of nature" and "Why didn't I know about this before." These expressions have been based on direct personal experience with Transcendental Meditation, a technique that is not a trance-like or hypnotic state or an intellectual practise. It is purely a mental (non-intellectual) process which unfolds each individual's unused potential and results in greater enjoyment, perception and fulfillment of personal relationships, studies and recreational activities. What concrete basis proves these seemingly far reaching claims? Why has the success of Transcendental Meditation been so obvious? Scientists have been pointing out in such reputable magazines as "SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN" February 1972 and "SCIENCE" March 1970 that the physical effects of Transcendental Meditation are "exciting and challenging." They show that the entire body receives a greater degree of rest within 15 minutes of meditation than that found within 8 hours of a full nights sleep. Also the mind as shown by brain wave patterns is found to be in a state of complete conscious awareness in a calm and refined manner, distinct from auto-suggestive or hypnotic trances. What does this mean to the student? It means that with a few minutes of Transcendental Meditation morning and evening the deep rest and rejuvenation to the entire mind and nervous system naturally reflects in broadened awareness and enthusiasm for activity of any type. This also includes the renewed ability to apply oneself to studies and also, through a strenghtened nervous system, withstand the traditional pressures and tensions of examination time. The technique of Transcendental Meditation is unique and can speak for itself through the positive experiences gained by meditating students.

We would like to invite everyone to hear more about Transcendental Meditation in our final Introductory lecture before exams. This talk will be held:

Wednesday evening 8:00 p.m.
Stirling Hall, Room 412C

Flora MacDonald

P.C. nomination sought

by Alan Broadbent

Flora MacDonald, a well-known member of the Queen's community, is in the running for the Progressive-Conservative nomination from Kingston for the upcoming federal election.

MacDonald has been the administrative officer of the Department of Political Studies at Queen's since 1966, and has also been a tutor in department when time permits. She has been an active figure in the intellectual life of the Queen's community, being a central resource person in such programs as last year's Media and Your Mind seminar.

In addition to her activities at Queen's, MacDonald is respected for her views on and her participation in Canadian Society. In the past few years, her most public achievment has been as a founder and the first Executive Director of the Committee for an Independent Canada, the group studying Canadianism in its broad implications. Her energies acted as a stabilizing force for the young movement, allowing it to become an established and considered voice in Canadian life.

The Committee for an Independent Canada was formed by a group of citizens concerned about the directions Canadian life was taking, including former cabinet minister Walter Gordon, publisher Jack McClelland, editors Claude Ryan of Montreal and Peter Newman of Toronto, and lawyer E.A. Goodman.

The statement of purpose for the Committee says, "We believe that Canadians today share a surging mood of self-awareness. But this mood must be translated into effective policies, or we may risk the erosion of Canadian independence by default. Government guidelines and vague political promises are no longer enough."

MacDonald was instrumental in the growth of the Committee from the small group of initiators to the hundreds of thousands of Canadians who now support it. She travelled from coast to coast, "talking to everyone who would listen". Gradually the support grew, due primarily to the enormous energies of MacDonald.

Prior to her involvement with the Committee for an Independent Canada, MacDonald worked at the National Headquarters of the Progressive-Conservative Party of Canada in Ottawa. She acquired the job in an accidental way, certainly a happy accident for the Party.

"I had just arrived in Ottawa and didn't know many people, but I checked my bag at the railway station and walked into the Tory Headquarters, just to say hello. They put me to work, right that minute," she remembers.

This occurred in 1956, after the Tories had swept to power. She started as a typist, but very quickly gained increasing responsibility. By 1963, she had been made the Executive Secretary of the Party, formalizing a responsibility she had assumed years before. In this role, she came to an understanding of the nature of the Party, and of political organization and government in this country.

Many of her colleagues credit her with having "run the Progressive-Conservative Party for John Diefenbaker for ten years". She held the Party together and was largely responsible for setting the direction of the Party for the future.

MacDonald has a long history of association with the Conservative Party in Canada, and with politics. She was born in 1926 in North Sydney, Nova Scotia. Her father was a telegraph operator, and like all Cape Bretoners took his politics seriously, keeping scrapbooks of the political issues and speechs of the day.

"It could be said that I was born in politics, and I've been passionately interested ever since," says Flora.

She attended North Sydney High School and Empire Business College, and went to work for the Bank of Nova Scotia in North Sydney. With the Bank, she moved to Montreal, Peterborough, and eventually to the head office in Toronto. She worked for the Bank from 1943 to 1952.

From 1952 to 1956, she worked at various secretarial positions in the United Kingdom, where she remained two years, and in Montreal and Vancouver. She then arrived in Ottawa and the Conservative Party Headquarters.

Since she came to Kingston and Queen's in 1966, MacDonald has been an active member of the community. Besides her valuable contributions to the Kingston academic community, she has accomplished many important things in Kingston.

One of her outstanding achievments was the establishment of a half-way house for women released from the Prison for Women. She was the president of the Elizabeth Fry Society of Kingston, a group of women who maintain relations with the prison. She organized the establishment of the half-way house, thereby giving women some security when they leave the prison.

MacDonald is a member of the finance committee of the Hotel Dieu Hospital, and was co-chairman of the Kingston Waterfront committee in 1971. She is also a consultant of the Student Volunteer Bureau, the group which supplies volunteer help to those community groups who indicate the need.

MacDonald is currently teaching at the National Defence College in Kingston, the first woman ever to do so. She is teaching a course in Canadian and International Affairs. This is a considerable achievment for a lady without a university degree, for the College is noted for the high calibre of their teaching staff. It is also a notable achievment for a woman.

Some like to view MacDonald as somewhat of a Women's Liberationist, but this view is an exageration of the facts. MacDonald published a paper in 1970, "Political Participation of Women in Canada", which became one of the most important inputs to the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. It put forth the case for the effective participation of women in Canadian life, but in a way that has been noted for its rationality and perspective. Her own experience has been an example of the abilities of women in areas of responsibility, and her advocacy of women's roles has avoided the stridency that has become connected with the public image of Women's Liberation.

MacDonald is now in the process of securing the Progressive-Conservative nomination for the Kingston Riding. This decision will be made by party members on March 27. She will be talking to the members of the Queen's community in the Lower Victoria Hall Lounge on Thursday night, March 23.

It would do no member of the community any harm to go to that meeting and meet this remarkable woman, a Canadian of significant stature, and a woman of great ability and charm.

the Dormouse

by Alan Broadbent

You can expect that spring will be particularly brilliant this year. It is an election year.

From all corners of the country, there has been speculation that the Liberal government will call an election sometime during the course of the year. The commentators have proven this point by illuminating the various devices the government has employed to prepare the populace to react favourably to the Liberal candidates.

First of all, they point to the special granting programs which have been iniated recently. Last summer there was the Opportunities For Youth program, and in operation now is the Local Iniatives Program, and there is yet another Opportunities For Youth program slated for the summer. These are interpreted as being softening devices, assuaging the popular unemployment pains. In fact, they are more than that, for they appear to many recipients as a font of free money. To many, they are the symbol of government concern and nitty-gritty generosity.

There are ctitics of such programs, however, and they generally fall into the category of political traditionalists. To poop up these people, the government gave them a traditional political mechanism to contemplate. This was The Great Cabinet Shuffle of '72.

Great cabinet shuffles have a notable effect on political tradionalists. First, it gives them the feeling that the government is active, and that it is concerned about the effectiveness and capability of the government. This sudden burst of front page news on the cabinet makes it appear that the government is functioning.

More than this, however, cabinet shuffles produce a frozen state among the political tradionalists. It is somewhat similar to the sects who specialize in the contemplation of the navel, although somewhat less productive. They meet together and discuss some of the larger meanings of the shuffle, they analyze it. they generally flog it of all meaning, and in the process enter a state of total inability to look with any perspective at the whole thing. Thus when the time arrives to make any decision about who shall govern, they are incapable of choosing, for their minds are so wrapped up in the inside scoops that they have no room left for decisions.

A certain portion of the population are not sucked in by any of these devices, and so the government provides for them a bit of the Las Vegas syndrome. We have a delightful example of this here in Kingston with our federal member, E.J. (Ben) Benson. Mr. Benson has been a big wheel in the government, somewhat to our disadvantage, and everyone has been wondering whether he will run again.

He has been very vague on this, as the rules of the game dictate, and has been featured with some incredible double talk, such as his classic, "It is not my intention not to run". This is his way of paraphrasing "Isn't it exciting to have an election and for everyone to be caught up in the circus feeling and wonder if the big wheels have it wrapped up and wouldn't we all find it dull if politicians were straight forward and just stated their intentions in an unqualified fashion."

The government is employing all sorts of other devices, many of which will be manifested in the near future. For example, a source close to the Prime Minister verifies that he will be taking his considerable vacations in Canada, for the first time in three years. His staff is currently taking out of storage and cleaning and pressing his bathing suits. In addition, the Prime Minister is taking daily practice sessions in diving at the local diving pool. Before long, the Prime Minister will be featured on the front pages of papers across the country doing three-and-a-half gainers, trimmly attired in the latest from Jantzen.

The government will also concentrate very much on having a very fine spring. It will be warm, without too much rain or wind, but with ideal breezes for the sailors. The trees will bud gloriously, and the flowers will show brilliantly and early. All grass will look like fine carpeting, but with the fragrance of clover. In urban areas, buildings will shine, the cathedrals will once again be white, poverty will be eliminated, pain will cease to exist, the world will be everyone's apple, and the Liberals will call an election.

Viola Soloist Performs

"Doktor's viola is an instrument whose natural beauty is enhanced by the sterling playing of one of the great artists of our day". So wrote the Washington Post about a recent concert by Paul Doktor.

Queen's audiences will have the rare opportunity to hear this artist in the final concert on the Dunning Hall Series on Monday 27 March at 8:30 p.m.

A pioneer for the viola as a virtuoso solo instrument, Paul Doktor through his concert tours, lectures, seminars, recordings and television appearances has done much to obtain wider recognition of this eloquent member of the string family. When not on tour, he teaches at the Mannes College of Music in New York and at New York University.

Paul Doktor is equally at home with the classical and the modern repertoires. He has edited a large number of compositions for viola. Schubert's Sonata "Per Arpeggione", the first work on his programme, is one such piece. He also takes great delight in offering unusual and rarely presented works. A real treat for music lowers will be the performance of selections from Eric Satie's "Sports et Divertissements". This is a set of piano solos with humourous words written into the music to help describe a set of watercolours by Henri Martin. The text will be spoken by Paul Doktor. Anita Gordon will play the piano solos.

The concert will include performances of music by the American composers Paul Hindemith and Ross Lee Finnly and will conclude with Johannes Brahms' Sonata No. 2 Opus 120, No. 2 for viola and piano.

Paul Doktor has an international reputation through his numerous recordings in Odyssey (Columbia), Louisville Orchestra First Edition Records, Mirrosonic, Telefunken-Decca, and Westminster labels.

Tickets, at $2.50 can be obtained from the Division of Concerts Box Office, Theological Hall, Queen's University (547-6194), for this concert by Paul Doktor, violist, on Friday 27 March at 8:30 p.m. in Dunning Hall.

Quebec: Authority and Independence

by S.E. Peterson

Although much has changed in Quebec in the last dozen years, and more has been challenged, the present secular leaders of Quebec are yet prisoners of their history, tied to their past by a common concept of the nature of power, authority and obedience. Although the players have changed with birth and death and elections, and although the chairs have been shuffled and relabelled, the fundamental rule of the game still remains intact: office is the source of power.

The structuralist theory of politics, like Weber's bureaucratic model of organization, treats the organization chart as a self-fulfilling prophecy. Thus, Mr. Trudeau can speak of the Cabinet and the Privy Council as the sources of political power in Canada. That subtle intellect has not even yet fully appreciated the difference between the office as a source of power, and the office as an instrument of power. The latter implies that the exercise of power by the incumbent is not absolute, not even within an appropriate constitutional definition, but always must be conditional on the acquiescence of important others. Some of the important others whom Mr. Trudeau has had difficulty incorporating into his structuralist concept of power and authority are, of course, Parliament itself (particularly that part composed of members of the opposition), the Lapalme guys, and others to whom he has given dietary or recreational advice.

This elitist, surpremacist concept of authority is not peculiar to Mr. Trudeau, or even to French-Canadians, but I believe is more deeply rooted among their current ruling elite than among other groups of politicians in Canada. Quite clearly, Mr. Drapeau, mayor of Montreal, shares similar views. In a recent interview with Solange Chaput Rolland published in the Montreal Gazette, he clearly indicated that an election victory was equivalent to a license to dictate for a term of years. Even Leon Dion, the eminent sociologist and political scientist at Laval, has expressed views on the bilingualism issue which, if implemented, would amount to bilingualism among French-Canadians being the privilege and the burden of the chosen few who would in turn bear the responsibility for, and risk of cultural contamination from, communicating with the rest of the world. The bulk of the French-Canadian population would remain safely unilingual, ranged behind the new secular guardians of le fait francais. The elite, by right of possession of office, have the right to rule. Even Duplessis would have agreed.

No matter how finely honed the mind trained in this tradition, there is simply no real comprehension of that most curious thing, institutionalized dissent. The notion of a loyal opposition remains a contradiction in terms. If one is loyal, one is not in opposition. If one is loyal, one follows the chief. If one is in opposition, one is not loyal. The difference between the messianic leader and the petty dictator lies, like beauty, in the eye of the beholder.

The epithet hurled at Claude Ryan of Le Devoir, the alleged plotter of parallel governments, that he wished to be pope of Quebec, in its mind snapping mixing of secular and religious themes, contains the fundamental conceptual unity of clerical and statist absolutism. It gives point to Hugh MacLennan's foreboding:

> "It may be the tragedy of Quebec and Canada that the instinctive tendency to replace Church-power by State-power will produce here the civil results it has produced in so many other modern nations."

One of the traditional themes of Quebec nationalist oratory has been the need to resist the centralizers in Ottawa. Yet it has long been recognized that the most strongly centralist government in Canada has been that of Quebec. This has been true since the days of New France and neither conquest nor rebellion nor union nor independence has changed this. The bureaucratic revolution that has gone on within the Quiet Revolution in Quebec has only served to make this centralism more secular, hence more visible. Dominance now, according to John J. Deutsch, is "based not on moral and spiritual authority, but on the secular authority of the state." Reports the Financial Post, "Quebec's essential impetus is toward a state where government influence will be all-pervasive... (a) reshaping of Quebec society along... basically syndicalist lines." The whole of society is being reorganized so that its parts may function as arms of the state.

One hundred and fifty years ago, a Frenchman found a word for it. Alexis de Tocqueville, in analyszing la survivance, feared most the tyranny of the majority. But de Tocqueville was concerned for la survivance of democracy in America. La survivance Quebec style, of the French fact in America, is to be achieved by realizing the tyranny of the majority.

It is not two solitudes, but two competing definitions of survival which are at the root of French-English conflict in Canada. The methods which the ruling elites of French Canada have hitherto applied to assure the survival of the French fact have by their very nature threatened the survival of the methods of democracy which are the foundations of English political society. Thus, it has been to the advantage of both populations to be distracted by the age old techniques of border skirmishes and false threats of foreign aggression. These border clashes, in the peculiar manner of Canadians, have been in the form of constitutional debates. (And we see at once the runctional purpose of Quebec's charges of centralization.) Our Saar, Sudetenland, Kashmir are sections of the British North America Act and tattered Privy Council decisions.

Ramsay Cook has suggested that constitutional reform is a necessary, but not sufficient, condition for the future integrity of Canada. This would appear to be true for at least two reasons. First, the federal and provincial politicians who engage in the constitutional game must concern themselves that the unhappy possible future foreseen by MacLennan is rendered as unlikely as possible. Second, only when we have ceased to play the constitutional game will we all be forced to come to grips with the fundamental problem of finding ways and means to teach these two solitudes to love each other, to "protect and touch and greet each other", instead of being walled off from each other by parchment, silk and sealing wax.

Is this happening? Can it happen? I believe that the answer to both questions is yes.

Politicians are not all bad. It is quite evident that Mr. Trudeau's bilingualism policy is an honest attempt to breach the walls, and has received a deservedly warm response in the provinces. More important, it has generated reciprocal action in the provinces. It may even be that Mr. Trudeau's disdain for constitutional reform also reflects an awareness of its essential irrelevance, although I fear it may be based more on his being king of the higher castle, if not custodian of the higher logic. Within Quebec, the classic confrontation in St. Leonard over the local francophones' majority right to legislate French-only education was effectively abrogated by the provincial government. In other words, the tyranny of the majority was rejected.

More pertinent is the existence of the Parti Quebecois. As all Canada knows, the PQ stands for the complete separation of Quebec from Canada-true separatism. But the PQ by that same policy is the only party to apply French logic to the constitutional issue, to recognize its fundamental irrelevance and to dispense with the crutch of border warfare at a stroke by abolishing the constitution. By that act, the PQ has freed itself to examine with clarity and precision the true nature of Quebec's internal problems and to develop solutions for them that omit nothing and evade nothing. The provincial Liberal party is still bedevilled with border skirmishes. The National Union, now called Quebec Unity, has become largely irrelevant. I do not speak of Social Credit, Quebec style. It falls to the PQ to focus the attention of the province on its true internal situation.

It is even possible for an anglophone resident of Quebec to conclude in all self-interest that the lucidity and rationality of the PQ's position would make him better off inside an independent Quebec, than under any other party in a federalist Quebec. In short, the PQ is not a prisoner of the absolutist concept of power and authority, and it alone among the present provincial parties can therefore reject any need to depend on the tyranny of the majority. Thus, there is no inconsistency in the PQ's striving for independence by democratic means from within the federal context.

For me, however, the strongest affirmation (and here I must relapse into personal anecdote) is the beautiful people who came to work for me during the past two summers while I was employed by the federal government. One day last summer, the group, which included students from B.C., Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec, took the afternoon off to hold a minature Couchiching Conference in the Gatineau hills, and Giselle explained it all for us. I cannot recall her exact words but the feeling of the moment, the sincerity of the speaker and the intensity of the little audience trying to absorb her significance, are etched on my mind. In essence, she said a plaque on all your houses, your clerks, clerics, symbols, shibboleths: I want to be me in my own way. It was not anti-English, anti-federal, anti-clerical and anti-anything. Just pro-me. In short, Quebec is partaking of the greening of America, Consciousness III style. To these people, Messrs. Trudeau, Ryan, Drapeau et al. are as irrelevant as Duplessis, Maria Chapdelaine, Jeanne Mance and Bishop Laval.

The Parti Quebecois is embarassed because its membership is disproportionately upper-middle class and draws inadequately from the workers. Clearly, its membership is also strongest among the young, and it does not draw proportionately from among the established middle aged and older population. But this is its strength and promise for the future of both and Quebec and Canada. By postulating the super sane opinion of true independence, the PQ has forced the recognition of the essential vacuity of constitutional reform: the emperor has no clothes. And by that very act, the PQ has made separatism unnecessary, for implicit in it is abandonment by both sides of the politics of the tyranny of the majority.

And if Giselle is free, and her friends, then French Canada is truly independent from all domination by other than its own collective will. When French Canada can trust itself, it can begin to trust the rest of us. If we reciprocate, the union will survive.

OTTAWA — The one-nation constitutional policy of Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau was challenged Thursday by a former member of the cabinet of John Diefenbaker and a former executive assistant to Mr. Trudeau.

Quebec is a dinstinct nation and should have a constitutionally guaranteed right to pull out of Confederation, Martial Asselin (PC, Charlevoix) and Pierre de Bane (L, Matane) said jointly in their own dissenting report from the special parliamentary committee on the constitution.

"We feel it is essential that in the actual body of the constitution, Quebec society, and hence Quebec, be accorded a basic right to self-determination," their report said.

Early last year, before the committee had begun drafting its report, Liberal members of the committee were privately but explicitly made aware that Mr. Trudeau was firmly opposed to any self-determination clause in a new constitution.

Apart from the recommendations of the Asselin-de Bane report, the official tabling of the majority report yesterday by chairman Mark MacGuigan (L, Windsor-Walkerville) took on the aspect of a farce Thursday as one committee member after another rose to reveal that he, too, had his own dissenting report.

The main recommendations of the majority report closely parallel the proposals made by the federal Government to a series of constitutional conferences that began in February, 1968. They call for increased decentralization to the provinces of the implementation of social policies, and greater concentration of the main levers of the economy in federal hands.

An aide to Labor Minister Fernand Guindon, posing as an employee of General Motors of Canada Ltd., Monday week, handed out press releases for the company on the floor of the Ontario Legislature.

Richard Perdue, Mr. Guindon's executive assistant, told reporters The Globe and Mail had refused to print the General Motors' release.

"Read what General Motors had to say and what the Globe didn't use," Mr. Perdue urged, holding a sheaf of press releases entitled, "General Motors Statement."

When I asked who he was, Mr Perdue said he was from General Motors.

Asked for his name, Mr. Perdue said it didn't matter, that he was from the "public relations department of General Motors."

Mr. Guindon has refused to accept Mr. Perdue's resignation on the grounds that "one mistake should not ruin a young man's career."

TORONTO — The man who is perhaps the world's foremost authority on Norman Bethune feels the Canadian doctor, who has been idolized in China, "within 20 years will likely be regarded as the greatest Canadian hero of this century."

"And God knows, we could use some heroes," said R. J. Stewart, a history teacher at University of Toronto Schools (UTS) who is researching a biography of Bethune.

Bethune, a native of Gravenhurst, died in China in 1939 while treating and training Chinese Communists. Before that he had applied his medical and organizational skills on the side of the Loyalists in the Spanish Civil war.

Stewart leaves Toronto Wednesday for a month-long visit to China to gather material for his biography on Bethune, whom he rates as one of the most fascinating yet neglected men in Canadian history.

OTTAWA — The federal government plans "substantial changes" in its controversial Competition Act before the measure is reintroduced in the House of Commons next fall, Consumer Affairs Minister Robert Andras told a seminar of corporation lawyers here Friday.

The competition legislation unveiled last June proposed tough new rules dealing with a wide variety of business practices, and the establishment of a Competitive Practices Tribunal to rule on mergers and industry reorganizations.

Andras said the government has received more than 300 briefs and submissions criticizing its original competition legislation.

He indicated that he expects to present a revised bill to the cabinet sometime in May.

WATERLOO — Blank looks and rapid exits have greeted the campus Women's Lib's attempts to infiltrate the men's sauna at the University of Waterloo.

Women have been walking into the men's sauna in the nude during the last week. Some made their exit hastily, and others just stared.

TORONTO — French language education rights, including the right to French secondary schools, will become firmly entrenched in Ontario and protected by a Linguistic Rights Commission if the government accepts the report of the Symons Commission which was tabled in the House Thursday.

The report proposes machinery which would give Franco-Ontarians a much stronger and more direct say in their education through greatly strengthened French language committees attached to local school boards.

If a board rejects the advice of its French language committee, the new Linguistic Rights Commission, a five-man body appointed by the Education Minister can hear an appeal.

If the commission fails to reach a settlement by mediation it can overrule the school board and impose a settlement binding on both parties. The Minister of Education can hear a final appeal.

In divisional board areas where English-speaking Ontarians were the minority, the procedure would work in reverse and their rights would be protected by an English language committee.

TORONTO — James Laxer, leader of the New Democratic Party's left-wing Waffle group, was nominated Wednesday night to contest the next federal election in York East riding.

In what was widely regarded as a test of his group's strength, Laxer got 147 votes to 100 for Marion Bryden, research director for the provincial NDP caucus at Queen's Park.

Laxer, 30, a professor of political science at York University, told the 300 persons at the meeting in East York Collegiate, "It's been suggested I'll divide the party ... but to grow the party must be a forum for open debate."

OTTAWA — The audit of the federal Government's accounts for the latest fiscal year is in its final stages of preparation, but what has held it up past its legal deadline and will continue to do so for two more months is its translation into French, Auditor-General Maxwell Henderson said Tuesday.

Mr. Henderson was called by a unanimous resolution of the House before the Commons standing committee on public accounts yesterday afternoon and last night to explain why his report was late.

ST. JOHN'S — Newfoundland, the poorest province in the country, seems to be on a one-way street, going the wrong way.

Prices are rising and jobs are disappearing at an ever-growing rate. Instead of closing the gap with the economy of the rest of the country, Newfoundland seems to be steadily falling behind.

OTTAWA — Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau fielded opposition questions in the House of Commons Thursday without taking his nose out of a book.

He looked down at the book, which appeared to be an antique volume with engravings, when he was being asked questions and continued to flip through the pages when he was on his feet answering.

"Is that Dr. Spock's baby book?" an opposition MP jeered.

Angered by what appeared to be a deliberate show of disdain for the Commons, New Democrat Leader David Lewis accused Trudeau of "a piece of disgraceful behavior" and demanded that he "show some courtesy to his House."

Trudeau wasn't fazed. When he finished the book, he picked up a newspaper.

OTTAWA — The Chinese People's Republic has officially invited Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau to visit China.

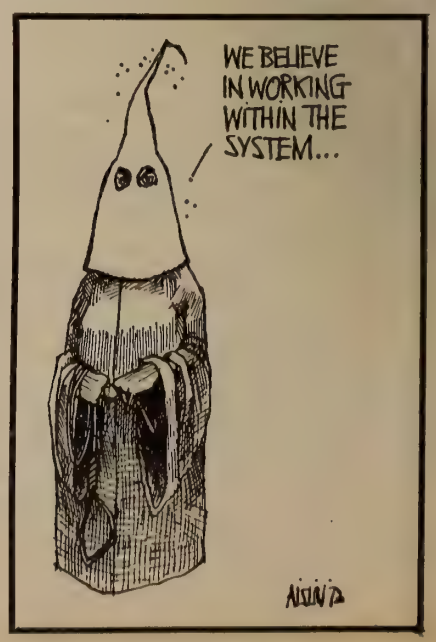
WASHINGTON — The Department of Health, Education and Welfare has proposed a $23,000 study to find out why tots fall off tricycles. The title of the proposed study is the Evaluation and Parameterization of Stability and Safety Performance Characteristics of Two- and Three-Wheeled Vehicular Toys for Riding.

MOSCOW — Except for a few patches in the south, the Soviet Union is still in the grip of one of the coldest winters of this century. Experts estimate that at least a quarter of the "winter" grain sown last fall has been killed by the deep freeze. It will have to be reseeded, but the intense cold has delayed work.

It is not only that the country is uneasy about the grain, feed and vegetable yield next fall. There is also the worry that the rich Kuban and Ukraine regions may become dust bowls, as they did in the early 1960's.

NEW DELHI — Prime Minister Indira Gandhi's Congress Party was confirmed Wednesday to have an over-all majority in state elections in Tripura in the far northwest of India. This gives the party absolute majorities in 14 of the 16 states that went to the polls. The Marxists were considered to have a good chance in Tripura but won only 16 of the 60 seats. Congress candidates won 41.



NEW HAVEN, Conn. — Two young writers are trying to sell U.S. youth on the idea of migrating to one of the less populated states and taking it over through the political process.

James Phelan and James Blumstein, said any of the 10 states with small populations will do.

The states - - Vermont, Alaska, Wyoming to mention a few - would become the site for new communal living, new forms of government, new forms of business arrangements and, they say, the rest of the country might learn something.

PEKING — Members of the Ontario trade mission completed their business Friday and packed their bags for home, confident that their visit has given new impetus to the efforts of Canadian manufacturers to establish themselves in the Chinese market.

He may not be a Washington, but George Wallace, the flamboyant, fundamentalist governor of Alabama, could be on his Democratic way to the White House. He rather easily won the Democratic Party's Florida primary election, with 42 per cent, and more liberal politicians who had been confident were left short-changed and disappointed.

TECH SUPPLIES PRICES TO RISE

Technical Supplies, the campus bookstore, is raising its prices at the end of this school year.

A letter from Dr. Jim Brown, president of the corporation that owns Tech Supplies, was released this week; it says the 10 percent discount which applies to all textbooks sold at the store will be reduced to 5 percent "for application to sales in summer school 1972" and thereafter.

It is addressed to the directors and shareholders of Queen's University Engineering Society Services Incorporation, and dated March 7. QUESSI, a non-profit Eng Soc subsidiary, owns Tech Supplies and Clark Hall.

The auditor's report attached to Brown's letter shows that in 1971, Tech Supplies sales were $977,588. Cost of goods sold was $808,722, and operating expenses were $128,590. Taking into account miscellaneous costs and revenue, the business had a net income of $22,835 for 1971.

But that apparent profit is deceptive.

For during the same period, the value of books in stock in Tech Supplies increased by more than $80,000. The $22,835 profit could not cover this increase, Brown points out; "In fact, only the willingness of publishers to defer payments ... allowed us to avoid bank loan."

Such a buildup is the result of more half-year courses and more courses which use large reading lists rather than assigned textbooks, Brown says. "The store must stock more items than it can reasonably hope to sell in one year ... A problem exists in the store and means for controlling it must be found soon."

Brown also points out that QUESSI has not made any payments for three years on its obligation to Queen's University, which is to pay off the costs of renovations made to Clark Hall in 1963 and 1964. QUESSI owes Queen's more than $57,000 on this basis.

"The only significant attractive aspect of the auditor's report" is the gross margin on sales, Brown says. In both 1971 and 1970 this figure was about 17.3 percent of total sales; it represents the money available to pay salaries and operating expenses for the bookstore. (With sales of $977,588 and cost of $808,722, the gross margin in 1971 was $168,866.)

The $22,835 actual profit brings the retained earnings of QUESSI to $242,231 at the end of 1971.

Most of that money is tied up in books in stock.

Brown's letter says, "On balance, the auditor's report establishes clearly that the bookstore cannot continue to operate under its present policy of offering textbooks at a discount of 10 percent."

That discount will go to 5 percent, it says.

"In fact, the Board probably should begin consideration now of complete elimination of discounts on books."

Brown also comments that the bookstore's financial problems make it especially fortunate that the university senate is making a thorough study of the bookstore needs of the campus.

"The obligation to maintain a viable operation must govern," he says.

Applications are down overall, up in science

Applications to enter Queen's are down seriously this year from 1971.

There will be six to eight percent fewer applications this year, according to preliminary figures recently given to the university senate and the arts and science faculty board.

This corresponds to a dropoff across Ontario, Dr. M. Sayer told the senate in a report yesterday. Applications from Grade XIII students are down about 5 percent overall; "the number of non-Grade 13 applicants into first year is less than half what it was at the same time a year ago."

But there will be no difficulty in filling first-year classes, Sayer said: "the number of 'first choice' applications is still considerably in excess of the number of places available."

Sayer added that applications to arts and engineering are showing the strongest declines, while applications to science and other programmes have increased.

Last year 8371 people applied to enter first-year programmes in arts and science. A decline of eight percent would bring this figure down to 7701, still several times the first-year arts and science quota of 1350.

The ratio is even higher in other faculties.

Queen's was one of two Ontario universities to fill its first-year quotas last year, and can expect to do so again, therefore, arts and science dean Dr. Ronald Watts told his faculty board two weeks ago.

More startling than the decline in overall applications is the shift mentioned by Sayer. Watts said applications for B.A. programmes were down by 22 percent, and for B.Sc. programmes up by 18 percent.

This may result in some change in the B.A. and B.Sc. quotas within the arts and science overall quota. At present 690 places are intended for arts students and 525 for science (which includes, for statistical purposes, geography, math and psychology majors as well as the pure sciences).

But a large shift in favour of places for science students is impossible because of equipment and staff limitations in the sciences.

This suggests higher standards for entering science students than for arts students, for whom the competition will be slightly less severe.

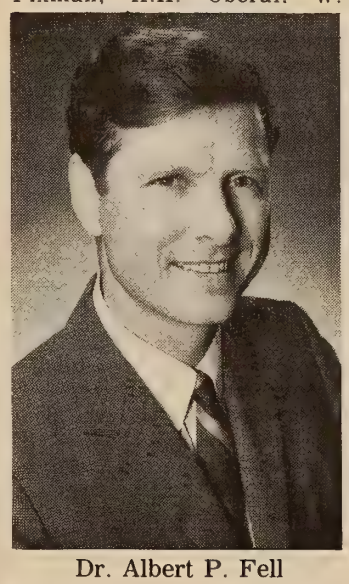
Other quotas within arts and science are 70 for phys ed, 25 for art education and 40 for music education.

First-year engineering should be slightly larger in the fall; the quota is 400, compared with the 376 students in Science 75. Commerce is expected to decline slightly from 160 to 155 in first year. Nursing science and rehab therapy are to remain steady at 50 and 36. The first medical year is planned for 75 students, of whom 48 will come from second-year pre-meds (Meds 76), the last class to complete pre-medicine at Queen's.

Total full-time enrollment at Queen's next year is expected to be 8809, compared with 8439 this year.

52 staff will be on leave next school year

The university has announced that 52 faculty members, including two deans, an associate dean, two directors, and two department heads, will be on leave from Queen's next school year.



Those going on leave of absence or sabbatical leave include Dr. R.L. McIntosh, dean of graduate studies; Dr. T. Stewart Webster, dean of student affairs; Dr. Albert P. Tax exemption is asked for garage

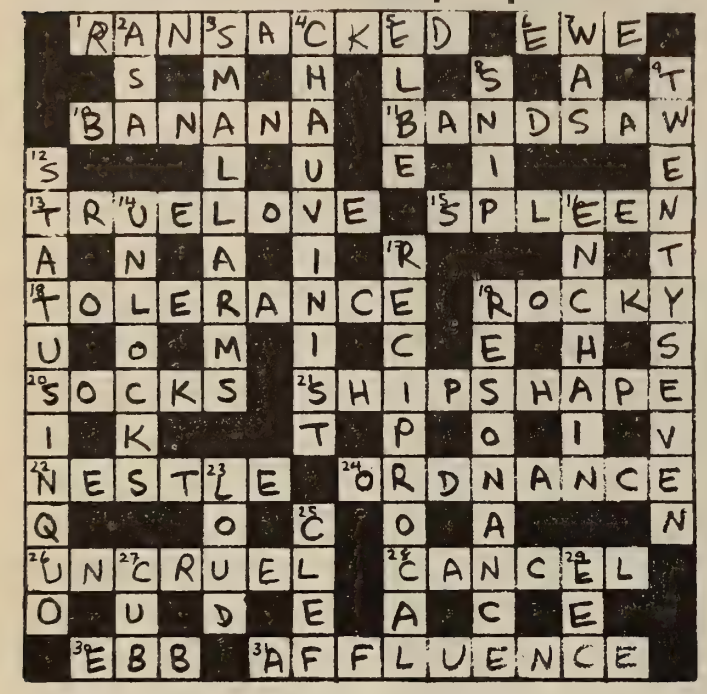
A request that the underground parking garage being built under the lower campus field be exempted from payment of municipal taxes has been received by the City of Kingston.

In a letter sent to the City on March 8, the Queen's University and Affiliated Hospitals' Council (QUAFHOP), which is in charge of the building of the new Queen's Health Sciences Complex and its accompanying parking garage, indicated that taxation of the garage would put the whole complex in jeopardy. The letter stated that, although the provincial government has insisted that adequate parking facilities be provided for the $106 million complex, the government will not subsidize the construction of such facilities. QUAFHOP, therefore, must find the money to build it, which it claims it can do if the garage is not subject to municipal taxation.

Mayor Valorie Swain indicated on Wednesday that the city has requested much more detailed information on which to base an opinion of the merits of the QUAFHOP request, since the original letter was quite brief and sketchy. He added that he has received assurances from Queen's Vice-principal R.J. Kennedy that this information is being prepared. It is expected that the city will receive it fairly soon, possibly before the city budget comes down next Tuesday.

At the Finance Committee meeting on March 8 at which the letter was first discussed, the committee members re-affirmed the position of the committee that taxes should be levied on all properties under the jurisdiction of QUAFHOP, including the parking garage.

Kingston already has a high proportion of tax-exempt property, totalling 34.5 percent of its taxable assessment.



Track Gaels still hot

A six-man contingent from the Queen's track squad turned in another hot effort at the 91st Highlanders Invitational Meet in Hamilton last weekend, continuing the most successful indoor season in Queen's history. Veteran Brian Aiken set the tone in the afternoon preliminarys, turning in a fast 1:14.1 to edge American Cal Evans in what was to be the best race of the whole meet. Aiken slipped back to fourth in the evening final, but his heat time was the best recorded in the 600 competition.

Sprinter Hugh Fraser had a busy day, running in 6 races, and winning the Junior 300 in a time of 33.0 sec. Another Gael veteran, Bob Milne, grabbed 2nd spot in the mile preliminary in 4:26.2, while Kip Sumner ran third in the final with 4:12.7 clocking. The top three men were battling down to the wire, with Sumner barely missing 2nd spot. Hurdler Don Price also had a good day, finishing 4th in a time of 06.4, just a half-second behind world-recordholder Rod Milburn of Southern Louisiana. Milburn, voted track and field's Outstanding Athlete in 1971, gave Gael hurdlers Dave Jarvis and Price some tips after the meet, in a typical gesture of cooperation.

This weekend, Fraser, Jarvis, Sumner, Brian MacDonald, Glen Milligan and Bob Lingwood will compete in the Canadian Indoor Championships in Quebec City, while Aiken, Milne, Price, and two of Queen's top female runners, Irene Harris and Aileen Kirby, will move on to Montreal for another Indoor meet. With final selections for the Olympic Team being made in June, officials will be keeping a sharp eye on both meets; Jarvis and Fraser look like good possibilities, with the middle-distance runners less likely...but you never know.

Job prospects bleak for many 1972 graduates

by Bob Mutrie

University graduates this year face "gloomy hiring figures" and tough prospects despite their B.A.'s, M.A.'s and Ph.D.'s, a financial analyst said recently in The Financial Post.

A recent survey of 37 campuses by the University and College Placement Association showed that on-campus recruiting dropped 41 per cent last year, according to the article by analyst Hugh McIntyre.

He pointed out that a 1971 report by the Canada Department of Manpower and Immigration recorded a 28 per cent decline in total demand for pass degree graduates. The same report showed a 20 per cent decline in demand for honours graduates, a 21 per cent decline for applied science graduates, and a 44 per cent decline for those in the natural sciences. Demand for graduates in commerce and business administration showed a 4 per cent increase.

However, McIntyre pointed out that Queen's University "seems to be doing better for its graduates than many other institutions".

Queen's placement director Dave Wroe said in a recent Journal interview that he agrees: Queen's has a much better placement record than other schools.

"Queen's has a reputation for a good product," Wroe said. Factors which have contributed to this reputation, he added, include the type of student who comes to Queen's, their tendency towards conservatism, and the strong student government here.

Those graduating from the B. Comm. programme, Wroe stated, mostly are already committed to employment or some other activity.

M.B.A. graduates, he said, also are in demand, but must maintain flexibility of interest to attract as many employment opportunities as possible.

In engineering, he said, there are still a few graduates looking for jobs, but most are ultimately hired. By May of last year, he went on, only 15 per cent of Queen's applied science graduates were unemployed.

Wroe stressed the need for arts and science graduates to be flexible in searching out job opportunities. "A B.A. degree," he pointed out, "does not ensure a high income upon graduation."

The arts and science programmes are not career-oriented, he pointed out, and students may have to choose flexibility or lower incomes in the field of their original choice.

B.A. graduates are coming to accept income flexibility, he said, but B. Sc. graduates are less flexible.

"Those in natural sciences tend to insist on jobs related to narrow fields of interest," he said, pointing out the many small specialized divisions in the natural sciences.

Engineering is even more inflexible, he pointed out, but applied science graduates have received specific job training, as opposed to the more theoretical aspects in natural science.

Wroe mentioned that in general companies are slow in giving job offers this year: "On-campus recruiting only places about 250 graduates."

He said there is an increase in the number of companies which ask the placement office for graduates with specific qualifications. The office forwards such requests to appropriate departments or contacts qualified students directly, Wroe said.

Ontario offers 3200 summer jobs

The Ontario government will give jobs to more than 3200 secondary and post-secondary students this summer, under eight separate programmes geared toward student interest.

Youth in Action, under the department of education, is providing $3000 to agencies hiring a student to coordinate special activities.

Youth and the Law under the Ontario Police Commission will pay 80 students $100 per week to work with and observe police departments across the province. This programme requires students with at least one year of university -- preferably more.

The Summer Volunteer Programme will hire 50 post-secondary students to work on social activity projects at agencies under the ministry of community and social services. This programme runs from 8 to 14 weeks and is designed to provide students in social sciences and social work with experience to complement their formal education.

The Ontario government is once again running Project Sweep, which will hire 2600 students for environmental and conservation work.

The Department of Agriculture is hiring 15 students with 4-H and Junior Farmers experience to arrange transportation and farm accommodation for 3000 twelve- to fifteen-year-olds.

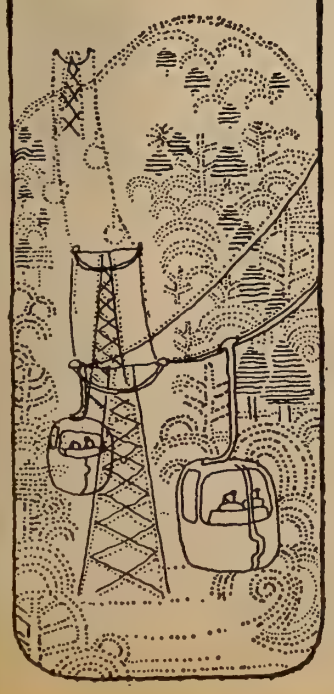
Project SNAP will be hiring 70 students in the social and health sciences in 8 to 12-week spells to provide recreational and social programmes in nursing and old-age homes.

The department of correctional services is organizing Project CRISP to employ 300 students for up to 12 weeks at $100 to $150 per week. They will be working with children and young adults in correctional institutions.

There will also be 100 jobs available for track and field organizers -- for people with experience as competitor, organizer, instructor or coach.

The government will run Ontario Youtheatre for students with experience in lighting, sound, sets and properties. Youtheatre is also looking for a group to sponsor a Kingston summer drama programme; they will be subsidized $3500 to $7000 for salaries and production expenses.

The Ontario Summer Swimming Programme is also looking for regional coordinators to set up teams and arrange meets.



There will also be a programme hiring students with experience in arts and crafts to produce and sell their work in a shop to be established somewhere in Ontario.

Information is available from Career Planning and Placement at Queen's. The assistant director there, John Harvey, said no closing date has been set for applications, but added that various projects would be quickly filled.

The new airport: bureaucracy's biggest bungle

by Bob Almack

On Thursday, March 2nd Transport Minister Donald Jamieson and Provincial Treasurer D'Arcy McKeough, in an almost unprecedented display of co-operation, announced their intention to construct a second Toronto airport to be located in the rural area north-east of the Boroughs of Scarborough and East York in the Markham-Pickering area. On March 3rd form letters from the Department of Transport outlining the expropriation procedure were stuffed in area mail boxes. This letter contained the following rather delightful conclusion:

> "In the meantime, therefore, your normal occupation of the land should continue and payments such as rent, insurance, taxes etc. should continue to be made."

Big brother, in a very patronizing manner, had given his orders.

That same evening concerned citizens -- including mechanics, engineers, musicians, teachers, doctors, truckdrivers and even a student -- held an impromptu meeting in a home near Claremont to discuss the recent development. They learned that the new airport will require the exprorriation of a total of 18,000 acres, or over 30 square miles. A new city called Cedarwood with a proposed population of 200,000 is to be built south of the airport, and this alone will require 25,000 acres of land. The present town of Markham will also become a city of 200,000 and to the west, between Unionville and Agincourt, a further 200,000 people are expected to be located. The Markham area would therefore be as surely a physical part of metro Toronto as East York now is. A network of roads, including the new super highway No. 407 will be required to service the area.

This decision will result in the destruction of the ecology of 50,000 acres. It will cause displacement and disruption of, and mental anguish to thousands of residents who will be forced to move. The social costs of noise, fear and environmental degredation will be borne by other thousands bordering the airport site.

The meeting resolved to oppose the construction of any new airport in southern Ontario. Four committees were struck: a Steering Committee, a Fund Raising Committee, a Publicity Committee and a Legal Committee. A treasurer was also appointed, and a second public meeting was arranged for Tuesday, March 7th at the local town hall in Brougham.

On the following Monday 300 citizens attended a meeting of the Pickering Municipal Council to encourage the passage of a unanimous resolution which stated "...that this Council is opposed to the construction of a second Toronto airport in the location suggested."

The following day approximately 1000 citizens attended the meeting in Brougham. "People or Planes" was both the title and the theme. Dr. Charles Godfrey, a professor of rehabilitation medicine at the University of Toronto, was elected chairman of the new "People or Planes" organization. Local branches of the various committees were formed and legal counsel was appointed. As community spirit and concern began to mount a group of forty artists offered to help with publicity and poster design, while seven lawyers, including a judge, volunteered their legal advice. Students of the Uxbridge and Pickering High Schools prepared a petition and collected 1,600 signatures.

Since that initial meeting "People or Planes" has expanded to include thousands of citizens from York and Ontario Counties. It has received the official support of the "Stop Spadina" organization and of the East York Ratepayers Association and is pressing for a commitment from Pollution Probe and the Federation of Ontario Naturalists. A protest and publicity meeting held in Pickering High School on March 17th received good coverage by Toronto and area news media, especially by the Toronto Star who featured it in their Saturday headlines.

Why is the public challenging their governments on this issue?

(1) The manner in which the decision was made was totally undemocratic.

-- The elected representatives for the area, Mr. Norman Cafik, the federal member for the riding of Ontario, and Mr. Bill Newman, member of the Provincial Legislature for Ontario South, were each notified only hours before the news was released. Since then both members have publicly condemned the entire plan. The Pickering Township Council has voted against it and an entire county rejects it. The government has allowed no opportunity whatsoever for a public discussion of the choice of site, or indeed of the need for a new airport at all. Several thousand people -- no one knows exactly how many -- have suddenly been told that the state requires their homes and lands. No reasons have been given; no studies have been made public. The fundamental axioms of democracy have been violated.

-- The right to expropriate has always been based on the concept of the public interest being supreme over the private interest. One individual cannot reasonably frustrate the needs of a whole community or of a nation. Does this principle apply in Pickering if both elected representatives are known to be opposed and if a community, a township and a county condemn the program? Surely an entire county can not be considered a private interest. The public interest has apparently been determined by two cabinet ministers, one from Newfoundland and the other from Chatham, Ontario. Who are the public? Are not the thousands of people of Ontario County also the public? Perhaps we have gone full circle now, for in this case a private interest, the Department of Transport's bureaucracy, is expropriating the public.

--The planning process in Ontario has many built-in checks and balances. For example, if a municipality wishes to effect a land use change, the application must be submitted to several departments including O.W.R.C. and the Conservation Authority. In the case of the airport, however, rezoning of 43,000 acres has been made law in secret, without reference to the public or normal government departments created to advise on land use. The Minister of Transport, the Provincial Treasurer and perhaps a few top aides have made the decision. There are real dangers in such a technological bureaucracy.

(2) A new airport is not needed.

--The Department of Transport justifies the need for a second airport with the following statistics:

> 1964 -- When Malton opened it handled 2,800,000 passengers.
> 1972 -- Malton (the present Toronto International) handled over 6,000,000 passengers.
> 1978 -- Malton projected to handle 12,000,000 passengers, its capacity.

--Along with Montreal and Dallas, the new airport will be one of the three largest in the world. Canada (population 20,000,000) will have two of the three biggest airports in the world (population 4,000,000,000).

--The Department of Transport has predicted that by 1978 the present Toronto International will be handling its capacity of twelve million passengers. Such an extrapolation is false and misleading. Last year a severe slump in air traffic affected airports around the world. Instead of the predicted 15 per cent increase there was only an increase of one or two per cent. And yet the Department predicts a 100 per cent increase in six years!

--Seventy per cent of the air traffic leaving the present Toronto airport sets down within one to one and a half hours. This short distance traffic could be eliminated by the provision of high speed (150 mph) trains, as has been done in Japan, Brazil and Switzerland. If high speed, high frequency trains enabled the trip from Toronto to Montreal to be made in two hours, who would take the trouble to fly?

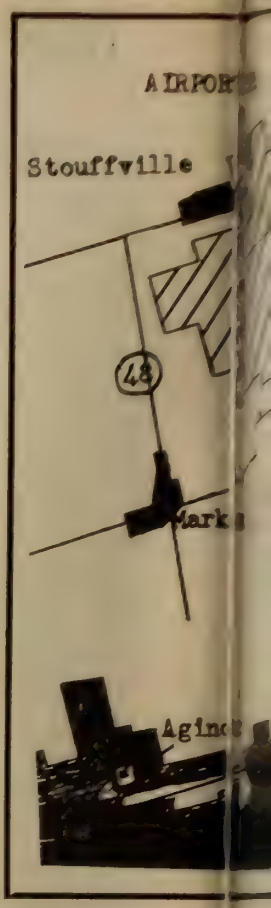
--The present Toronto airport is underutilized. Air Canada domestic and foreign departures average only four per hour. The peak could be eleven per hour.

-- As more long haul and short haul jumbo jets like the 747 and the 1101 come into service, the number of flights can be reduced to one quarter of those presently required.

-- The present air traffic control system is outdated. The technology which can guide a man to the moon exists. If applied to aircraft landing control, many more flights per hour could be accomodated.

-- Almost one third of the flights leaving Toronto International depart between eight and nine a.m., between five and six p.m. and between eight and nine p.m. If landing fees and passenger rates reflected this peak load condition, the public and operators would reschedule.

-- What the Toronto airport does lack is sufficient terminal facilities. The glacier-like slowness with which new terminal facilities are now being built at Toronto can only lead to the conclusion that either the governments of Canada and Ontario are hopelessly inefficient at getting buildings built, or else they are deliberately letting construction slow down in order to encourage the belief that hopelessly overcrowded terminals means more airports should be built. Some citizens are suspicious that the program is merely a make-work project.



-- Washington's second airport (Dulles) was built twenty-eight miles from the city. It is now a white elephant. Pickering airport will be thirty-five miles from central Toronto.

(3) There would be seriously detrimental environmental effects.

The following is an exerpt from the speech from the throne at the opening of the Ontario Legislature, February 29th, 1972 (two days prior to release of the Government plans for the Pickering airport):

"My Government will continue to give close attention to the needs of the agricultural industry with increasing emphasis on the business aspects of farming...My Government shares fully the concerns of the People of Ontario in respect to the protection and enhancement of our natural environment...A proposal to eliminate various unsightly conditions in our environment will be placed before you."

-- The airport alone will effectively destroy thirty square miles of Ontario's, of Canada's best agricultural land. A study by the Department of Agriculture, reported by Mr. Ken Fallis, states that the land in the airport site rates Class I under the

-- The affected noise area as depicted by the Department of Transport is inaccurate. The Department assesses high noise level areas on data tabulated solely from the number of complaints received. The National Academy of Sciences employs a more realistic technique, based on scientific measurement of several parameters, which predicts a more accurate and much larger high noise level area.

-- Land on the perimeter of the airport site will not be expropriated but, being caught in the midst of the high noise level area, becomes worthless. People will no longer be able to live on their property and neither will they be able to sell.

-- Where does the government plan to relocate the experienced farmers so that they may continue their way of life, providing food for the Canadian consumer?

-- The proposed city of Cedarwood, together with the urban development in the Markham area, would create a population of one half million just east of the present metro Toronto boundary. Would this population be able to achieve a separate identity being so close to Toronto? Canada does not need a Boston to New York type of population corridor, and the people of York and Ontario Counties do not wish to become part of one.

The present generation is facing a problem that no previous generation has yet had to face. Our resources are limited; the ecology of southern Ontario is at stake.

We would do well to learn from the mistakes in urban planning which have been made by our neighbour to the south. The large American metropoli, Chicago, Los Angeles and New York, each have a population of over five million and each has tremendous social problems to match. Canadians have a separate identity, and along with this identity is the pride in knowing that being the biggest is not necessarily the best. Toronto should not be allowed to expand to twice its present size -- and Canada does not need two of the three largest airports in the world. Southern Ontario should be kept green.

Headquarters for the "People or Planes" committee is located at Melody Farm. On the barn is a bell. Local historians claim that this bell was rung to announce the rebellion of 1837. The people of Pickering, and indeed of southern Ontario, are undoubtedly faced with the biggest fight since that time.

Independent Canada needs all-Canadian unions by Ed Finn (research director, Canadian Brotherhood of Railway, Transport and General Workers)

Should Canada have its own independent labor movement? Is it possible? Most Canadian union nationalists would answer "yes" to both questions.

But the labor continentalists—the leaders of the Canadian Labor Congress (CLC) and its American union affiliates—would just as resoundingly disagree.

The debate over Canadian union autonomy is thus a reflection in miniature of the broader debate now raging over Canada's uncertain future as an independent nation.

One's point of view depends on whether one is a nationalist or an apologist for the American takeover.

A recently published CLC pamphlet extolling the alleged benefits of international unionism claims that; (a) most internationals spend more in servicing their Canadian members than they receive from them in dues; (b) nearly all internationals "have separate bank accounts in Canada:" and (c) the greater numerical strength of the internationals permits more financial support for Canadians than would be possible with a purely national membership.

These are three of the stock arguments put forward by American union defenders. Another favorite pitch is that international unions are now essential to counteract the power of multi-national corporations.

These claims are all highly questionable.

If the American unions collectively pump more money into Canada than they take out, they should be able to prove it. They can't.

The latest report of the Corporations and Labor Unions Returns Act (CALURA) shows the internationals collected $41,377,000 in Canadian dues in 1969, while funnelling back $31,514,000 in strike pay, Canadian officers' salaries, and pension benefits.

Admittedly, as the report itself declares, this financial data is incomplete, since the act does not compel disclosure of the costs of any additional services rendered in Canada.

But what would these costs be, other than some educational activities and a few Canadian union journals? They might all add up to a few more million dollars, at most.

It is significant that, when CALURA officials invited the American union headquarters to submit their total expenditures in Canada for inclusion in the annual reports, all but a few declined to do so.

The fact that most internationals bank and invest funds in Canada is irrelevant. This money might as well be in Swiss banks for all the control the Canadian branches have over it.

With few exceptions, these funds are administered from the unions' American head offices. If the top Canadian officers require cash for any purpose other than their routine expenses, they have to go to their international secretary-treasurers.

Some Canadian branches can claim, correctly, to have received more in strike aid from their U.S. parent than they have paid into its strike fund. In the aggregate, however, as the CALURA statistics indicate, the American unions are now taking considerably more out of this country than they are putting back.

If the more than $40 million collected annually from Canadian workers were retained in Canada, it would finance the operation of a strictly national labor movement.

It would have to be accompanied, of course, by a rationalization of the structure of Canadian labor. The dependence of so many small Canadian appendages of internationals on their parent unions is artificially maintained.

Forty American unions have fewer than 5,000 Canadian members whose locals, if cut loose, would be unable to survive as separate units.

But, freed to merge with other unions in the same or similar industries, they could launch the remoulding of Canadian labor into 35 or 40 big unions, all of which would be self-sustaining.

Unfortunately, as matters now stand, they cannot merge with one another, or with national unions, unless their parent unions give consent. A few have done so, but the majority insists that no mergers take place in Canada unless preceded by mergers of the parent U.S. unions.

The argument that international union "solidarity" is needed to bargain effectively with multi-national business firms is the new gospel of the continentalists.

No doubt a harmonious, close-working relationship between unions representing employees of such corporations in several countries would be desirable. But this co-operation does not have to take the form of organic unity.

The same results could be obtained through co-ordination and mutual aid between autonomous unions in each country.

The danger of having the same unions represent workers in two adjacent countries, when one is only one-tenth as populous as the other, is that the interests of the two nations and their union members may not always coincide.

When they conflict, the international unions will invariably adopt policies favoring the country where most of their members reside.

This has been evident in the American unions' recent swing toward economic protectionism. They supported President Richard Nixon's import surtax, despite its job-destroying effects of their Canadian members, and are among the chief sponsors of the Hartke-Burke bill designed to impose restrictions on Canadian exports to the U.S.

This is a graphic example of how organic union ties between two nations can be detrimental to the junior partner.

Gunnar Myrdal, the famous Swedish social scientist, was asked recently by Maclean's editor Peter Newman what Canada should do to escape an American takeover.

He promptly replied that the first thing Canada should do is nationalize all the American unions.

No Canadian government is likely to do that, any more than it would nationalize the branch plants of U.S. companies.

The conversion of our labor movement to fully autonomous status must therefore be a gradual internal process, initiated by Canadian unionists. It can move no faster than the overall fight for Canadian independence.

If the broader struggle fails—if Canadians generally opt for economic integration with the U.S.—then the American grip on Canadian labor will never be loosened.

In a fully continentalist environment, international unionism would make sense.

But if Canadians choose to resist the American engulfment, a self-governing labor movement will have to be one of our top priorities.

Horse and Wagon Puppet Theatre

by Rachael Edwards

Queen's students will have another chance to see one of the unique plays performed by the Horse and Wagon Puppet Theatre this weekend. The group will be performing the play "Fire" on Friday, March 24 at 7 p.m. and 9 p.m. and on Saturday, March 25 at 8:30 p.m. in Grant Hall.

The Horse and Wagon Puppet Theatre is known to many students from their performances of two short plays, "The Kings' Story", and "A Man Said Goodbye to His Mother", at Festival '72 in February.

The play "Fire" was written and first produced by Peter Schumann of the Bread and Puppet Theatre in Vermont, and many of the masks used in the Horse and Wagon Theatre's performance were designed and made by him for "Fire".

The Horse and Wagon Puppet Theatre was started by a few members of the Bread and Puppet Theatre who used the techniques learned there to start their own group. Some of the plays they perform were written by Peter Schumann, and others have been written by members of the Horse and Wagon Puppet Theatre.

The group has travelled around Europe and parts of the United States performing their plays, and has been performing in Kingston for a few months.

The type of entertainment that the Horse and Wagon Puppet Theatre offers is very different from the majority of plays performed in Kingston. Actors and puppets of various sizes appear on stage together to act out the stories.

Since all are dressed in simple costumes and masks, the emphasis of the plays is placed on the actions of the players rather than on elaborate costumes and sets.

The costumes and scenery for "Fire" were all designed and made by members of the Horse and Puppet Theatre and they are striking in their simplicity.

As well as the performances in Grant Hall this weekend The Horse and Wagon Puppet Theatre will be appearing at the Domino theatre in Kingston on Easter weekend.

This group presents a very unique and interesting type of entertainment that is definitely worth going to see.

Pianist at MacArthur

The Kingston Music Club is pleased to announce a recital by Miss Nancy Basmajian, pianist, on Wednesday, March 29th at 8:30 p.m. in Duncan MacArthur Hall. This concert is open to the public and there will be no admission charge.

"The English Suite, No. 3" by J. S. Bach will open the evening program to be followed by Beethoven's "Sonata, Op. 90" and the "Scherzo", No. 4, Op. 54" by Chopin. In a more contemporary vein, Miss Basmajian will perform Claude Debusey's "Estampes" and a "Sonatina" by Bartok.

Nancy Basmajian is at present a student at Texas Christian University where she is studying toward a degree in music under the supervision of Madame Lili Kraus. Previous to this time she had resided in Kingston where she attended Lord Strathcona School and L.C.V.I. Musical training was begun here with Mrs. Pierre Gobin as Nancy Basmajian took piano lessons from her from 1959 to 1969. Over this period of time she performed many times with both the Junior and Senior Music Clubs. Awards, scholarships, and trophies were won at the Ottawa Music Festival and the Royal Conservatory of Music, Toronto. At age 16 Miss Basmajian received her A.R.T.C. obtaining the highest mark in Eastern Ontario. On this occasion she was awarded the Kingston Music Club's Gold Medal. In the Spring of 1969 Nancy Basmajian was awarded Texas Christian University's top scholarship for a student in the Fine Arts - the Norton Scholarship of $5,000.00 - awarded for academic excellence and outstanding artistic talent.

Double Bass in Kingston

The first full recital of double bass music in Kingston will be presented by the Music Department on Sunday, 26 March, 1972 at 8:30 p.m. in Ellis Hall Auditorium. The performance will be given by Mr. David R. Keane, Principal double bass of the Kingston Symphony Orchestra and Lecturer in the Music Department at Queen's. Dr. F.R.C. Clarke will accompany Mr. Keane on the piano in works from the 17th and 19th centuries. Also included in the program is the Prokofiev Quintet, Opus 39: members of the Quintet are Linda Inglis, oboe; Professor David C.M. Smith, clarinet; Mrs. Denise Williams, violin; Dr. Charles Small, viola; and Mr. David R. Keane, double bass.

..Study No. 4 for Double Bass and Tape Recorder will receive its premiere performance in this program. This work, by Mr. David R. Keane, utilises a tape recording of electronically produced and modified sounds which accompanies the sounds produced live on the double bass. This composition, the fourth in a series begun in 1963, was produced in the Music Department's Electronic Music Studio.

Mr. Keane has written instrumental and vocal music as well as electronic which has been performed both in Canada and the United States. He has also created scores for television and film. Several works have been performed in Kingston, the most recent of which was Psalm No. 144 for chorus and Woodwind Quintet performed last November Queen's Choral Ensemble.

Mr. Keane's instrument was built for him in East Germany by E.M. Pollmann in 1970. Pullmann is internationally recognised as one of the world's finest craftsmen of double basses. This instrument is a good deal larger than most basses and has five strings rather than the usual four. The fifth string makes possible additional notes below the normal range of the double bass.

Mr. Keane came to Kingston in the fall of 1970 to establish an Electronic Music Studio at Queen's and to teach composition and stringed instruments. He was formerly double bassist with the Vancouver Symphony Orchestra. He has studied with Theon McClure of the Cleveland Orchestra and Robert Meyer, Principal Double bass of the Vancouver Symphony Orchestra and the Vancouver C..B.C. Chamber Orchestra.

The public are cordially invited to attend the Recital in Ellis Hall on Sunday March 26th for which there is no admission charge.

Letters:

No tax exemption for parking garage

The City Council of Kingston will soon consider a request from the governing body of the Health Sciences Complex (Queen's University and Affiliated Hospitals' Council or QUAFHOP) to exempt from municipal property taxes the parking garage that is going to be built under the lower campus field.

QUAFHOP officials have claimed that, if taxes are levied against the garage, which is required to service the complex, the whole complex could be in jeopardy. The Finance Committee, which first heard the request on March 8, has asked QUAFHOP for more information, and then re-affirmed its earlier position that taxes should be levied against all properties under control of QUAFHOP.

However, it is city council that will eventually resolve the issue, and Mayor Valerie Swain has indicated that he may side with QUAFHOP on this issue.

We feel that the aldermen would best serve the people of Kingston if they followed the lead of the committee, rather than the Mayor.

Kingston is already heavily burdened with a high proportion of tax-exempt property, amounting to 34.5 per cent of total assessment. Although the provincial government gives a grant in lieu of taxes on Queen's University and St. Lawrence College every year (last year, the grant was $313,845), this amount represents only a small proportion of the municipal revenue which the city foregoes because the university (and the college) do not pay property taxes.

What this means is that Kingston residents have to pay the difference between the amount of the provincial grant-in-lieu and the actual assessed taxation on provincial government property. It has been estimated that every property owner in Kingston is supporting the university to the tune of about 25 percent of his or her municipal taxes. The presence of the university and other government property greatly increases the costs of both home ownership and of renting, since landlords usually include property taxes in the amount they charge for rent.

It is bad enough that residents should have to pay so much extra because of the tax-exempt property already in existence; there is little justification for making this amount any greater by increasing the amount of tax-exempt property.

Moreover, it is difficult to believe that the additional cost which property tax would add to the Health Sciences Complex budget would put the whole project in jeopardy as QUAFHOP officials claim. The complex itself will cost about $106 million. The parking garage will cost about $2 million. The amount of minicipal taxation which would be assessed on the garage would obviously be some much smaller figure again. (The amount would be about 3 to 6 percent of the market value of the property.) It is hard to believe that QUAFHOP has been able to make financial arrangements to pay for the complex and the garage, and yet would be sorely pressed to raise the amount needed to pay taxes.

It appears, in fact, that QUAFHOP may be using an implied threat to get the city to go along with them on what would certainly be a cost saving move. QUAFHOP officials know that the city officials are quite anxious to have the complex built in Kingston, and they may hope that they can force the city officials to approve their request because of the threat that, if the garage is not made tax exempt, the whole complex may be scuttled. This threat or claim, however, is of doubtful validity, both because of the small amount of money involved and because planning and work on the complex have by now gone far enough that it is very unlikely that either QUAFHOP or the provincial government would really consider halting it.

All of this hassle over tax exemptions, and all of the type of tax burden borne by the people of Kingston because of the large amount of tax exempt property, would be avoided, of course, if the provincial government would adopt the highly sensible idea of scrapping the whole system of property taxes, generating all municipal revenues through the income tax system instead. Property taxes are an extremely regressive method of raising money, since no account is taken of a person's ability to pay.

However, since the provincial government is not likely to adopt such a policy, at least not soon, the Kingston City Council should refuse the request of the university (for a change) and uphold the Finance Committee position that all QUAFHOP properties should be taxed.

T.A.K.

Dear Editors;

On behalf of all members of the organizing committee of T.A.K. (Telephone Aid Kingston), I would like to sincerely thank everyone that attended our meetings last weekend. We were pleased with the turnout and maintain our hopes of commencing service in September.

We would particularly like to thank our professional advisors, the resource people, George Reilly, Mary-Ellen and Steve, and Mary Myers. Thanks to the Queen's Journal and the Golden Word's staff for being so very co-operative. To the A.M.S. outer council, we owe our existence from their vote of confidence. Not to forget our faithful friends that plastered posters through-out the campus!

Understandably, there were those that would like to become involved in the project, but for various reasons, could not attend the workshop on Saturday. If you are interested, please write to TAK c-o the AMS office. Include your present and summer address and phone number. We will be in contact with you this summer and will get a list of the other telephone distress services in the country.

It is heartwarming to get proof that there are still real people around, people that do care.

Money stolen

Dear Editors;

This past Saturday (March 18) a group of us in residence rented the ice in the arena to play hockey for an hour. We locked all our valuables in the locker provided. After the game, we came back to the dressing room to find that the lock had been forced and that all our wallets had been emptied. The whole group of us lost $70. I lost $25. I don't know about anyone else, but a loss of $25 is a real kick in the teeth for me at any time of the year - let alone now.

A great deal of suspicion was cast upon a local midget or pee-wee hockey team and some individuals who accompanied the team, but nothing could be proven (four of the lads had left the arena and returned during the period in question). In any event, it was once again outsiders who were under suspicion.

Is it so impossible to have outsiders, especially the younger set, barred from the Phys. Ed. complex? or at least allowed in only under strict supervision on special occasions? Am I under a false impression when I believe that the staff and students and not local groups support the centre?

What our group paid on Saturday, and what others have had to pay on other cocasions, is quite a price - and pretty damn sickening at that.

Richard Munro

Monday night, March 27, at 8 pm in the Grand Theatre on Princess St., Flora MacDonald of the politics studies department will be seeking the federal nomination for the P.C.'S. Anyone who wishes to attend and vote can do so; all that is necessary is that a membership, costing $1, be purchased. They can be purchased at the meeting, if you are there early.

Student awards

The Toronto Union of Students recognizes the intrinsic value of post-secondary education for all people in Ontario. We believe that higher education serves the need of developing a political and social conscience in the population. We also perceive the growing necessity for the development of new creative and imaginative processes to fill the leisure time in a technologically advanced society.

For these reasons we reiterate our belief in universal accessibility and we condemn the proposed regressive changes in the Student Awards programme.

The Treasury Board of the Province of Ontario has suggested the following changes in the programme to be effective in 1972-73.

1. That there be a 0.5 million dollar cut in the Ontario Graduate Fellowship from 3.5 to 3 million dollars. (Allotment last year was 5 million.)
2. There will be an increase in the primary loan ceiling from $600 to an indeterminate level (probably $800).
3. There is no provision for an aid scheme to part-time students.
4. The maximum living allowance, dependent upon regional considerations will be $30-week. For those living in residences, the difference will be made up in loans (if above $30).

We believe these changes will conceivably lead to the following:

1. A decrease in the graduate students in Ontario. The government has committed itself to the Canadianization of our schools, and paradoxically, at the same time, is cutting back the source of future Canadian-oriented faculty. A decrease in the graduate students also will cut back the availability of teaching talent for undergraduate seminars. This would in turn be a major problem at smaller institutions where budgets depend on this less expensive teaching resource.
2. The increase in the loan ceiling creates a further barrier for members of the lower socio-economic classes considering going into a post-secondary institution. Universal accessibility to these people would be limited in this situation as an individual, considering entrance, would perceive a greater financial burden upon himself at graduation than the benefit he will receive. In general societal terms, this would interfere with the development of an educational and socially conscious populace.
3. A part-time student aid programme must be developed immediately. The lack of it is discriminatory against this increasing student population and interferes with the opportunities of accessibility of a large percentage of Ontario residents. These part-time people are in fact those who financially support post-secondary institutions.
4. There must be a rationalization of living expenses across the board that will include welfare, unemployment and student aid schemes. At present, students are in terms of aid forced into a poverty situation by the scheme. Somehow all forms of government aid must be equalized and brought above this level.

To further demonstrate our belief that these changes must be reversed, we wish to announce a mass meeting at Queen's Park on March 28th, 1972, at 1 P.M. This has been supported by the Ontario Federation of Students and is in conjunction with the teachers demonstration against education cutbacks.

CANADA

Premier William Davis and Bert Lawrence, Provincial Secretary for Resource Development, used Government aircraft to fly their families to Easter vacation spots this past week.

There was no indication, from aides close to both men, that expenses for the trips would be borne by anything other than departmental budgets.

In both instances, the cost of the trips would have been less had commercial airlines been used for transportation.

The two women Conservative members of the Ontario Legislature have joined women liberationists in demanding changes in law and procedure which would have women play an equal role with men in serving on juries. Of 180 persons summoned for jury duty at the University Ave. courthouse in February, only 13 were women.

The Jurors Act, an Ontario statute, gives women the option of refusing jury duty. Every woman who receives jury duty notice also receives a form she can sign and send back. It reads: "Take notice that I, (name of person) being a woman, hereby claim exemption from service as a juror for a period of one year from the date of this notice."

No excuse is necessary.

Women liberationists want women called on equal terms.

Now Margaret Scrivener, elected in Toronto St. David riding in last October's election, says the system discriminates against men economically and against women, in cases where women go on trial with no woman on the jury.

The University of Toronto's governing body, the senate, last night refused proposals for unlimited access for all students in the new $43 million John P. Robarts library.

Instead, the matter was referred back to the university's library council for a recommendation to the senate April 14.

OTTAWA — The Bank of Canada said yesterday it would encourage easier credit and lower interest rates in an effort to create employment and to encourage consumers to spend more.

PORT ALBERNI, B.C. — The cost to mop up an oil spill off Vancouver Island may run into the hundreds of thousands of dollars and probably will end up being paid for by the Canadian taxpayer, David Anderson (L, Esquimalt-Saanich) said Saturday.

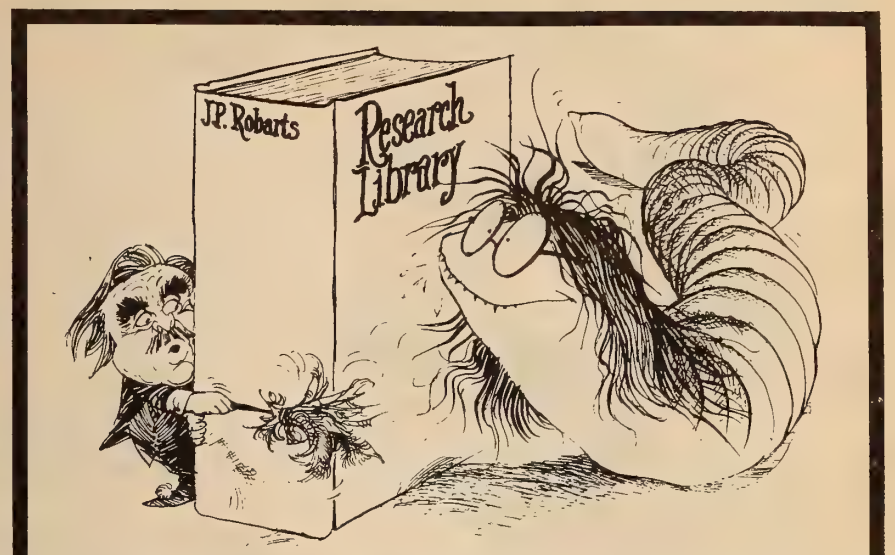
It is estimated that 37,500 gallons of bunker fuel has spilled from the fuel tanks of the striken Panamanian freighter Vanlene since she ran aground last Tuesday.

OTTAWA — The Canadian Chamber of Commerce Monday called on the federal government to give corporations and individuals more tax cuts.

At the same time, the chamber urged, Ottawa should be exerting pressure to hold down wage increases for workers.

VANCOUVER — Government make-work projects such as the Local Initiatives Program and Opportunities for Youth may be here to stay, Health Minister John Munro said Saturday.

He told a group of student Liberals at the University of British Columbia that, even with the Canadian economy showing signs of recovery unemployment rates remain at the 6 to 7 per cent level.



"So the government must put these people to work to restore their sense of worth and dignity," he said.

Munro criticized the Canadian news media for undermining the basic concepts of the programs by "zeroing in on the few controversial ones which receive the approval of the government."

OTTAWA — Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau reiterated Sunday he personally is in no hurry for an early election.

"I am in no hurry".

"Shoo there."

WASHINGTON — The Senate yesterday refused to exempt women from the draft in working on a proposed constitutional amendment guaranteeing women equal rights.

The vote was 73 to 18 in the first Senate floor action on the constitutional amendment already passed by the House.

Senator Birch Bayh, (D, Ind. manager of the amendment, did not deny women might see combat duty.

However, Senator Bayh said, women would be eligible for all service benefits and be assigned as commanders see fit, just as men.

Mothers could be exempted by federal law if the amendment passed, Senator Bayh continued. And in any event the number of women drafted and assigned to combat duty, if the draft continued, "would be significantly less than one per cent," he said.

UNITED NATIONS — A United Nations (UN) report suggests that abortion is perhaps the most common form of birth control in the world.

The 162-page report, prepared by the UN population division and issued Sunday, says liberal grounds for legal abortions have been enacted in many nations "in recognition ... of the health risks that women incur" in obtaining criminal abortions.

Death rates among women undergoing legal abortions compare favorably with mortality rates from all complications of pregnancy, childbirth and its aftermath.

LONDON — Alarmed by continuing business stagnation, soaring prices and record unemployment, Prime Minister Edward Heath has ordered taxes slashed in a desperate bid to drive British industry out of recession.

NICOSIA — The President of Cyprus, Archbishop Makarios, made public Monday a negative reply to a demand by three bishops of the Cypriot Greek Orthodox Church that he resign as chief of state. The archbishop said, however, that if the prelates persisted in their demand. "I would regard it as my obligation to accept it."

Two of the three bishops, interviewed after the President's announcement, said that they would demand his resignation by Thursday or Friday and would insist that he step down without delay.

WASHINGTON — A study prepared for the U.S. Congress reports that the income gap between the poorest and richest has nearly doubled in the last 20 years. And it concludes that the poor "are asked to pay the price necessary to stop inflation for the rest of society."

The study says that at the moment there is a head-to-head confrontation between competing drives to suppress inflation and to more nearly equalize income.

The study, prepared by economics professors Lester Thurow and Robert E. G. Lucas of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology concludes that only a substantially increased demand for labor can have any significant effect on any income-redistribution plans.

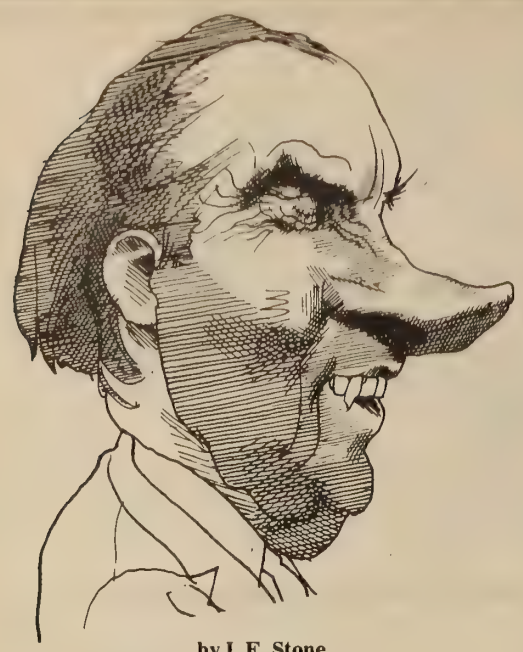
WASHINGTON — Columnist Jack Anderson says he has obtained secret documents that show that the International Telephone and Telegraph Corp. plotted with the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency to Chile to prevent the 1970 election of Marxist President Salvador Allende.

"These documents," Anderson said in his column today, "portray ITT as a virtual corporate nation in itself with vast international holdings, access to Washington's highest officials, its own intelligence apparatus and even its own classification system."

NEW DELHI — Prime Minister Indira Gandhi, bearing a new friendship treaty with Bangladesh, returned from Dacca Sunday and said peace talks with Pakistan will begin "some time or other."

Mrs. Gandhi declined to give a date for the negotiations saying only there are "prospects" of them. In any case, she added, India would like preliminary discussions before any summit meeting between her and President Zulfikar Ali Bhutto of Pakistan.

BELFAST — A powerful bomb exploded in a parked car Monday, killing at least four people and leaving many more bleeding and unconscious on a busy Belfast street.



The explosion came after a weekend of demonstrations by rival Roman Catholic and Protestant groups that were the largest in Northern Ireland's 52-year history.

At least 30,000 Catholics paraded yesterday in Belfast, where 70,000 Protestants had rallied on Saturday in a "do-or-die" demonstration and cheered a call to "liquidate the enemy" unless violence ends in the British province.

BELFAST — Police said Tuesday the six persons killed in Northern Ireland's second worst bombing incident were deliberately lured to their deaths.

The blast injured 147 persons.

Nixon's visit to China:

by I. F. Stone

Like Vietnamization, the new China policy had its covert beginnings in the Johnson Administration. A cable from Johnson to Ambassador Lodge in Saigon, which turned up in the Pentagon Papers, is evidence of an earlier recognition in Washington that the Sino-Soviet split might offer useful leverage in power politics. It was dated March 20, 1964 and spelled out the reasons for delaying any open attack on North Vietnam. Johnson added as "an additional international reason for avoiding immediate overt action" that "we expect a showdown between the Chinese and Soviet Communist parties soon and action against the North will be more practicable after than before a showdown."
(Note: All references to "we" or "our" refer to the Americans.)

There are bigger stakes than the Vietnam war involved in the new entente with China. Another of Washington's neo-Maoists, Secretary of Defense Laird, touched ever so lightly upon them in the new "defense posture" statement to the Senate Armed Services Committee. "As we evaluate the strength of Soviet and Chinese weapons development," Laird said, "we must also take into account in a realistic net assessment the fact that they face some considerable constraints." The first- and the foremost- he cited was that "the Soviet Union and Mainland China must deploy hundreds of thousands of troops in their Far Eastern border."

Tito was an ideological diversion, the first break in the once monlithic world communist movement, but an altogether minor shift in the East-West military balance. But Mao's defection is a major change in the power equation. It means that the USSR must deploy and plan its forces so as to take into account the real possibility of war on two fronts that are widely separated and poorly connected.

Mao is a Pentagon bonanza. The dimensions begin to appear in the fiscal 1973 posture statement delivered to the Senate Armed Service Committee by Admiral Moorer, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, right after Laird's appearance. Admiral Moorer thought it would be "useful to note the current deployment of all Soviet divisions and tactical air units." He told the committee, "Of a total of 160 Soviet divisions and about 4,300 tactical aircraft, about one quarter are oriented toward China." That means forty divisions and more than 1,000 tactical air units which would be available against the West if there were no Sino-Soviet split.

No doubt these stray and sparse glimpses of the new military realities are being widened behind the closed doors of the Armed Services Committee. No doubt this delicate subject is figuring in the cross-examinations to which Laird, Moorer and the other Pentagon witnesses are now being subjected in the annual military authorization and budget hearings before the armed services and appropriations committees of both houses of Congress. Perhaps some further revelations will survive the censor's blue pencil.

These annual posture statements cover not only the next fiscal year's military and military assistance budgets but the Pentagon's projections for the next five years, its annual - excuse the expression - Five Year Plan, the Pentagon's Piatiletka. Nowhere in the prepared statements will one find a word about what may prove to be the most important new factor in the next five years: The extent to which China diverts Soviet military resources away from Western Europe could be increased by assistance to Chinese industrial development. The equipment of China's armies and the speed of its nuclear development would be strongly influenced should one ultimate outcome of the Nixon visit be American aid in the shape of credits and know-how. This is the common Sino-American interest in that agreement the Nixon-Chou communique records, "to facilitate the progressive development of trade between their two countries." Here credits must have been discussed because no real expansion of trade with China is possible without them, and here surely is the place to suspect some further and wider understanding, as yet undisclosed. Here is the carrot for Peking, the stick over Moscow.

China's slim industrial base reduces her weight in the military balance. This is particularly true in the case of nuclear development. There is a wide range of non-nuclear industrial and electronic machinery and technology that would make a crucial difference in the tempo of her nuclear program. Already, as Laird notes, "the Chinese missile threat encompasses most cities and other area-type targets in South and East Asia and a substantial part of the USSR." the Pentagon believes, he continued, "that the Chinese could begin deployment of an ICBM with a range of 3,000 nautical miles or more, capable of striking all or most of the USSR, by 1975." But 3,000 nautical miles would only be a third of the way across the Pacific.

All this opens the widest - indeed the giddiest - perspective yet for the Nixon Doctrine. This is a new name for the old idea he has taken from John Foster Dulles of providing the equipment so that Asians can fight Asians for us, at fire-sale prices and coolie wages. What if it could be applied not to the relatively few Viets, Thais, Khmers, and Meos, but to China's teeming millions, fearful of a Soviet first strike and eager for weaponry to defend themselves?

This is the card that old poker-player Nixon is taking with him to Russia in a few weeks to the biggest poker game of his career. This is the card with which he hopes in the Kremlin to conclude the first phase of the SALT talks and perhaps other matters as well. Nixon can redress the world military balance by threatening to rearm China if the Soviets do not come to terms. The Pax Americana may be in the process of acquiring the world's most populous state as client. This is the innermost meaning of the Peking visit and the coming Kremlin talks.

Much becomes clearer if one views the new defense budget presentations and the SALT talks in this perspective. The essence of the negotiations is to force the Soviets to accept over-all quantitative as well as qualitative inferiority as the price of an agreement. This is what happened with the Test Ban Treaty and this has been the US objective from the first in SALT.

The Soviet Union is now ahead in numbers of land-based missiles and may soon equal the US in sea-based missiles as well. We would like an agreement limiting the numbers of both. But we do not propose and have never proposed any limits on the quality of missiles, where we are ahead.

The interrelation of the quantitative and the qualitative is complicated because our lead in quality has become a lead in quantity of a new kind. In developing MIRV, our qualitative lead has paid off in a major expansion in the number of our nuclear warheads, or "force loadings" as the Pentagon has begun to call them, with its genius for coining terms that obscure and confuse. It is the number of warheads on the missiles and not the number of missiles (or "launchers" in Pentagon lingo) that are now the major index of nuclear striking power. The more warheads, the more targets we can hit, and the more warheads the easier it becomes to "saturate" any antiballistic missile defenses the other side may put up.

The pattern of arms negotiations for more than a century has been to try to limit the weapons in which one's potential enemy is ahead, and avoid limitations on those in which one has an advantage. So in all our talk of limiting the numbers on the other side we have never proposed limiting the number of warheads, much less foregoing MIRV altogether.

The kind of fears an imbalance of warheads naturally stirs may be seen from a passage in Laird's new posture statement. "Of greatest concern to the survivability of US ICBM forces," he says on page 41, "would be improvements in the accuracy of Soviet missiles and the development of a MIRV capability." But it is the US that is already deploying the MIRV and it is our missiles that are ahead in accuracy. The same sentence revised would express Soviet fears.

Though the Pentagon is doing its best in current propaganda and in testimony on the new arms budget to make it look as if we are falling dangerously behind, the reverse is true. The gap in missile warheads is widening rapidly in our favor to the point where the Soviets must fear that we are trying for some kind of counter force, pre-emptive or first strike capacity. Here are the figures for the past eighteen months taken from this year's and last year's posture statements:

Total "Force Loadings"

	USSR	US	Gap
12-30-70	1,800	4,000	2,200
11-1-71	2,100	4,700	2,600
mid 1972	2,500	5,700	3,200

The imbalance will grow sharply - the gap wider - in the next few years. The air force has its own MIRV - the SRAM, or Short Range Attack Missile. In his testimony to the Senate Armed Services Committee on February 23, Air Force Secretary Seamans described it as "a small high velocity missile capable of low trajectory" to "get under" Soviet air defenses and therefore "difficult to defend against". The test program was completed last July, he told the committee, and "we expect to have a SRAM capability on some of our B-52s and FB-111s this calendar year".

These missiles, like MIRV, are "separately targetable." According to the last Military Balance1971-72 published by the International Institute for Strategic Studies in London, the B-52 and the FB-111 can carry twenty-four SRAMs and the new B-1 is being built to carry thirty-two SRAMs. Since the Institute credits the US with 430 B-52s and FB-111s in service,, SRAM would enable them to hit 10,320 separate targets with these air-borne warheads.

By 1975, according to the Institute, more than 500 of our Minutemen will be outfitted with three separately targetable warheads each adding 1,000 MIRVs to that force. In the meantime the conversion of thirty-one Polaris submarines to Poseidon, according to the Institute, will "raise the total number of warheads deliverable by the American SLBM force from about 1,500 (capable of attacking 656 separate targets) to over 5,400 (capable of attacking some 5,000 separate targets)." By mid-1975, the total of US separate warheads and "force loadings" would then look something like this:

Mid-1972	5,700
New Minutemen MIRVs	1,000
New Poseidon MIRVs	3,900
New SRAMs	9,890
Force Loadings	20,490

If our purpose is only to have a second strike capacity to deter Soviet attack, what will we do with this lunatic overkill? There are about 180 cities in the entire Soviet Union with populations of more than 100,000. One Poseidon-equipped submarine could hit 160 of them since each submarine carries sixteen launchers and each Poseidon launcher carries from ten to fourteen warheads. What will we do with 20,000 separate warheads? If the situation were reversed, we would suspect the Soviets of building up toward a first strike threat.

Yet Nixon is going to Moscow against the backdrop of a Pentagon propaganda campaign which, though a little muted compared with last year, still hints that the Soviets are building up for a first strike against us. He is going to Moscow with a new defnse budget that adds $6.3 billion to arms authorizations. This $6.3 billion is only the down payment on new weaponry which will eventually cost $50 billion or more. The new budget will speed up work on two new monsters - the B-1 bomber, which will carry thirty-two SRAMs, and the new ULMS, Underwater Long Range Missile Submarine. ULMS (according to the latest edition of Jane's Fighting Ships, 1971-72) will have between twenty and twenty-four launchers each as against sixteen of Polaris-Poseidon, and probably a good many more MIRVs per launcher.

Is this a prepartion for a generation of peace or a generation of ever more costly and lunatic arms race? From a shortsighted political point of view it makes sense in an election year. It promises expanded jobs for skilled labor; it will please George Meany and the Machinists; it should bring grateful campaign contributions from the armament makers.

But from the other side's point of view, especially after the emerging entente with China, it must look like another effort "from a position of strength" to put the screws on the Soviet Union. From the American public's point of view, it spells mounting arms budgets, and from humanity's, an intensified nuclear arms race which can lead only to a dead end.

Counselling service is renewed

The Student Counselling Service, which began operations on an experimental basis on February 1 last year, is now established as a permanent service after the Senate heard a report on the success of the project during the past year, at its meeting last Thursday.

The Service, located at 165 University, involved psychological counselling for students and staff members at Queen's, including individual counselling to help with personal and social problems, testing to determine educational and vocational abilities, interests, personality and study habits, self-help courses, including programmed materials to improve study skill, reading-vocabulary-comprehension rates and relaxation techniques. All these services are provided free.

For the past year, the service operated on a budget of $10,000, under the direction of Dr. David Clarke of the psychology department. Up until January 24, some 260 Queen's students and staff had used the service; since then, another 80 have used it. Most have made three to five visits.

The Senate Committee on Student Affairs, in recommending that the Service be continued on a permanent basis, noted that it found that the Service offered "a distinct and valuable service to the university community."

The Senate also approved the establishment of a committee to determine a feasible operational format for the Student Counselling Service.

Food strike is proposed for Leonard

A group of Leonard Field students hope to organize a "food strike" at tonight's dinner in Leonard Hall cafeteria.

The students, who are residents of fourth-floor Donald Gordon House, have announced "Operation Beaver Boycott" in an attempt to have the residence catering contract taken away from Beaver Foods, Ltd., which has held it for five years.

A statement they issued on Thursday said, "The success of this operation depends on the cooperation and support of all those who feel that food service in residence could be drastically improved in quality."

A spokesman who phoned The Journal on Friday, but would not give his name, said the students had tried unsuccessfully to press their complaints through Inter-Residence Council food representatives.

"I've tried going through them -- one item in particular, that the coffee in the cafeteria is terrible -- and not action has been taken."

He said they had not talked to representatives of Beaver either.

"One of the major areas of discontent is the lack of meal plan options," the statement said. Inter-Residence Council president Steve Brereton was elected two weeks ago on a platform which included investigating such alternative ways of buying meals. Brereton told The Journal Sunday that such investigations were going on.

He added that he thought the food strike would be unsuccessful: "I personally don't feel they will get much support." Apathy of residents is the reason for this, he said.

Brereton admitted that "I can see some justification in some of things they have to say. But there are existing communication channels that I would hope would be sufficient."

Food representatives and residence administrators have been studying the meal plans in use at McMaster University and the University of Guelph, he said.

Meanwhile, Brereton said, if a large number of residents wanted to support the strike, "I might do the same."

Computer applications discussed

By Mary O'Rourke

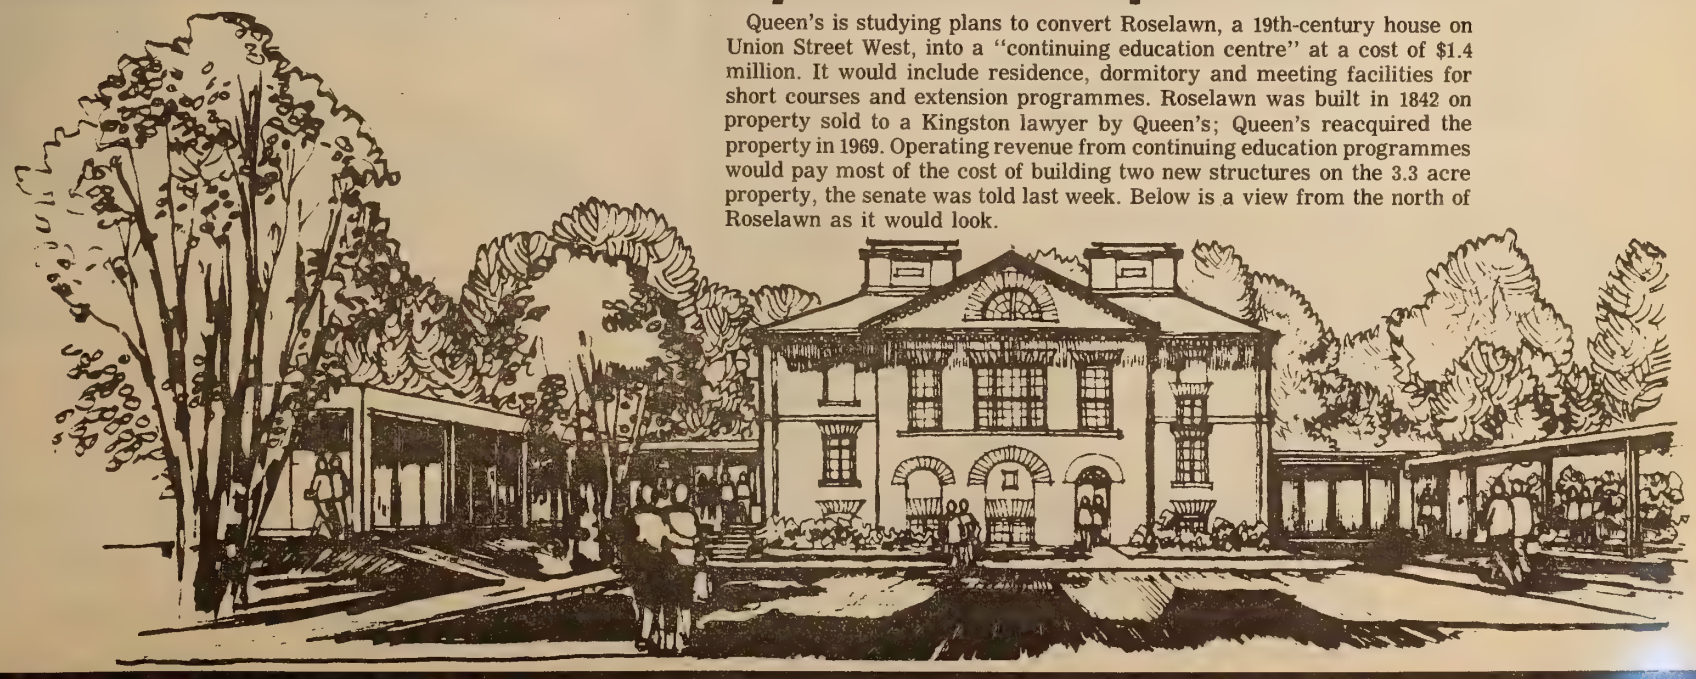
The history of the computer in the humanities has not been entirely altruistic, according to Dr. M. Levison who spoke on this subject last Wednesday afternoon. Nonetheless, the application of the computer to problems in language and literature is as old as the computer itself, dating back to the early fifties.

In fact, it was just such applications which contributed to the computer's development, for the very reason Levison called un-altruistic. He reported that one group of computer pioneers, who were primarily interested in crystallography, managed to get a substantial grant on the grounds that the computer would perform sophisticated translation operations. In an aside, Levison mentioned that during the fifties the U.S. devoted a considerable amount of money to machine translation, particularly of Russian!

The London computer men with whom Levison was formerly associated, however, turned to literary rather than language problems. Their work concerned them with making concordances to works of literature. Such exhaustive indexing is ideally suited to the computer, since it has a counting capacity far beyond human capacity. To prove the point, Levison said that Crudden, who made the first concordance to the Bible, went quite mad!

Literary work also includes dealing with the problem of authorship, a fairly common problem. Formerly, such matters were decided on stylistic grounds, and were thus rather subjective. The epistles of St. Paul are one example of works which were suspected to be not entirely original. When an 18th-century scholar suggested that St. Paul was not perhaps responsible for all the epistles, due to the less stringent standards of authorship in the fourth century, he was quickly squelched. Yet when the epistles were subjected to analysis by computer, the bogus ones closely concurred with those suspected by the older scholar.

The exact method of computer analysis rests on word usage counts and sentence lengths, establishing pattern frequencies for different authors. When the authorship of "The Life of Christ" was deemed possibly that of Gerson or a Kempis, its graphed pattern compared closely to that of a Kempis' other works, and was thus assumed to be his. Other authorship explorations have been conducted in Greek literature, based on several parameters, and stressing common words so that highly imitable, individual stylistic features cannot bias the research.



All these scientific methods, however, did not stem the wrath of the Bishop of Woolwich on the subject of St. Paul, who appeared on a televised debate with Levison about the epistles.

The other use of computers of which Levison spoke was in geography, hence the "Kon-Tiki" of the title -- the only relation to St. Paul being that Levison had

House as old as Queen's may become campus convention centre

Queen's is studying plans to convert Roselawn, a 19th-century house on Union Street West, into a "continuing education centre" at a cost of $1.4 million. It would include residence, dormitory and meeting facilities for short courses and extension programmes. Roselawn was built in 1842 on property sold to a Kingston lawyer by Queen's; Queen's reacquired the property in 1969. Operating revenue from continuing education programmes would pay most of the cost of building two new structures on the 3.3 acre property, the senate was told last week. Below is a view from the north of Roselawn as it would look.

SACU tests still in doubt, Senate told last week

Debate on whether to continue to employ the SACU (Service for Admission to Colleges and Universities) aptitude tests as part of a person's record for admission to all Ontario universities continues within the Council of Ontario Universities, it was reported to the Queen's Senate last Thursday.

The cost of these tests, about $500,000 per year, used to be borne by the government of Ontario, but John White, former Minister of University Affairs, informed the universities last year that this support would be discontinued. The COU must now decide whether the tests are worth the cost, which would have to be raised in some form by the COU, perhaps by charging a fee to those who take them.

The major uncertainty relates to the validity of the tests. As a predictor of university success, they used to be less reliable than Grade 13 marks, and because of this, the Council on Admissions of the COU was, until recently, opposed to continuing with the tests.

However, the Council on Admissions has now changed its mind, largely because it feels that changes in Grade 13 over the past few years (particularly since the abandonment of Grade 13 province-wide departmental exams) have made Grade 13 performance a less and less reliable measurement.

The Council on Admissions now favours continued support for the tests as a "last line of defense" if Grade 13 becomes useless as a predictor. Marking schemes such as pass-fail grading make this a strong possibility.

The other question which the COU must confront is the question of who will pay the cost of the tests, the COU out of its own funds or the students taking the tests. At present, Ontario and Quebec are the only provinces which do not charge students to take the tests, and the COU is in favour of passing the costs on to the students. The cost would be about $10 or $11 per student.

It was noted at the Senate meeting that Queen's, in its admission regulations, now requires that students take the SACU tests, and the Senate indicated that it favoured continuing this practice.

Queen's hams contact 600

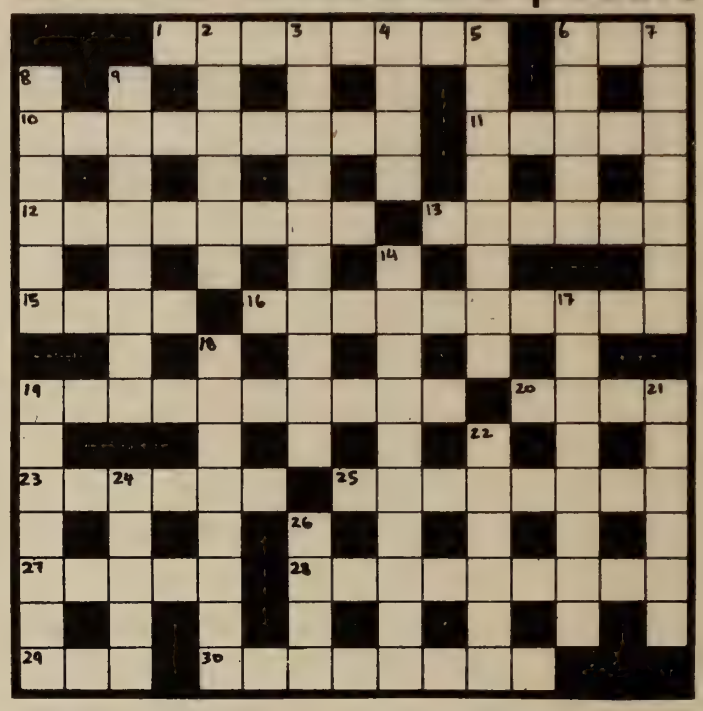
Six members of the Queen's amateur radio and electronics club contacted more than 600 hams in 98 countries during a two-weekend amateur radio contest held recently.

The contest is an annual event organized by the American Radio Relay League, in which radio clubs around the world compete for contacts at home and abroad.

Engineering drawing professor R. Hart, a member of the club, said six QUAREC participants worked for 96 hours, from midnight Friday to midnight Sunday on two weekends, making contacts from Queen's station VE3VX in Clark Hall.

QUAREC keeps year-round contact with hams in many countries, Hart said.

Results of the contest will be announced in August.



Committee members wanted

Several senate committees still need student members.

Two students are needed for the committee on appointment, promotion, tenure and leave; two for the committee on scholarships and student aid; and four for the committee on fine arts and public lectures.

Information is available at the senate office in Richardson Hall.

Human problems courses to committee

An investigation into the possibility of creating inter-disciplinary courses which will deal with major human problems will be carried out by the Senate Committee on Academic Development.

This investigation comes as a result of a motion, passed by the Senate at its March meeting last Thursday, which read as follows: "Moved that the Senate ask the Senate Committee on Academic Development to investigate a continuing academic programme or programmes to deal with major human problems such as conflict, population, resources, poverty, etc., and their inter-relationships, suitable for students in all faculties, disciplines and years equally, to acquaint students with overriding issues of human existence that transcent disciplinary boundaries. The committee should consider two such programmes, not to the exclusion of each other: a) a programme of credit courses, b) a programme of non-credit courses of short duration, and any other programme it sees fit, bearing in mind how such programmes might interrelate. The Committee should consider, in general terms, how such a programme or programmes might be administered."

The motion, introduced by Greg LeBlanc, was quite favourably received by all the Senators. It was noted by N.J. Brown that there has been a tendency for faculty, wrapped up within their own disciplines, to do less than they ought in the direction suggested by the motion.

Brown also noted that this motion was quite different from one introduced, and defeated, in the Arts faculty last December, and he added that that motion was defeated not, as some people had suggested, because the Arts faculty had abandoned the human race, but rather because the particular programmes suggested in that motion seemed, to most of the Arts faculty, to be a poor way of approaching the problem.

been involved with computer research on both subjects. This second project centred on the question, "How did the Polynesians get where they are today?", and more important, "Why?" The particular experiment proposed to find out whether the Polynesians landed by accident or design by seeing if it were possible to come upon their territory entirely by accident. The computer was programmed to simulate drift conditions of every sort (based on the real distributions for area, weather, sea and so on) and to ascertain whether landing might occur. The experiment proved that drift isn't a reasonable postulate in explanation of the Polynesians' voyages, and hence, that they must have had knowledge of navigation.

To Levison's disappointment, most of his audience were computer students, so the succeeding question session dwelt mainly on details of his experimental work.

Drug referral centre reopens

A Kingston drug information and referral centre reopened last week with support from Queen's and other institutions in the area.

Financed by a $8000 grant from the federal government's local Initiatives Programme, the centre, at 122 Wellington Street, is managed by a board which includes representatives from Queen's, St. Lawrence College, Kingston General Hospital, correctional institutions, and the legal aid office.

Opening the centre, the Rev. Ron Smeaton, city minister and host of an open-line programme on CKLC radio, said, "People who say there is no drug abuse problem in the city are the core of the problem themselves."

Coordinator Paul Foudy said the centre will be serving everyone in the community who has a problem with drugs, knows someone who needs help, or is a parent and wants information about drugs.

Foudy, an education student at Queen's, will be assisted by former addict, and parolee, Bob Greer.

Greer, who will be a field-worker for the centre and supervise its public relations, said he hopes to coordinate a drug education programme complementing the one run by the Frontenac County board of education.

The centre plans activities to help people with durg problems in Kingston through connections with such bodies as drama groups. Foudy pointed out that the intention is to have a referral agency, not a drop-in centre for drug users.

The centre can be reached at 546-0101.

Weekend pub proposed

On Wednesday night in Grant Hall the AMS outer council will discuss moving Bitter Grounds to another room to enable the pub to remain open on weekends.

It was agreed that both should be accomodated as they catered to two different crowds.

Bitter Grounds moved from the coffee shop to the pub last year and according to Harry Angus, the new manager, "it's done better ever since."

"The basic problem for Bitter Grounds is finding a place with atmosphere," he added.

Inner Council agreed on Sunday night that they must try to find satisfactory accomodation for the Grounds elsewhere. As the Grounds only utilizes one room, the other pub facilities are left vacant.

Several alternatives were suggested including the International Centre, the Red Room and Jackson Lounge.

Although owned by the Engineering Society, there are only two engineering students on the committee which runs the Grounds.

As a result, John Macdonald, vice-president of the Engineering Society said, "we might be willing to transfer ownership to the AMS if we were assured that Bitter Grounds would survive.

The pub hopes to expand into the television room next year and provide entertainment on Thursday, Friday and Saturday nights.

New arts and science programmes

A number of new programmes in the faculty of Arts and Science were approved at the March Senate meeting last Thursday.

Two of the new programmes are special field programmes. A person will be able, starting next year, to get an honours B.A. in Social Behaviour, which features a concentration of eight courses in either sociology or psychology, with a secondary concentration of six courses in sociology if the primary concentration is in psychology, or of six courses in psychology, if the primary concentration is in sociology.

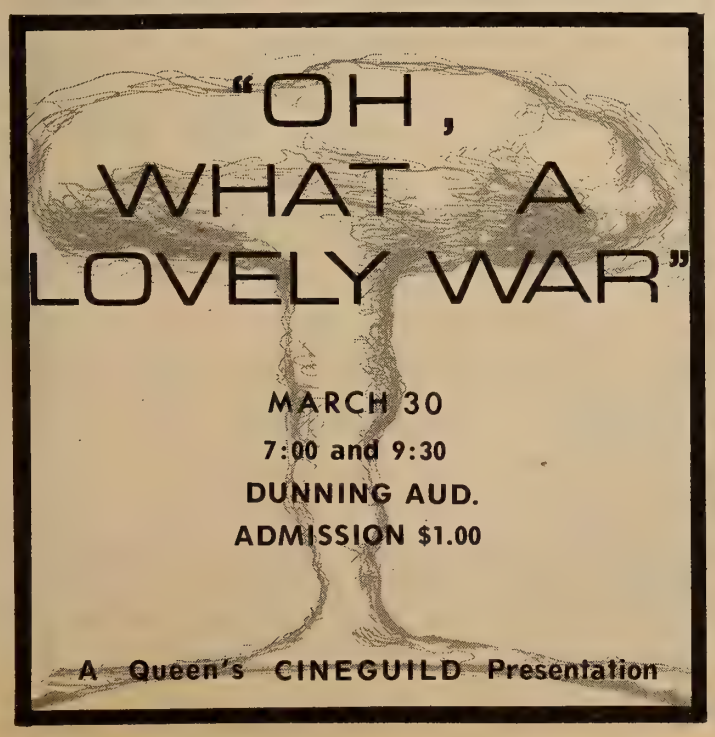
The other special field, which also leads to an honours B.A., is in Culture Change. This programme consists of seven sociology courses (chosen from a list of prescribed courses, as is the case in the rest of the choices), two geography courses, two psychology courses, and three courses taken from among a list which includes languages, economics, history, art history, politics, and philosophy.

Also approved was a B. Sc. (honours) with a 14 course concentration in computing science and physics; a B. Sc. (honours) in Chemical Physics, requiring 14 full courses in chemistry and physics and four courses in mathematics; a B. Sc. (honours) with a 14 course concentration in chemistry and biology; a B. Sc. (honours) with a 14 course concentration in chemistry and mathematics; and a medial in classical studies, consisting of seven full courses selected from a list including ancient history, classical studies, and art and archaeology.

Also approved was a major in drama, which had been introduced to the Senate at the February meeting, and which has been studied for the past month by the Senate Committee on Academic Development.

Coed govt. meeting tonight

An open meeting tonight will discuss how Morris Hall, the first coed residence on Queen's central campus, should be governed next fall.



Five representatives of the residences board, who make up a committee to study the question, have invited opinions from members of the university in general.

They are dean of women Mrs. Evelyn Reid; Women's Residence Council ex-secretary Beth Higginson; Inter-Residence Council vice-chairman Val Karpinsky; and two alumni representatives, Mrs. Douglas Murray and John Crouchman.

The meetings begin at 7:00 tonight in Theatre A of Stirling Hall.

LETTERS:

the Dormouse

alan broadbent

"Everybody must get stoned," Dylan once told us. And he was probably quite right.

We all want to get turned on, somehow, someway, sometime.

The problem, as I see it, is one of information. We all want to feel relevant, to be able to deal with the information that is available to us. To be able to do this is ultimately to be able to order our universe. The closer we come to this, the more content and confident people we are.

To be unable to deal with the available information is to deal in confusion. Confusion results in alienation, in feelings of irrelevency, and thence in depression.

Now, when there is little available information, it is easy to set the world in order. The processes of the mind can process all the information, can reach conclusions of order, and can make all things understandable. This produces happy people for the most part, because the probability of confusion and depression is low.

However, when the amount of available information increases, problems arise. One of three things happens. The mind can remain with the same capacity for processing information, and thus miss a great part of it, resulting in confusion, alienation, etc. Secondly, the mind can increase its capacity to process information, but at a rate less the increase of the amount of information. Or thirdly, the mind can increase its capacity at the same rate or at a faster rate that the information increase.

The third of these is possible for very few, particularly when the rate of information increase is very great. It is when the mind's increase rate is greater than the information increase rate that new frontiers in knowledge are uncovered and populated.

The first option, where the mind's capacity remains static, leads to the greatly alienated and indisposed. These people, in fact, are some of the happiest and most content, for they are allowed the luxury of ignorance. It is only when some great trauma or catastrophe strikes them that they realize the full extent of what they do not know.

The second option, where the mind's capacity expands, but at a lesser rate than the information increase rates, is where the vast majority of people fall. For the most part, these people realize the gap that exists between the two rates, and they try to do something about it.

This leads them to attempts to expand their mental capacities, or in current terminology, to expand their mind. And they encounter a problem here, for as the information increase rate sky-rockets, they are constantly pressed to find new methods to expand their minds.

When the information is increasing relatively slowly, the methods used for mental expansion are tame and "natural". However, when the increase in available information is dramatic, mind expansion techniques tend to become artificial, and even drastic.

This process can be outlined by a look at recent history. Since the end of World War II, technological advances have given us methods of communication which have shown most individuals great amounts of information. As a result, there has been a dramatic increase in the amount of available information.

Mind expansion methods were at first rather well controlled. First, there was an allegiance built up to modern media, first radio and then television. Secondly, there was a concentration on popular media figures, in the hopes that these people would be able to open up minds.

In the 1950's, rock and roll music took over as a primitive attempt at mind expansion. This music was both primitive and organic. In the late fifties and during the sixties, there was a major increase in the enrollment at colleges and universities, a legitimate societal method for the expansion of the mind.

In the early 1960's, the first mass use of artificial mind expansion methods took place with the development of subculture music and drug use. In music, the Beatles and such west-coast groups as the Jefferson Airplane urged us to "feed your head". Gurus such as Timothy Leary fed their heads and then directed the rest of us to reach new mental limits in the same way.

The information continued to increase, "explode" as McLuhan tells us, and it seems that the methods of mind expansion were becoming more and more drastic. Heavy and damaging drug use became popular, and religions were uprooted and reculturized.

This process continues now, and the situation seems to reach new heights of absurdity every day. The amount of available information continues to increase at lightening speeds, and the efforts at mind expansion take great leaps and bounds.

Phys-ed editorial an UNDERstatement

Dear Editors;

In his criticism of your editorial (Physical Education or Secretarial Science?), Rob Beamish seems to have missed the point. The target of the attack was the marking scheme of the 4th year thesis and the fact that a brilliant idea is worth as little as a misplaced comma. (It could be suggested that anyone with ideas, brilliant or otherwise, is weeded out of PHE long before fourth year.)

Yet, while labelling the editorial false, unfounded and biased, Mr. Beamish completely sidesteps this criticism and talks instead about issues unrelated to it. In fact, not only are the main points of the editorial correct but a great deal more could have been said. It could have been mentioned that the style which is so important and must be rigidly adhered to in the thesis is 15 years out of date and that this is one of the reasons many typists refuse to accept PHE theses. The criticism could have been enlarged to comment on the marking schemes of some other fourth year courses, where criteria like punctuality, attitude and attendance are used too.

Mr. Beamish seems worried that these matters have come out in the open when there are adequate channels available. From personal experience, I believe that these channels are useless. The very existence of the practices mentioned would seem to reflect the futility of these channels.

Few teaching jobs exist

Dear Editors;

The Althouse College Students Council would like to warn the students of your university about the dangers involved in entering a college of education for training as a secondary school teacher. The employment situation this year is worse than even the most pessimistic of our students might have predicted last Fall,. with such large boards of education as Waterloo and Simcoe Counties expecting to hire few, if any, teachers this year. The colleges of education must allow the maximum number of students to enrol each year if they are to maintain their staffs at the present levels. The per capita grant structure decreed by the Provincial Government forces them to this ridiculous position. Thus, the Government is spending a considerable amount of the taxpayer's money training teachers who aren't needed. A certain amount of competition is healthy, we agree, but the present amount is ludicrous. Althouse is presently in a state of mass paranoia.

Our message, then, is simply this - UNLESS YOU REALLY WANT TO TEACH, DON'T ENTER A COLLEGE OF EDUCATION. Think carefully before you decide teaching is for you; it's no bed of roses even if you do get a job.

G. Scott Wooding, President,
Althouse College Students Council.

Pub dance

Dear Editors;

I was glad to see that a Pub and Dance was again held in Leonard Hall Cafeteria as requested in my letter of February 11, 1972. It was a roaring success, lots of fun, lots of people and the band even was there-good dance music. I hope that further Friday night dances are held. At 50 cents per person admission and beer 3 for $1.00, then those planning to attend should come early as this is one event that starts on time. Good work by the organizers.

Baccalaureate service

Dear Editors;

Re: Baccalaureate Service

Someone planned the Baccalaureate Service held on March 5, 1972. This service I understand is part of the ceremonies held for the graduating students so it was probably a joint effort -student and faculty. To all those who listened to the service I am sure found it inspirational in the selection of hymns, scripture, prayer and guest speaker.

Being one of the parents who attended, I could not help but reflect back to past Baccalaureate Services when friends and family of the graduate gathered to honor those people who had spend four or more years to prepare themselves for a life's work or to follow their desires. I am assuming this has been their choice. They have been guided by men and women who have in their past gained knowledge and, for a price have chosen to share it with these graduates.

On this day set aside for the service, friends old and young, parents, faculty members gather. Some have never had the opportunity to be a graduate, - some have, but in any case they are there because they are proud. Proud of their friends, their son or daughter, proud of their good fortune and success,- and proud they had some part in it.

Why did the graduates not enter and sit as a group? so that we could see who they are. Were the graduates not proud enough or thoughtful enough to stand up and be recognized?

We are reminded many times that there is a generation gap but does there need to be one? The younger generation seem to want to break all traditions but graduates are in a special category. They are not young or old- but wise.

Think then, graduates - is this the way it is to be and do you want it this way? Some day you will be the guest.

- A Parent.

"... Those who profess to favour freedom, and yet depreciate agitation, are men who want crops without plowing up the ground. They want rain without thunder and lightning. They want the ocean without the awful roar of its waters. This struggle may be a moral one; or it may be a physical one; or it may be both moral and physical; but it must be a struggle. Power concedes nothing without a demand. It never did, and it never will. Find out just what people will submit to, and you have found out the exact amount of injustice and wrong which will be imposed upon them; and these will continue till they are resisted with either words or blows, or with both. The limits of tyrants are prescribed by the endurance of those whom they oppress. . ."

OTTAWA — Jobs must take precedence over pollution control, Environment Minister Jack Davis told Opposition ciritics in the House of Commons Tuesday.

He said that if air, water and land-use standards were strongly enforced, a number of Canada's 150 pulp and paper mills might be forced to close at a time when jobs are more important than pollution control.

Davis used the pulp and paper industry as an example in defending government efforts to combat pollution. He said that negotiations are under way with several major industries, but that overnight results cannot be expected.

WATERLOO — Demonstrations against the Wright Commission brief on post-secondary education in Ontario and a proposed University of Waterloo act were urged Wednesday at a mass liberation teach-in held at the University of Waterloo campus centre. About 700 students jammed into the room.

Later, about 50 students led by Terry Moore, Student Federation president, marched to the university's business office on the fifth floor of the library and began a sit-in.

They are protesting against the proposed act for not providing sufficient student representation on the senate, the university's senior academic governing body. The university has a student enrolment of 8,000. The new act would provide 12 student seats in the senate. Currently, there are none. The act is a private bill which will be placed before the Ontario Legislature this month.

TORONTO — Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau Thursday night promised that the federal government would not go ahead with the planned Pickering airport if the majority of people in the Toronto area don't want it.

Trudeau said, "If the majority of the people who would be served by this airport, even if only 51 per cent, didn't want this airport, then we wouldn't proceed with it."

He gave no indication how the federal government would find out whether the majority of the general public were in favor or opposed to the proposed airport.

MONTREAL — Mayor Jean Drapeau confirmed that French architect Roger Taillibert, "a specialist in the creation of large-scale sports institutions," would be brought here to plan the city's 1976 Olympics stadium. The mayor is scheduled to reveal stadium details April 6. His announcement hasn't gone down too well with domestic architects; some called it an affront to local designers, many of whom worked on Expo 67. Apparently sports stadiums for Olympic games in Tokyo, Rome, Mexico City and Munich were designed by nationals of their own countries.

QUEBEC — The union common front representing 210,000 Quebec public servants Friday night renewed its threat of a general strike "within a few days" and warned it may not be limited to 24 hours.

A 24-hour strike, scheduled for Friday, was cancelled because a blizzard that raced throughout eastern Quebec had already dangerously depleted hospital and other essential services.

ST. JOHN'S, Nfld. — Premier Frank Moores led the Conservative party to a crushing victory Friday sweeping 33 of the 42 seats and capturing 61 per cent of the popular vote.

Moores, 39, immediately promised to keep his 15-man cabinet intact and open the legislature on April 10.

Newfoundland had been a bastion of Liberalism from Confederation in 1949 until last October's election, which saw the Conservatives win 21 seats to 20 for former premier Joey Smallwood's Liberals.

The Conservative landslide claimed Tom Burgess, a former Liberal, former New Labrador Party leader and former independent Liberal, who was back in the Liberal fold for this election.

PLAY IT AGAIN, UNCLE SAM

OTTAWA — The judge in charge of reforming federal laws wants to simplify procedures so citizens can go to court on their own and conduct ordinary business without having to hire a lawyer.

E. Patrick Hartt, head of the federal Law Reform Commission and an Ontario Supreme Court judge said Wednesday that Canada's legal system is "too costly and too complex" for ordinary people.

"The type of law that affects the average guy . . . particularly criminal law and familiar law . . . should be simpler so that people can understand it," he said in an interview.

THE WORLD

LONDON — The Soviet Union has offered China a non-aggression pact in a hasty effort to improve their relations and undercut Sino-American reconciliation, diplomatic sources said Thursday. China did not react, the sources said.

They said the Soviets have hinted that they are willing to let bygones be bygones and resume co-operation backed by sizeable economic assistance.

To top it off, Deputy Foreign Minister Leonid Ilyichov has been sent to Peking, as head of the Soviet delegation to the stalemated talks with China on their border dispute, with instructions to offer minor frontier changes as a starting point for improved relations.

Despite the Soviet attempts to ease tension, Chinese Communist party Chairman Mao Tse-tung remained unresponsive and apparently is unwilling to go beyond a minimum of formal diplomatic contacts with Russia, the sources said.

UNITED NATIONS — The UN commission on human rights Wednesday accused Israel of "war crimes" in the Arab territories captured in the 1967 Six-Day War.

A UN resolution to that effect, sponsored by Egypt, Lebanon and Tanzania and adopted by a vote of 15 to 4 with 11 abstentions, said the commission was gravely concerned as such Israeli acts as the establishment of Israeli settlements in conquered Arab lands, deportation of Arabs, demolition of villages, confiscation of property, collective punishment, ill treatment of prisoners and administrative detention.

WASHINGTON — The Senate foreign relations committee will investigate the influence of multi-national corporations on U.S. foreign policy, Chairman J. William Fulbright announced Friday.

Fulbright (D-Ark.) said the scope of the investigation would include -- but also go beyond -- allegations that the International Telephone and Telegraph Corp. collaborated with the U.S. government in 1970 to block the election of Chile's Marxist president, Salvador Allende.

LONDON — The British government will take over direct rule of Northern Ireland and has promised "new and radical" approaches to end the strife there between Roman Catholics and Protestants.

Prime Minister Edward Heath said a measure will be presented to the House of Commons before Easter taking over all the legislative and executive powers of the Ulster Parliament. It is expected to be given quick approval.

Heath said he had decided on direct rule after failing to reach agreement with Northern Ireland Prime Minister Brian Faulkner on concessions to Roman Catholics in an attempt to end the bloodshed in Northern Ireland. Faulkner and his cabinet threatened to resign over some of Heath's proposals.

Heath said the British had decided that a start should be made soon on "phasing out" the internment policy under which more than 700 Catholics have been imprisoned.

He said the government had also decided that periodic plebiscites should be held in Northern Ireland to let people vote on whether they want to remain part of the United Kingdom or be reunited with the Irish Republic.

WASHINGTON — The U.S. National Commission on Marijuana and Drug Abuse recommended Wednesday abolishing possession of marijuana but said national policy should aim at discouraging its use.

Possession for personal use in private and casual not-for-profit sales in private would not be criminal offences if the recommendations of the 13-man commission are accepted.

But there would be heavy penalties for cultivation, trafficking and possession with intent to sell.

Marijuana possessed in public would be liable to summary seizure but there would be no penalty; public use of marijuana would be a criminal offence punishable by a fine of $100.

Maureen Bouris, Murray Douglas, Take Top Awards

Maureen Bouris - P.H.E. '55 Winner

One of the noisiest Colour Night crowds in recent memory managed to survive a rather uninspired cold-plate dinner (aided by an abundance of liquid supplements) to see honours awarded to the best of their compatriots. Murray Douglas and Maureen Bouris respectively received the prestigious Jenkins and PHE '55 Trophys, given each year to the graduating man and woman "who has brought most honour to Queen's by (his or her) athletic and scholastic achievements." Both offered replies on behalf of Queen's athletes to the traditional toast proposed by Dr. Deutsch.

Other top awards went to Penny Smith and Steve Gross (Alfie Pierce Trophy, for the outstanding male and female freshmen athletes) and Bob Lingwood (Jack Jarvis Trophy, for the outstanding final-year student competing in individual sports.)

Dave Hadden received the Royal Todd Memorial Trophy as the outstanding football rookie, and Steve Gross collected more hardware as the top hockey rookie (Stew Langdon Trophy). Other top rookie awards went to Hugh Fraser (track and field), Jack Muir (swimming), Rob Smart (basketball) and Kees Kort and Brian Titley (rugger).

Another joint award went to Mike Lambros and Brian Warrender, who received the Johnny Evans Memorial Trophy as the outstanding members of the football Gaels. Colin Loudin picked up the Senator Powell award as hockey's MVP, while Paul Howard was awarded the R.A.F. Trophy as the basketball team's top man. Bob Lingwood also grabbed an MVP award, the Track Alumni Trophy, to go with the Jarvis. Gord Hurd pulled off a double, winning MVP trophies in both Swimming and Waterpolo, while wrestler Ted Prdham won the Jack Day trophy for his endeavors on the mats. Dave Ross won the MVP award in Gymnastics.

In post-event competition, the football Gaels took two straight boat races from rugger and soccer, mostly on the strength of Dave Whitesides's strong anchor chugs. And, would you believe, a mixed squad from gymnastics bested soccer, who had been reinforced by B-Ball coach Brenda Mackie. Actually, the party beat out the dinner about 6 to 1. Maybe next year they should just buy about 100 cases of ale and let 'em rip – at least it would keep up the audience interest.

Track Gaels end on winning note

A six-man contingent from Queen's track team picked up a total of five medals at the Canadian Indoor Championships in Quebec City last weekend. Kip Sumner started things off with a spectacular win in the 1500 meters, as he jumped into an early lead and simply wore out the competition in a time of 3:54.4. Hugh Fraser also struck gold for the Gaels, picking up a convincing win in the 200-m dash in a fast 22.1 sec. Fraser lost his chance for double gold when the starter threw him out of the 100-m for committing two rather controversial false starts.

Hurdler Dave Jarvis had his best day of the indoor season as he defeated Canada's top-ranked pair of Brian Donnelly and George Neeland in the 50-m event. His time of 6.8 was identical to that of the top two finishers, Tony Neilson of Eastern Michigan and Carl Boyer of Detroit.

Field men Bob Lingwood and Glen Milligan took two thirds. Lingwood finished behind two of eastern North American's best putters, Bruce Pienie, who has a best throw of 63'2", and Saturday's winner Brian Caulfield, who tossed 61'9". Glen Milligan jumped 22' 4", to end up behind Alberta's Barry Boyle and John Konihowski of Saskatchewan.

Middle-distance man Brian MacDonald was the only Gael held off the scoresheet. MacDonald finished 6th in the 800-m run in a slow 1:58.4, well above his best this season. His other finish was a 7th behind Sumner in the 1500-metres.

This meet finished the best indoor season ever at Queen's, but for several Gaels the action may be just starting. Fraser, Jarvis and Sumner all appear to have good chances for Olympic berths, and MacDonald may have a shot despite his disappointing performance Saturday. If they make it, the summer could be interesting!

This Hour and A Half Has Seven Days

by Sandy Naiman

The Horse and Wagon Puppet Theatre's production of "Fire" was not exactly what I would call theatre. In fact, I would be hard put to call it anything, other than a series of ritualistic, mildly symbolic tableaus, set in a rather contrived atmosphere of ethereality.

The "production" and I use the word rather loosely here, began with a half hour of "bread breaking" by a couple of cast members, circulating throughout the audience. I am unable to "review" the quality of this bread, rumoured to be unleavened, because I was not given any. Perhaps the bread breakers knew I was reviewing their production and didn't want to prejudice me, one way or the other.

Anyway, after this ritual was completed, the "play", another loose use of the term, began. The first of nine segments, Monday, was simply a tableau, consisting of about a dozen figures, dressed in black, their faces hidden, behind grotesque, frighteningly unemotional masks. Their hands, too, were hidden, inside rigid gloves and thus there was no bare skin evident at all. The way in which the masks were constructed didn't even display the movement of eyes. The total impression was of beings decidedly non human.

There was no movement, no sound and as the figure, who acted as scene changer, pulled the red curtain across the stage, to signify the end of Monday, the audience seemed restless and a few people made their departures.

Tuesday, brought another, almost identical tableau, but this time, one character passed a bowl around and initiated what I suppose was a ritual sharing ceremony. Wednesday, Thursday, and the rest of the week was much the same, with the odd loud trumpet sounding, or drum shattering the otherwise silent atmosphere.

The players were superbly disciplined in their freezes, but there was so little spontaneous action, so much silence and each successive freeze was held for so long a period of time that I became progressively more and more bored with the entire thing.

My initial reaction was, that "Fire" was unreviewable. There were some obvious Christian allegorical allusions but the symbolism was not carried far enough or was not recognizably symbolic. An example of this was on the day entitled "Fire", the bell which previously rang four times during an entire freeze, rang twenty times. Now, what is significant about twenty bells? Or, is there anything significant about them at all, and in that case is any of the smybolism supposed to be meaningful?

The last two segments of the program were perhaps the most dynamic and also contained the only traces of spontaneity in the entire evening. The first, a primitive representation of fire, was enacted by two members of the company throwing red sheets over the former freeze victims, with blaring horns sounding and a blinding spotlight flashing over both audience and stage.

Finally, and with a sigh of relief, that the diminishing audience seemed to share with me, the end was heralded in by an obtuse scene, in which the only white garbed figure "red taped" himself up, while caged behind a small square play pen.

It was suggested to me, after I was turned away by one of the members of the company and told to come back later, that on an American campus, this piece, dedicated, incidentally to those who have lost their lives in Viet Nam, would probably be quite effective, and perhaps more meaningful. But here, it may very well have been lost simply because we are not so vehemently political and have not lost our creme de la creme in that ridiculous war.

I still believe that "Fire" is basically unreviewable except for the aforementioned discipline demonstrated and the artistry of the masks and backdrop of the stage which were masterfully grotesque and brought the figures into a pagan, almost asexual realm.

These aspects of the production were not enough to make it what I would call a worthwhile experience. If it was supposed to disturb, it succeeded, as the evening was somewhat wasted and that can be very disturbing on a Saturday night. If it was supposed to intrigue, it failed completely.

What fire did do was puzzle, subliminally, but it was quickly forgotten.

Postscript: It is ironic that my initial, gut reaction was anger, and that the program was dedicated to those who gave their lives in a war. I wonder if this reaction was meant to parallel its acknowledgment.

Fire will be shown Friday, Saturday, and Sunday at 8:30 p.m. at the Domino Theatre. It will be run as a benefit for Brian James of the House of James in Kingston.

Drama Guild Plans New Theatre

By Sandy Naiman

In response to the "long standing cry that Queen's University students have no place, no facilities and no opportunity to produce their own drama", Mr. Morison Bock, an instructor in the Queen's Drama Department, has provided an exciting and viable proposition which will depend greatly on student support.

The Queen's Drama Guild was originally the sponsor of drama productions before major productions and Chronicles were undertaken by the Drama Department staff. In the past few years, however, the Guild has been overshadowed by these activities and has remained on the periphery of the dramatic action.

Last year, Brian Wilson produced "Bacchae" and this year Mo Bock produced "It's Called The Sugar Plum". A notable contribution made recently by the Drama Guild was the London Theatre Tour, a highly successful venture, organized by Bud Burkom, Paul Barron and Sandy Aitken. Other than that, the Guild which gets its money from both student membership and the AMS, has functioned mainly as an underwriting society for the enterprizing young people who have wanted to work independently.

The idea of creating, organizing and directing a Guild Theatre, off campus and open to any student, was initially Brian Wilson's. Owen Moulton and Mo Bock, intrigued with the idea, brought it to the Guild Executive and planning began.

Mr. Bock became director of the Guild Theatre and a space was rented, just above Heffalump, at 229 Princess Street. The acquisition of this space was just the beginning.

What type of drama will it house? How will one go about getting the use of it? When will it be ready for use? And, finally, how will it be able to support itself?

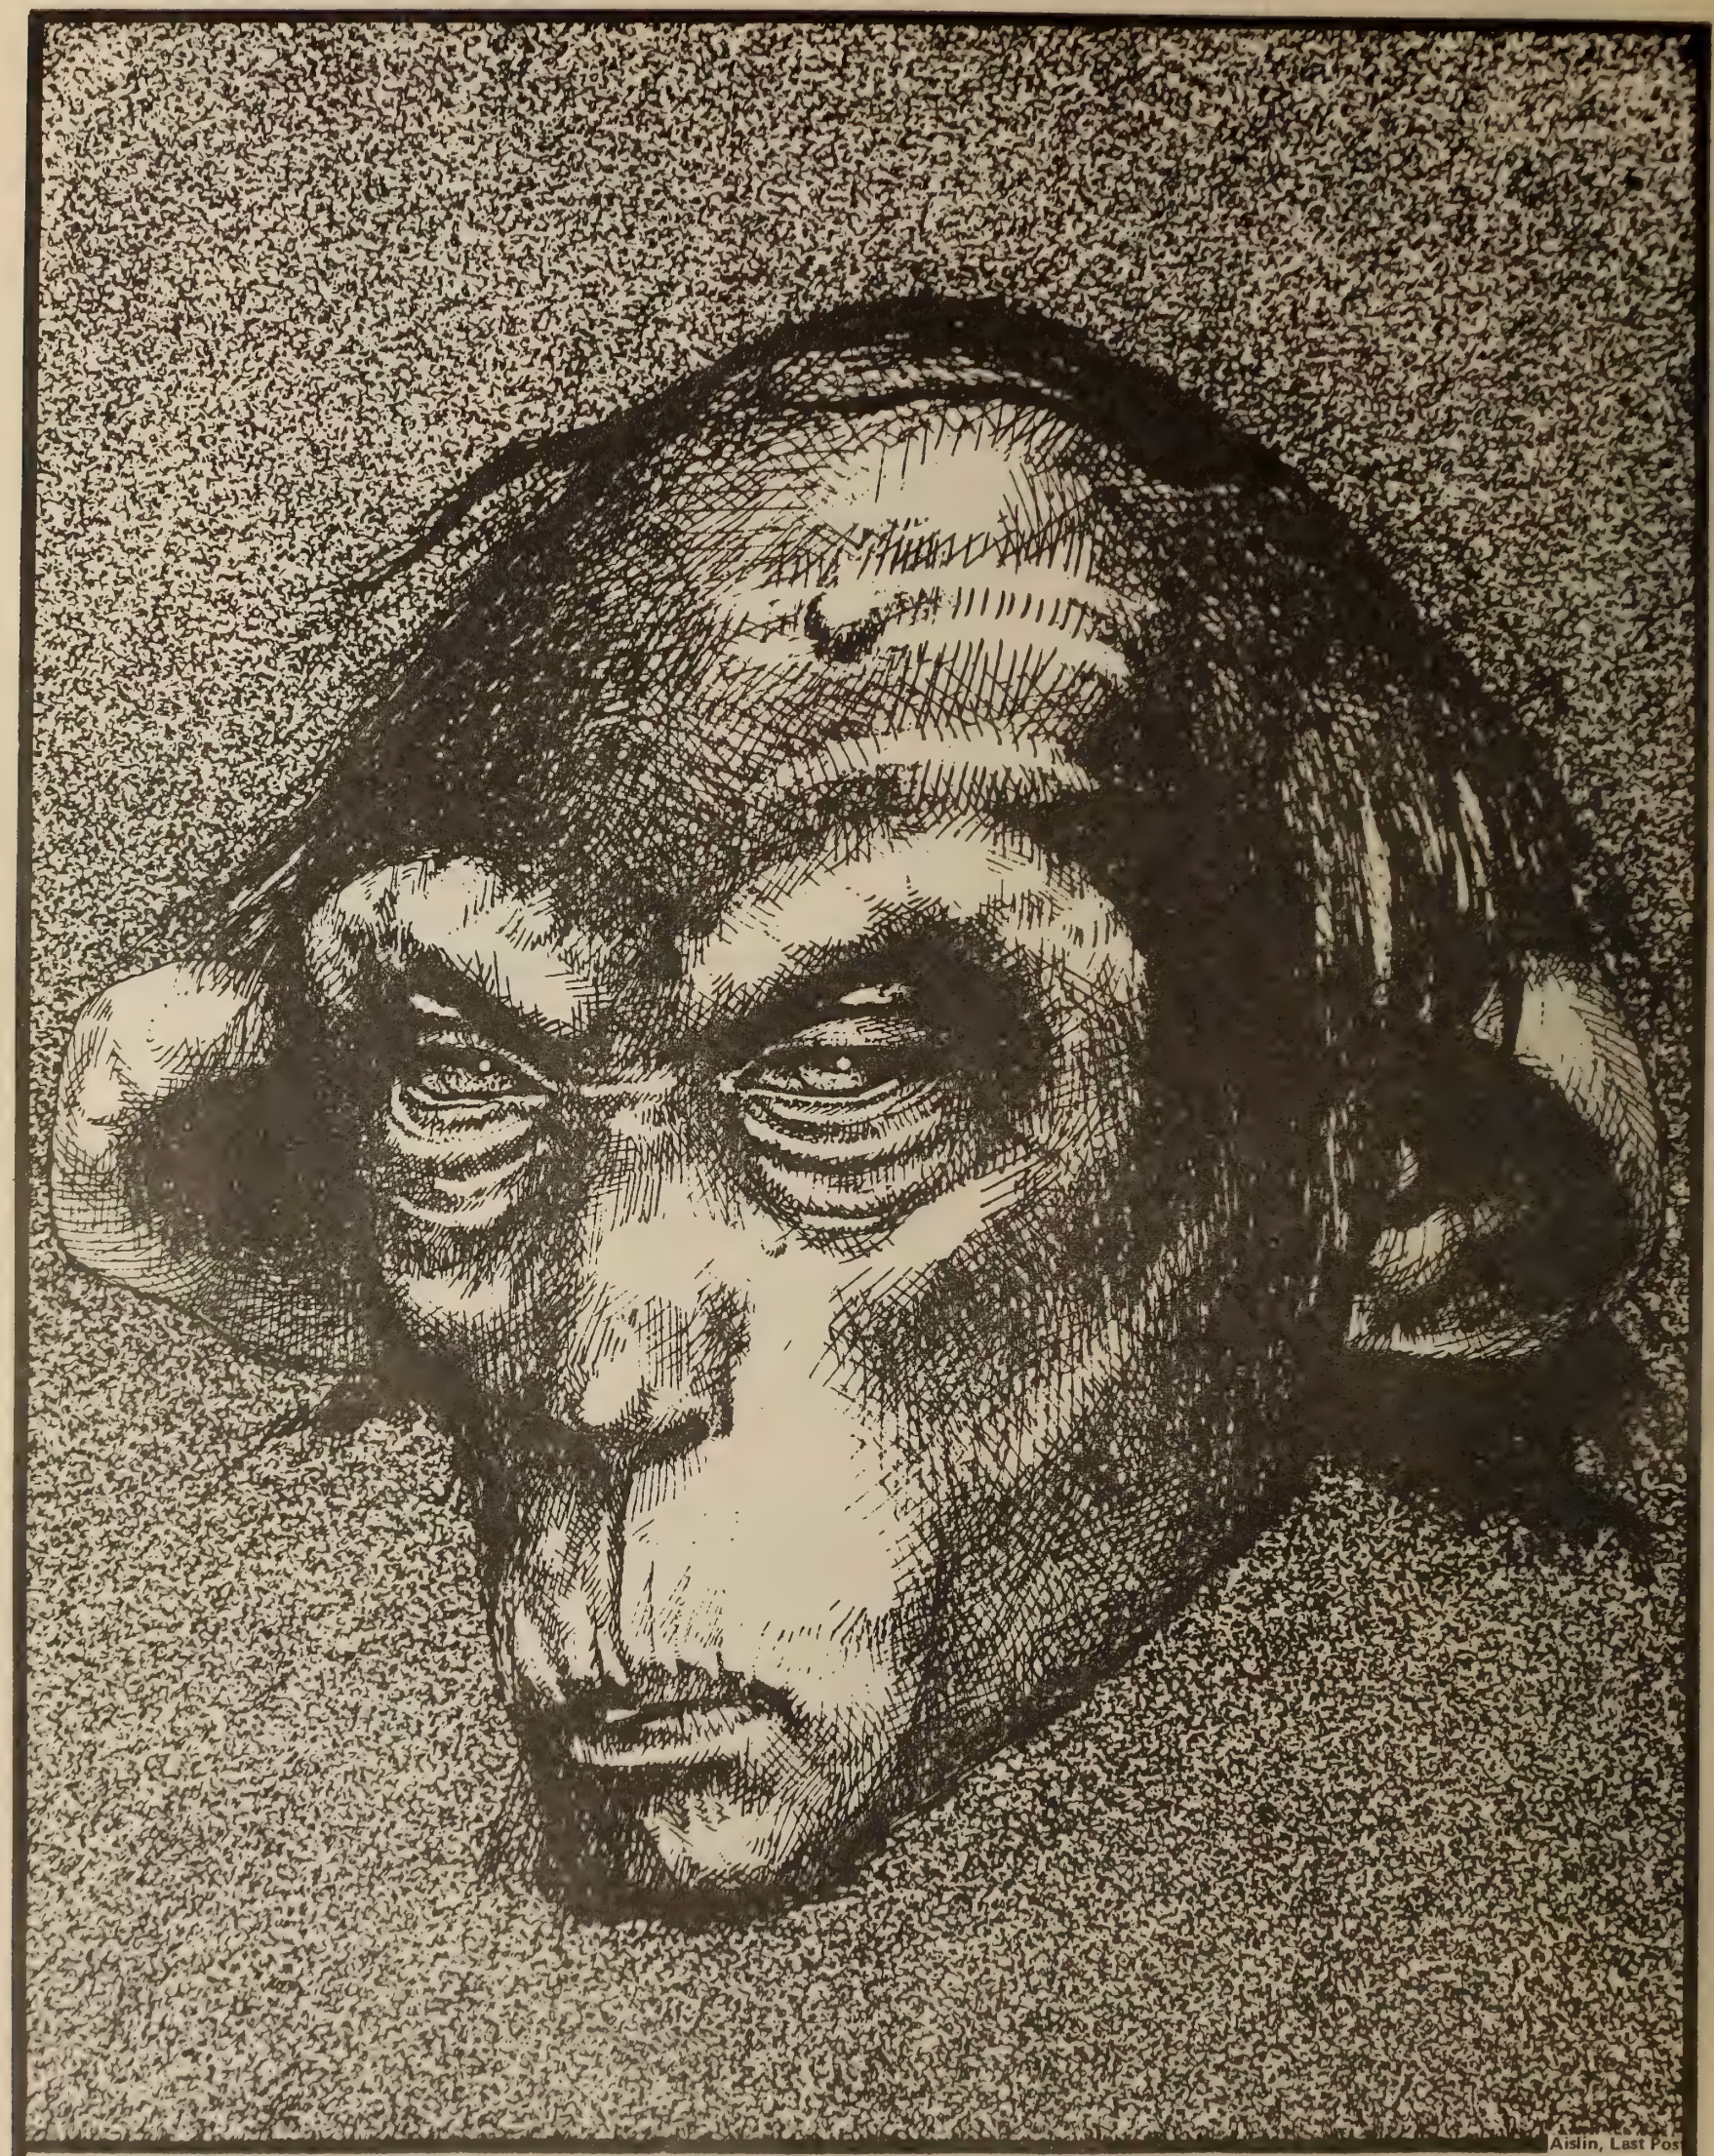
The Guild is planning a production of Harold Pinter's "The Caretaker", starring Stephen Hair, John Burgess and Mo Bock, to be directed by Doug Abel and to run from April 18th to 22nd, in Convocation Hall. This production will initiate the Guild Theatre's activities, as well as raise money for its furnishing and provide a production budget.

Mr. Bock's philosophy of the Guild Theatre is to make it a "focal point for noncommercial, good, interesting and unique theatre" and he hopes to be able to revitalize some of the more classical works in our dramatic tradition: works by Shakespeare and Moliere.

In the event that a student wishes to produce a play in the Guild Theatre, he will be able to present his ideas to the Guild Executive and, if these ideas are feasible, the Guild will help finance the production and provide technical and directorial assistance, as well.

The projected date for opening is mid June and the first production of the Guild Theatre in its new locale will probably be in the fall.

Several possibilities for summer activities are now being investigated, including an experimental touring company, sponsored by the Opportunities For Youth Program and a regional program sponsored by the Ontario Youtheatre. The latter will instruct young people, between the ages of 15 and 21 years, in various theatrical techniques: movement, acting, production, directing and theatre publicity, advertising and management, with a production as the overriding objective.



The Drama Guild will have its own resident theatre, a versatile space, an intimate studio area, with moveable seats, numbering 48 to 60 and several stage exposures.

Primarily, the success of the Guild Theatre will depend upon the support that students, as spectators and participants, demonstrate.

It's going to be exciting to watch the Guild Theatre flourish and grow. Its activities and the productions it will offer you, will be even more exciting. The students and residents of Kingston will have an opportunity to enjoy an innovative, living, dynamic theatre, which has rarely been available before.

That "long standing cry . . . No Place!" has been answered.

TUITION UP $100

Provincial budget

Tuition fees rise $100, award money down 35%

Tuition fees will go up $100 at Ontario universities next fall, and funds available for student assistance will go down, as two results of the Ontario budget tabled in Queen's Park Tuesday night

The standard tuition fee, for both graduates and undergraduates, will be $585 in 1972-73; it is $485 this year, and most Queen's students are paying a fee set slightly higher than that, $500.

Queen's officials could not be reached yesterday to comment on whether the increase will affect Queen's, but government grants will be based on the assumption that the $585 fee is charged here, so it probably will be.

Students in Ontario teachers colleges will pay a tuition fee as well, the same $585 -- the first time they have been asked to pay for their training. Student nurses are to be charged a $250 tuition fee, as are students in community colleges.

These increases are expected to give the province an additional $23 million in revenue next year.

They are part of an austerity budget which, despite higher luxury taxes, higher fees for government services, and lower spending, will give Ontario a $500 million deficit in a total budget of $5 billion.

Opposition leader Robert Nixon called the tuition fee increase the "most regressive" part of the budget. He said he was surprised not to see more student awards provided for.

Student award money will be reduced from $51 million to $34.8 million.

Provincial treasurer Darcy McKeough, presenting the budget, told the Legislature that "the government believes that it is inequitable for the taxpayers to bear all the costs of increases in this area (post-secondary education). Rather, students who benefit directly should bear a larger part of the costs."

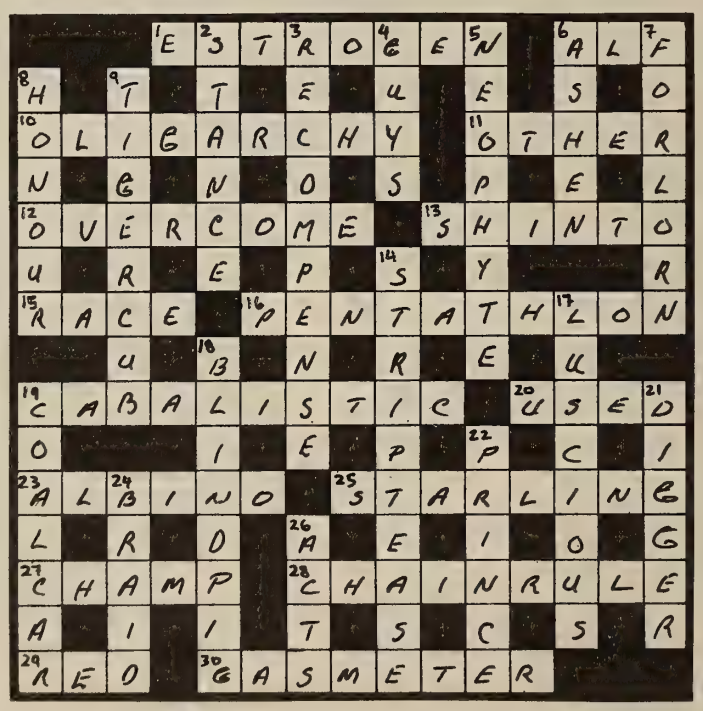
McKeough said he did not believe the increased tuition would keep a significant number of people out of university who would previously have gone there.

He pointed out that education costs have been rising over the last few years while tuition fees have not.

The cut from $51 million to $34.8 million represents a one-third reduction in what the government will spend on the Ontario Student Awards Programme, Ontario Graduate Fellowships, and other forms of student aid.

It probably will not affect Canada Student Loans.

Ontario will also be providing less money for buildings at both universities and secondary schools. Money from this area will be redirected into pollution control and housing.



Overall, the province has allocated $631 million for operating grants to colleges, an increase of $92.7 million over last year. In addition, administrative costs of the provincial department of colleges and universities have doubled to $2.4 million.

Commenting on the budget, officials of The University of Western Ontario and The University of Waterloo said it seemed to be reversing the government's open-door policy on university accessibility.

Waterloo president Dr. Burt Matthews said tuition hikes and assistance cuts may have a very unfavourable effect on university enrollments, and may tend to put

Students would lose

Unions for professors

By Chris Redmond

Students could be the big losers if faculty members become unionized, says a report by two Queen's law professors.

The report by Bernard L. Adell and D. D. Carter was for the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, and describes the causes and the results of possible collective bargaining for Canadian professors.

Students might suffer for two major reasons, they say. Firstly, if collective bargaining failed and professors resorted to strike actions, "the chief victims of such a strike would be the students, whom faculty members have no interest in harming". As a result, they say, even strong supporters of faculty unionization feel "distaste" for the idea of strikes.

Students might lose even if collective bargaining did not get to the strike stage, however, Adell and Carter say. For "collective bargaining would probably tend to drain power away from those entities which cannot readily be put into one camp or the other". Students, being neither administration or faculty, might find themselves overlooked when major issues were being settled, the authors suggest.

Faculty members are beginning to feel the urge to unionize for a wide variety of reasons, they say, including a tightening job market for scholars: "The short-term reduction in the demand for university teachers caused by financial stringency is being aggravated by the maturing of the large Ph.D. crop sown in the 1960's in Canada and elsewhere." When scholars are more plentiful, their job security is lower.

Another reason is a desire to keep decision-making in the hands of university people, rather than those of the government, Adell and Carter say. And though faculty members do now have a major share of the power within universities, "many faculty members . . . lack any belief in the reality of the change" and consider organized pressure, such as unionization, to be their best chance. When professors feel that the administration has control of the university, "burgeoning administrative establishments are identifiable as a significant impetus to collective action."

"Self-defence against student pressure" is a further reason, though a secondary one, they suggest.

Professionals who correspond with professors are already unionized in some places in Canada, they suggest; these include public servants of many kinds, and "public school teachers have probably had the most success in improving their position through organized collective action."

Even faculty are unionizing some places, they add: "community college teachers in Quebec and Ontario appear to be following public school teachers toward collective bargaining," and there are several faculty unions in the United States, including a large one at the City University of New York.

Faculty probably are covered by labour relations law, they say, despite some exclusions of "professionals" from trade unions. "Managerial employees" are also generally excluded, but this heading does not cover faculty members who share in university government, Adell and Carter maintain.

They go on to consider what would happen if faculty did unionize, and conclude that bargaining would probably happen on two levels: first between government and university people overall, and then within each individual university.

The "upper tier" would involve negotiations on government subsidy, and universities probably would be represented by "some sort of coalition between an association of universities or university heads and a federation of faculty associations. Student organizations, if they are interested, might legitimately claim a place at the table."

Bargaining within one university would produce a conflict of interest, they say, because faculty members are involved in governing universities as well as in their faculty associations; "given the present structure of university government in Canada, faculty members, when they sit on one side of the bargaining table and engage the university in combat, are in theory fighting with themselves."

But, they conclude, this conflict is largely an illusion: "the sets of interests advanced by each side are likely to be sufficiently different." And faculty should certainly be able to join with administration in putting the university's case to the government "vigorously and in concert".

Internal bargaining, Adell and Carter say, may produce "attitudes harmful to the university". They explain, "This danger involves the effects of the avowed and regular use of the power of numbers of organization and of strategic position as the principal means of obtaining the demands of one group within the university." Such an abuse has been widely attributed to the "student power" movements of recent years as well, they comment, and much has been said about "the uneasy relationship between power and reason in the running of the university."

A further danger is that of "harmful trade-offs" in which faculty might be tempted to sacrifice educational reform for high salaries, or faculty and non-professional staff might be at odds over a limited amount of available money.

Administrations might become "tighter" and less open to faculty participation, Adell and Carter suggest; faculty associations, in turn, might find themselves saddled with problems and expenses for which they were not prepared. "The fairly casual ways of the average Canadian faculty association will have to change if it opts for formal collective bargaining."

Student influence, and the power of shared-authority bodies like the academic senate, might also wane, they say.

They discuss the possibility that the informal rules which now apply in universities would be discarded in favour of strict adherence to written union contracts. Experience suggests, however, according to examples they quote, that collective agreements will incorporate "prevailing university practices" like the fair employment standards now policed by the Canadian Association of University Teachers.

One such standard would be in special danger: higher pay for good teachers and those in special demand. Special provisions for these cases would be necessary, the authors say.

Finally Adell and Carter discuss the ultimate union weapon: strike action. Strikes by faculty would be unlikely, they say, because the losers would be students rather than administrators, and because the public would react unfavourably.

But strikes "might be justified as a last resort to defend academic values and to protect the university itself." The report makes much of these non-negotiable "value issues", the chief one being academic freedom, which it says are significantly different from "interest issues" like wages and fringe benefits.

They insist that value issues should be "shielded from the crass give-and-take" of bargaining, especially when the government is involved. For "real value issues, unlike interest issues, cannot be the object of trade-offs without doing fundamental damage to whatever those values are supposed to protect."

Adell and Carter's report, written for the AUCC, was published earlier this year by the industrial relations centre at Queen's.

Food strike strikes out

The food strike planned for Tuesday evening in Leonard Hall amounted to nothing as the usual compliment of patrons arrived for dinner. Many residents of Leonard Field thought that service could be better, but that the food strike was a stupid, poorly organized idea. Representatives of Beaver Foods, which has catered men's residence for the last five years, could not be reached for comment.

PC's nominate Flora MacDonald

Queen's administrative officer Flora MacDonald will carry the Progressive Conservative Party banner for Kingston and the Islands in the next federal election.

She received the nomination over Kingston lawyer Bogart Trumpour at a jam-packed nomination meeting Monday night at the Grand Theatre.

Miss MacDonald is planning to concentrate her campaign against Kingston MP Edgar Benson (assuming he runs again) on the local unemployment situation, the lack of good facilities at the Norman Rodgers airfield, and the lack of cable television in Kingston.

Co-ed res rolls along

A meeting Tuesday night of the committee of the residence board responsible for suggesting the form of government of co-ed Morris Hall and about three-quarters of the upper class students who have been accepted into the residence agreed to recommend a form of government similar to that of the men's residences.

The proposed scheme would divide each of Morris's three floors into two houses, a north and south house. Each house would have a male floor senior and a female proctor. These twelve would make up the central committee for the residence. Residents were chosen for these positions, providing the scheme is accepted by the residence board at its next meeting.

If the scheme is rejected, new people will have to be chosen for whatever positions are created. The subcommittee will report to the residence board at its next meeting April 8 at which time the decision will be made.

Beer prices to rise

Along with the price of learning, the price of vices goes up too. Beer will now be an even five dollars for a case of 24, liquor and wine go up too. Draft beer will be subject to tax, and cigarette taxes go up. Other sins haven't (yet) been placed in the taxable category.

Commerce changing emphasis

The Queen's Commerce Society has decided to devote more attention towards building up the status and image of the Queen's School of Business in the Canadian business community.

Society president John Telgann said "the society will continue to offer social events such as the formal, barn parties, and pub nights, but that greater emphasis will be placed on better relations with alumni and business leaders."

He hopes that they can be relied upon for guidance for the school, and in placement and scholarship guidance.

The society is also interested in running events in conjunction with the Kingston Tercentenary to give students an opportunity to become involved with the community.

In other business, the Commerce executive donated $200 to the Second Coming, a programme for upper year students which will be run during orientation week.

Vega: "the GM system... the wave of the future."

By Emma Rothschild

Early in February, workers at GM's Vega factories in Lordstown, Ohio, voted by a 97 percent majority to authorize a strike over working conditions. The struggles which preceded the strike vote are by now famous; a change in plant management, layoffs, a disciplinary crackdown, an increase in car defects, complaints by workers about the speeding up of monotonous assembly line tasks, slowdowns, high absenteeism, repeated allegations by GM of worker sabotage. It is claimed that workers have attacked the paint, bodies, upholstery, and controls of the Vega cars, and GM has offered a $5,000 reward for information about a fire in the electrical controls of the assembly line itself.

Whether or not a major strike takes place at Lordstown, conditions there are bound to be important for years to come. For General Motors, the Lordstown plant has been a model of all future auto production. The factories were opened in June, 1970, to rapturous acclamation. The general manager of Chevrolet wrote that the new factories incorporated "a quality level that has never been attained before in a manufacturing operation in this country, and probably in the world." He added that there was a "very intensive motivation program" at the plant, and that Lordstown employees had "taken to this thing very strongly."

As recently as this January, Richard C. Gerstenberg, the new chairman of GM, mentioned the Lordstown operation as the major example of his company's efforts to increase worker productivity: "Every attempt was made to design out costs in the assembly process." The Wall Street Journal has quoted an auto industry share analyst who returned from an official tour of Lordstown, "excited" about the prospects for reducting labor costs: "The essential point made was that the Vaga line is a prototype, a schooling place for everybody in the GM system . . . It is the wave of the future."

DURING the present disturbances, GM executives have restrained their public enthusiasm for Vega technology. They have suggested that the discontent at Lordstown is a consequence of exceptional worker emotions: Lordstown workers are undisciplined or too young (their average age is twenty-four) or have a mysterious modern attitude toward work. One national journal, following GM's hints, describes Lordstown as an "industrial Woodstock," and another writes that the factories are "Utopian," a "Paradise Lost" which has "fall(en) from grace" because of "balky" workers. GM management has now introduced "sensitivity sessions" at Lordstown, occasional small group therapy meetings for assembly line workers. It allows the factory to operate at half its potential weekly capacity; meanwhile it is making arrangements to transfer part of of the production of the Vega to another factory 500 miles away, at Ste. Therese, north of Montreal.

GM's sudden interest in worker psychology has been successful in diverting attention from the actual working conditions at Lordstown. Yet the corporation's own statements in the last two years make it clear that production work on the Vega is exceptionally arduous – and that the Lordstown organization of production follows predictably from corporate strategy to increase productivity.

THE auto industry now faces a crisis of depressed profits, disappointing sales, and excess productive capacity. In this gloomy state, it is attempting many different ways to increase productivity, all of which involve an intensified organization of work. Even when major capital investment in undertaken, as at Lordstown, the auto corporations continue their efforts to increase the amount of work being done by each worker. The Vega plant is one of the very few auto factories that industry executives have discussed publicly. Because of its importance for company strategy, the Lordstown factory has been described by GM in eager detail: investments in capital equipment, new ways of organizing production, new inspection techniques.

GM's stated hopes for the Lordstown project provide critical information about the auto industry's problems of productivity and about the present situation at Lordstown. Working conditions in the new factories, on GM's own description, are such that discontent and "balkiness" are rational, not exceptional, reactions. GM's horizons are stormy if, as the company has so often suggested, Lordstown is the wave of the automotive future.

II

THE VEGA was introduced in 1970 as GM's major project to fight declining profits and the growing sales of imported cars: the new car would be built (at Lordstown) with the latest automotive technology, and would be sold with the latest methods of intensive marketing. novations. GM engineers described the new factories as the best and most modern in the world. The stamping plant was designed by a computer and the assembly plant introduced "an entirely new concept of vehicle assembly." Yet the Lordstown innovations are based on the same methods of increasing productivity that GM and its competitors use in other auto factories, methods which follow from the earliest techniques of mass production. Leonard Woodcock, president of the UAW, admitted last year at an international conference of auto workers that the Lordstown advances were "not as revolutionary" as GM made out, and were a "development of the same principles" used elsewhere.

The main principle of Lordstown technology is the speed-up, as developed by Henry Ford. One hundred cars can pass along the Lordstown assembly line each hour (a usual speed for assembly lines is sixty cars an hour). Workers face a new Vega every thirty-six seconds – 800 Vegas in each eight-hour shift. Jobs have therefore been rearranged to suit a thirty-six second rhythm of production. Every innovation supports the assembly speed-up: Vegas were designed with comparatively simple parts, so that each part could be added in thirty-six seconds, by a diligent but unskilled worker.

The machines that affect jobs most are machines for increasing the organization of production, for rearranging work to fit the fast rhythm of the assembly line. GM engineers are particularly proud of their organizational skills. One of their main ambitions at Lordstown was to use "computer technology" to make each employee's job "easier to perform in a more precise way." It is cheaper to increase the precision and speed of production work than to replace workers with speedy robots: much of the machinery used in the automation of production replaces inspectors and supervisors rather than unskilled workers.

PRECISE work, for auto engineers, usually means increased work. There is more work to be done in each minute or second. This increase in what the UAW-GM contract calls the "work content" of the "job" has been a major issue at Lordstown. Some workers say that they have to run along the assembly line to keep up with their assigned work. As the president of the local union describes it, "That's the fastest line in the world. A guy has about forty seconds to do his job. The company does some figuring and they say, 'Look, we only added one thing to his job.' On paper it looks like he's got time. But you've got forty seconds to work with. You add one more thing and it can kill you."

IV

THE PRESENT disturbances at Lordstown became acute last October, when managers from the famously tough General Motors Assembly Division took charge of the factories. In September, workers at the body plant went out on a wildcat strike. From October the struggles between management and workers became harsher and more frequent. Five thousand grievances have been registered by union members since GMAD arrived. The new managers laid off 300 workers, reorganized production schedules, and introduced additional disciplinary sanctions. According to one Lordstown worker, "There's never been a plant that beat GMAD, but this plant is sure as hell going to try."

GMAD's reputation among GM employees is one of ruthless aggression. For Central management, GMAD is one of the corporation's most promising divisions.

At Lordstown, GMAD's reorganization of production involved the assigning of extra tasks, and extra penalties for failure to perform these tasks. Workers complained of disciplinary lay-offs and of increased severity from foremen. The new plant manager has said that "there are increases in the amount of work some are doing, but in these cases it is overdue." He implies that his team of production analysts has discovered tricks of cost-efficiency which even the Lordstown computers failed to imagine: "This plant, like any other new facility, was overstaffed at the start."

An intensification of discipline, as performed at Lordstown by GMAD, is the characteristic last stage in company projects to increase automotive productivity. Some workers are replaced by machines; the jobs of the remaining workers are regulated by different machines; management engineers are brought in to protect the rate of profit on the company's capital investment. As the machines acquired become more expensive, managers become more determined to prevent the "waste" of time, cash, machinery, or non-productive moments. One of the most praised innovations at Lordstown was an electrostatically controlled vat, where Vegas could be immersed in paint. When GMAD arrived at the factory, the new management complained that paint was being wasted, because it "would lie in crevices as the body left the vat." GMAD's complaint about Lordstown production jobs is that expensive seconds are being wasted, in the crevices of the working day.

"The Lordstown innovations are based on the same methods of increasing productivity that GM and its competitors use in other auto factories, methods which follow from the earliest techniques of mass production."

V

BEFORE the present disturbances, GM was reluctant to discuss the state of labor relations at Lordstown. The company's most serious attempt to communicate with Lordstown workers apparently consisted of decking the factory with signs in foreign languages: an appropriately cost-conscious way to invoke the menace of German and Japanese competition. Mechanics in charge of maintenance for the Unimate robots were also urged to "think of themselves as doctors."

CORPORATE spokesmen insist that worker discontent, at Lordstown and elsewhere, has no connection with the nature of assembly line work. The most lucid of all GM executives has been Joseph E. Godfrey, the head of GMAD. The week GMAD took over at Lordstown Godfrey was asked by Automotive News for his views on the "monotony of mass production":

Monotony (Godfrey answered) is not quite the right word. There is a great deal of misunderstanding about that, but it seems to me that we have our biggest problems when we disturb that "Monotony." The workers may complain about monotony, but years spent in the factories leads me to believe that they like to do their jobs automatically. If you interject new things, you spoil the rhythm of the job, and work gets fouled up.

THE COMPANY executives must know that the connection between labour unrest and intense, repetitive work has been documented exhaustively. Modern auto corporations increase the productivity of their operations by an advanced application of Fordist production principles: their attitude to worker "job satisfaction" has scarcely changed since the 1920's, when Henry Ford described the cheery contentment of one of his employees, a man who "all day long did little but step on a treadle release." Joseph Godfrey of GMAD, for example says that "there are some guys who don't like the assembly line jobs. but then some of them don't like any job anywhere." According to Automative News, Godfrey suggested that the assembly line job is one of the best jobs in the industry and the auto industry compares favourably with other industries.

Meanwhile, the major sociological study of working conditions in the auto industry has found that auto workers quit their jobs twice as often as the average for US industry and that the rate of quitting is twice as high among people working directly on an assembly line as among other auto workers.

If you listen to what management says in Detroit, you might think there are no rational alternatives to the standard US auto assembly line. This is not true. In Sweden, Volvo subsidized a study of the peculiar muscle fatigue caused by repetitive work. The results were so striking that Volvo began to move its workers around from one job to another; it is now attempting to phase the assembly line out of its auto production.

THE CONTEMPORARY US auto corporations continue to concentrate their efforts on selling large passenger cars, while the auto market languishes at about double its 1929 level; they continue to speed up their assembly lines as men and machines become harder and harder to reorganize. Fordist industrial engineering is increasingly troublesome for the auto business, but its future seems assured: there will be more cars, more productivity, more inspections, more speed-ups, more layoffs, more Lordstowns.

Women's Waterpolo: On The Way Up

Have you ever seen a Waterpolo game? If you haven't you don't realize how rough and exhausting it is. If you have you will wonder that it is becoming a women's sport. As with soccer, waterpolo has been labelled a man's game in North America. Times are changing.....

Dr. Richardson, National President of the Canadian Waterpolo Association, revealed some of his thoughts in a discussion of women's waterpolo in Canada. His enthusiasm on the subject is obvious, and he is hopeful that waterpolo will be sanctioned for O.W.I.A.A. competition next year. Only four teams are required for a league, and there is a possibility of eight teams from O.W.I.A.A. schools. Outside the universities women's waterpolo is gaining more rapid acceptance. Pools in most major Canadian cities have teams, and Ottawa has a highly competitive high school league.

Dr. Richardson hopes to see women's waterpolo develop along two lines--one academic and the other outside academic circles. The academic branch would include both high school and university teams. The pool teams would grow as an arm of the Canadian Waterpolo Association, hopefully with a woman Vice President in charge. There is no International level competition in waterpolo as yet, but Dr. Richardson feels that this may well change in a few years.

Competition is developing at the National level because of the interest of the teams in gaining good competition. March 25 and 26 eleven teams; two from Nova Scotia, one from Montreal, and the rest from major Ontario cities; met at Queen's for the Women's Waterpolo Championships. Pinecrest, a heavily favoured team from Ottawa, emerged as the winner of the tournament after defeating the London Hammerheads 15-3. The Hammerheads then played the Hamilton team to determine the Consolation winner in the double elimination meet, losing this match 8-3 to end in third place. The Queen's team did not fare very well in the competition -- losing all of their games after an initial bye into the championship round.

All of the teams were enthusiastic about the meet and another is planned next year. Two teams unable to attend this year, Regina and St. John's, will probably come for that meet, helping to make it a Nationwide competition.

Paul Doktor - A Superb Violinist

by Ian Findlay

The Dunning Hall series was brought to a brilliant conclusion on Monday night with the appearance of Paul Doktor, violist. The recital opened with Schubert's "Arpeggione" Sonata in A minor. This work is well suited to the viola, although it has also been known as a vehicle for cellists and bassists. Doktor played with fluidity of phrasing and managed to capture the flavour of Schubert's style without exaggeration or distortion.

A transcription from Hindemith's "Nobilissima Visione" followed, and met with the same amount of success as the Schubert: the melodic warmth that Doktor generated in this piece was characteristic of his playing as a whole. Incidentally, this piece was arranged by Hindemith himself for viola, which is in itself an indication of the esteem which he had for the viola.

The first half of the recital was brought to a conclusion by a performance of a sonata by Ross Lee Finney. The work itself did not strike me as being very memorable, but that is no reflection on Doktor's performance, which was committed throughout. More interesting was the piece which opened the second half of the program-Erik Satie's "Sports et Divertissements". This was a collection of piano solos, to which Satie added verbal commentary. Doktor played the commentary, with great charm, and made Satie's musical impression painting easier to understand. Anita Gordon, whose playing of the accompaniment to Doktor was superb throughout the evening, had an opportunity to show her own superlative artistry as a soloist in these delightful pieces.

The end of the set program was Brahms Sonata No. 2 in E flat major, Opus 120. Doktor was genuinely at home in this music, since it demonstrated the unique tone colour of the viola as well as being a fine example of Brahms sonata writing. Doktor played always with the sweep of the phrase in mind, so that the listener was never aware of the technical difficulties in the writing. The blend of piano and viola was exceptional - there was obviously a close rapport between the two instrumentalists. The audience responded so enthusiastically that Doktor returned to the stage for two encores-a pair of contredances by Beethoven, and an Adagio by Tartini. The performances of both were exquisitely poised, and were just one more example of the mature achievement of a superb artist.

Last Words From W.I.C.

The annual W.I.C. banquet, held last Sunday, marked the end of women's intramurals for this year. A larger than usual crowd partook of a delicious buffet dinner (proof that Ban Righ can serve a good meal) and witnessed the presentation of awards.

The faculties which had won events were awarded plaques: Law (Basketball), Arts 73 (Swimathon and Speed Swimming), and P.H.E. (Co-ed Volleyball, Indoor softball, Volleyball, and Jogathon). Phys. Ed also won the W.I.C. trophy for accumulating the greatest number of points over the year.

Cathie Black and Helen Walko were the only ones winning individual participation awards.

Special thanks were given to outgoing W.I.C. chair-woman Cathie Black and to Intramural Director Donna Newton. W.I.C. also wishes to thank all those who participated in this year's programs, and looks forward to seeing everyone out again next year.

Tenure:

who does it protect from what... and how well?

By Kay Millington

Tenure. A very touchy subject here at Queen's or indeed at any other university. It is THE upcoming problem discussed in university circles. It's merits and faults are subject to many points of view, expressed by both faculty and students. Only one thing seems certain about tenure: no one really know what to do about it.

What is tenure? It is the guarantee of permanent appointment (so rare in most employment situations!) that is granted to those members of faculty who, after a prescribed period, have proven themselves worthy of such appointment. A person with tenure can lose his or her job only upon retirement, or "for cause." Tenure is clearly a prized and much sought-after goal.

Since the days of Socrates, tenure has fulfilled a very important social role in that it protects academic freedom of thought, a freedom so crucial to the existence of the academic community as an institution fostering awareness and change in the prevailing society through frank discussion. A tenured professor may write or speak on any subject as he sees fit, without fear of dismissal. In this way he is immune to any punishment arising from such actions. Tenure embodies an academic's dream -- freedom to openly criticize any part of society or its institutions without loss of position as a possible reprimand. But how many actually use this exceptional prerogative? Their numbers seem to have dwindled to the point of negligibility. (As an example of this, the faculty here at Queen's was generally reluctant to use their right to freedom of expression to openly discuss this topic.)

Ideally, this system of tenure allows the academics to conduct their research and express themselves honestly in full knowledge of their employment security. It is meant to attract top personnel and encourage young graduate students to continue to upgrade the quality of their work. It provides substantial encouragement for completely creative endeavour, in the form of a conducive atomsphere and financial support. Tenure is also often granted to those who at the time do not hold their graduate degrees but are working towards them, as incentive and proof of faith in the work being done.

However, it is easy to see that the ideal does not always work out in practice.

Critics of tenure are quick to point out the fact that, although tenure was designed primarily to protect academic freedom, it also makes an excellent cover for academic sloth. Since the tenured professor is no longer accountable for his work habits to anyone, what is to stop him from slacking off? He may be a paragon of diligence when his tenure is granted, but what assurance is there that his habits and attitude will not change over the next 20 or 30 years? Who is to say whether he will continue to take an avid interest in his studies or teachings? It is quite impossible for a tenure committee to be able to judge character so well that they can foretell the future disposition of a tenure candidate.

This criticism could be summed up by saying that those who should have tenure don't need it, and those who want it should not have it.

A special problem arises now because of the levelling off of universities' growth, as noted in the Report of the Development Sub-Committee on Development of the Faculty of Arts and Science, 1972-77. The report suggests that "we need to examine ways in which a Faculty of relatively steady size composed of a large proportion of tenured academic staff" (about 70 per cent of faculty at Queen's is tenured) "with a rising median age can be encouraged to remain physically and mentally active, intellectually flexible, receptive to new ideas and in touch with current trends outside the university."

The main criticism, then, seems to be that tenure hides incompetents, that those who should have tenure don't need it and those who want it should not have it.

Added to this is the fact that there is currently a glut of professors on the academic market place. More and more graduates have recently poured out of Canada's grad schools, only to find that, now, with university growth lessening, with universities like Queen's having such a high percentage of tenured positions, that there are few places open for them. This makes reconsideration of the question of alternatives to tenure an important question if most of these grads are to find jobs

An interesting new angle has been added to all the above basic discussion of tenure by a recent decision at Queen's that is a direct result of the current financial squeeze. Beginning with the academic year 1972-73, all new appointments will be terms appointments, appointments for a given period which may be renewable, but which will not lead to consideration for tenure.

There are many problems seen in this method of appointment. Whether or not Queen's would be able to continue to attract new, young faculty members, so necessary to an innovative atmosphere within a department, when other universities will continue to offer them probationary appointments possibly leading to tenure, is questionable.

There are also other problems, which are also involved with a system of longterm contracts, which has often been suggested as an alternative to tenure. One problem relates to academic freedom: how willing would a professor be to rock the boat, when his contract is subject to renewal or possible cancellation within a few years? (This problem exists now for probationary staff, but ends once they are tenured.) Many faculty members also worry that, with a system of longterm, renewable contracts, it is likely that appointment and renewal decisions would have to be made by the administration, rather than by faculty, which they feel could seriously effect academic quality which they believe is now maintained by having a person's academic colleagues judge his ability and suitability for tenure.

Another question relating to tenure which frequently comes up is who makes decisions on tenure. The Canadian Association of University Teachers has recently ruled that every department in every university should have a tenure committee and that each committee should seat both tenured and untenured members of staff in their deliberations. However, since this is merely a recommendation, it is not surprising to find that, according to J. W. Grove, head of the Senate Committee on Appointment, Tenure, Promotion and Leave, the majority of departments at Queen's probably do not have tenure committees, let alone committees with untenured people on them. Grove noted that the Statement on Academic Freedom and Tenure, which governs these matters, merely says that the head of a department, after consulting with a representative group of students and faculty, will make a recommendation to the Dean of the faculty as to whether or not he believes a candidate should be granted tenure. Students are often consulted at Queen's, but the situation here is quite different from that of the University of Windsor, where it is mandatory that at least one student sit on all tenure committees.

Finally, there is one aspect of the question of tenure which is often overlooked, and that is who tenure does not protect. Fulltimes lectureres and instructors, and all parttime lecturers and instructors, though they may be hired by a university year after year and play a regular and important role in teaching, are not eligible for tenure, and thus are assured of no protection from arbitrary actions, like firing or not being rehired, on the part of the university. In light of this, a recommendation has been made at the University of British Columbia by the Women's Action Group (since the vast majority of these low ranking staff are women) that "tenure be granted to both fulltime instructors and parttime lecturers on the grounds of excellence in teaching lower division courses and younger students."

What is to be done? No one seems sure of what will happen to tenure, but there are indications of change, here as at most universities. Certainly, it is not likely that tenure will long continue, at least not as we know it. Prof. Grove, for instance, in commenting on the current revisions his Senate committee is making in the Statement on Academic Freedom and Tenure relating to tenure appeals, noted that the committee is "trying to tidy up a procedure which is probably on the way out."

Any new system, however, must do certain things. It must cope with the growing educational bureaucracy, threatened in the Wright Commission Report, in such a way as to ensure that freedom to carry out research and of expression will not be lost. It must institutionalize a system of automatic review of appointment based on regular appraisal of services, and yet it must somehow safeguard the academic from overzealous administrators. There must also be provision made for the many young Canadians who are yearly coming onto the academic job market, often more highly qualified than last year's crop. At the University of Toronto, for instance, there will be 150 graduates from graduate school. Had they saved all the current openings, plus all those anticipated for the next two years, the administration could not have employed them all. A new set of hiring priorities will have to be established to accommodate these people.

Although tenure, then, or its replacement, is a subject of much current discussion and certainly, of much importance, and although Queen's has now embarked on a new type of appointment system, which ends, at least for the moment, the possibility of adding further tenured staff (and thus, of the possibility of carrying out recommendation 40 of the Report of the Wright Commission, of which Principal Deutsch is a member, which says that "By 1976, universities in Ontario should achieve a percentage of women holding tenured positions at least equal to the percentage of women holding non-tenured positions in 1971"), the Senate Committee on Appointments, Promotion, Tenure and Leave has not yet even considered the question of what to do with tenure, and no other university body here seems involved in such a study either. Surely it is past time that such consideration was given.

Graduate fees go up to $900

Graduate students will be poorer next year as a result of financial policies announced in last week's Ontario budget.

Students who are at school for the summer semester -- which means virtually all post-graduates -- will pay a tuition fee for that semester equal to half the winter fee.

And the winter fee itself has been raised, from $485 to $585. Adding the summer semester fee of $292.50, a grad student will find himself paying tuition fees of $877.50 per twelve-month year. Adding incidental fees, the cost of education will be almost a thousand dollars each year.

This assumes what is almost certain, but has not been confirmed as yet: that Queen's will pass on to its students the increase in provincial "formula fee" which provincial treasurer Darcy McKeough has announced.

A letter from George Kerr, minister of colleges and universities, told Queen's principal, Dr. John J. Deutsch last week that "The formula fee for all graduate programmes will be $292.50 per term. The regulation concerning a free third term consecutively attended is no longer operative."

Graduate Student Society president Doug Pritchard, quoting that letter to The Journal on Sunday, said it means the government is deducting that much from the estimated cost of educating a graduate student, and paying Queen's the difference.

This year the amount deducted was $485 for twelve months.

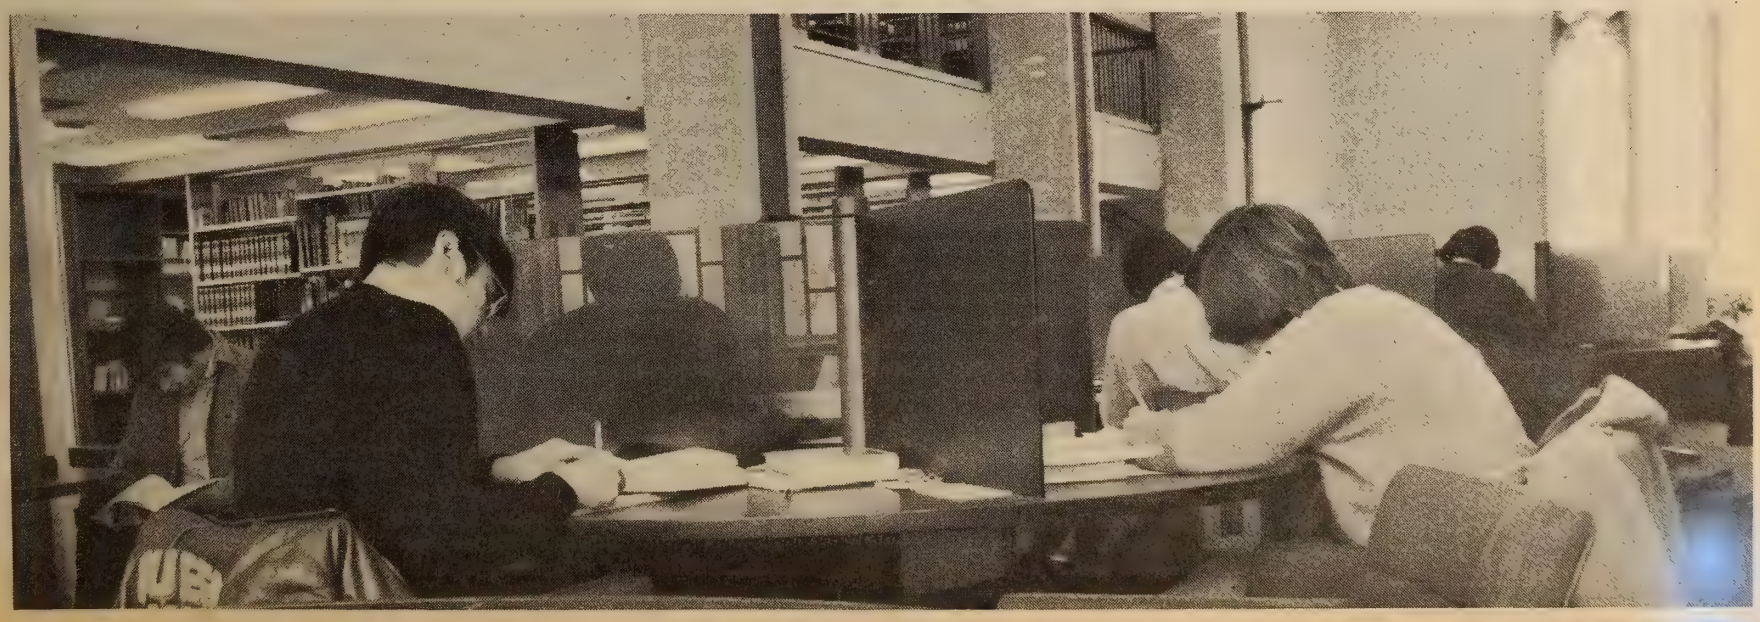
Queen's has the right to charge grad students less than that fee, if it can find other sources of income to make up the total needed.

Pritchard said he had no indication from the Queen's administration of what they would do, but added that Deutsch is attending a session of the Council of Ontario Universities today (Tuesday) to discuss the recent increases in formula fees. (Undergraduate formula fees will be $585 next year, also up from $485).

Pritchard also said that by 1973-74, students who have finished their period of residency will have to pay the same fee as students who are still on campus full-time. This year they have a reduced fee of $50 per term.

The tuition increase, plus new tax laws under which scholarships and grants are taxable income, will take a big bite out of graduate students' income, Pritchard said.

An unmarried graduate student with an average income of $3200 per year from grants and teaching assistantship will lose 20 per cent of that money in taxes, fee increases, Canada Pension Plan payments and health insurance premiums, Pritchard said.



The same is true of a grad student with a working wife, though he would be in a better position to absorb the loss, Pritchard said.

He added that a grad with a non-working wife loses about 10 per cent of his income in recent increases, based on a 3 per cent increase in the cost of living. The subsistence income for a student in that position is about $4,700, he added.

A single grad, with a subsistence level of about $3,300, might be able to mange, Pritchard said. The subsistence level of $5,300 for a student with a working wife should also be accessible, he added.

But Pritchard said a student with a non-working wife cannot possibly make ends meet.

Pritchard said those figures, compiled by the Graduate Student Society, will go to Toronto with Deutsch this week.

SUMMER'S COMING...
Where will you be? List it in the Summer Who's Where

Who's Where in the Summer will list the addresses of Queen's students staying in Kingston. Fill out a card at Douglas Library, Victoria Hall desk, Gordon-Brockington desk, or the AMS Office between now and April 29.

If you will be somewhere outside Kingston, but not at your permanent address as listed in the winter Who's Where, you can have that address listed in the same way.

Who's Where in the Summer will be distributed free in mid-May.

LEAVING?
Get your Journal by mail

The Queen's Journal will be publishing through the summer this year, for the first time ever. Students who will be away from campus may receive copies regularly by mail, at a cost of $1 for the full summer.

We don't know yet how many issues there will be: maybe once a month, on the average, maybe as often as once a week. But you can get them all, mailed as soon as they appear on campus.

Send your dollar now -- with your name, summer mailing address, and student number -- to Summer Mailings, The Queen's Journal, Students' Memorial Union, by campus or regular mail.

Mailing addresses and dollars will only be accepted in this way; please do not bring them to the Journal office.

Don't forget Tricolor

If you won't be back in the fall, have your copy of Tricolor 72 mailed to you in September. Mailing labels are just $1 at the AMS office in the Union.

If you're going to be back in the fall, save your pink student card. You'll need it to pick up your Tricolor if you haven't paid to have it mailed.

FACULTY MEMBERS

Students of Queen's each pay $3 every year for their copies of The Queen's Journal. This student subsidy makes up roughly half the Journal's budget. None of The Journal's money comes from Queen's University (except for a few advertisements).

We welcome faculty readers, but we would like to remind them that they have made no contribution to the costs of the paper. During the summer, when faculty make up a higher percentage of our readers, we invite them to share the costs of producing the newspaper.

Is $3 too much for a clear conscience and a year of participation in The Journal?

Cheques may be sent to The Queen's Journal, Students' Memorial Union, Queen's.

Bitter Grounds and pub reach compromise at AMS meeting

Conflict between Bitter Grounds coffee-house and the House of Commons pub was the highlight of last week's AMS outer council meeting, held in Grant Hall, which speaker Graham Millington described without exaggeration as "acoustically the most dismal structure in Kingston".

While members strained to hear, pub representative Reg Rickaby asked the council to authorize pub operation on Friday and Saturday evenings next fall. This would mean finding a new home for Bitter Grounds, he said, since the Grounds uses the House of Commons premises on those nights.

A grounds representative urged the council to let the coffee-house stay on the second floor of the Union. No other location on campus is possible, he said.

"We're not out to screw Bitter Grounds," AMS president (and former pub manager) Greg LeBlanc assured him. He then urged council to give the pub permission to expand.

Senior meds rep Andy Pipe and artsci president Ted Cape spoke in favour of the Grounds. "There is no other place on this campus for the kind of entertainment that Bitter Grounds is providing on the weekends," Pipe said.

He added that folk-singers such as the Grounds offers appeal especially to senior and graduate students.

The council accepted a condition suggested by education commissioner Ross Dunsmore: that the pub be given use of its premises for Fridays and Saturdays only if a suitable room for Bitter Grounds can be found elsewhere.

A procedural argument followed, in which Millington briefly lost control of the meeting, despite his statement at its beginning that he would keep order, with the aid of Bourinot's procedural rules, "even if I have to throw Bourinot at somebody".

Discussion of the question was postponed while pub and Grounds members caucused in the hallway; late in the meeting they presented a compromise, quickly seized on, by which two representatives of each, with the AMS chief justice as arbitrator, would settle the question.

In other actions Wednesday, the outer council made the following decisions – despite Millington's observation at one point: "I would certainly challenge your statement that the AMS is here to make decisions."

It made former president Patrick Riley an honorary life member of the AMS. This honour is in the constitution, but has not been given for a number of years, if ever, and was seen as a solution to the criticism which has been forthcoming since Riley failed to receive a Tricolor Award last month.

It elected R. L. Dunsmore, a retired Kingstonian who is chairman of the university's campus planning committee, to the honorary presidency of the AMS.

It made artsci rep Hildi Adelhelm acting education commissioner for the summer. The other four commissioners all will be in Kingston.

It approved a handful of appointments, including that of Jennifer Grass as editor of The Queen's Journal.

It agreed to pledge 15 cents per student to the Ontario Federation of Students and send a third of that sum to Toronto at once.

It agreed to join the National Entertainment Conference, a syndicate of bodies which sponsor concerts and exchange information and experience.

It agreed to give $1000 to Job Bank, an agency which will operate until mid-summer finding jobs for Queen's students and others in Kingston. Job Bank will have support from Career Planning and Placement and is taking over its files on summer jobs and applicants.

It adopted, without debate, a $15,975 budget for summer operations, including summer conferences, staff salaries, clubs, reprinting the AMS constitution, Homecoming operations, AMS orientation, fall education programmes and other expenses.

Boutique saved despite $10,000 loss

Heffalump, the Princess Street boutique that has lost almost $10,000 of student money in seven months, will continue to operate this summer in hopes of regaining at least some of that amount.

University's meeting of the outer council of the AMS, which owns Heffalump, gave it a reprieve until fall, when there will be a detailed study of whether the boutique can continue to exist. The council set a limit of $12,000 on total losses by Heffalump before that time.

AMS vice-president Wally Palmer presented a statement to the meeting showing that Heffalump owes the AMS account $9500, and that the AMS is responsible for a further $214 in overdraft on the Heffalump account. When Heffalump was opened in August 1971, a $6000 loan was expected to get it going, he said. But $4500 more has been lent, and only $1000 repaid.

Council members indicated they were not satisfied with the revenue and expense statement presented by Heffalump manager Jane Corkin. Miss Corkin's statement showed sales (to February 29) as $13,372, but epxenditures for stock were only $5002.

Faced with those statements, and with a written plea from Miss Corkin that the store be kept open, the council debated three major alternatives: closing the store at once, keeping it open for a short trial period, and keeping it open for two years or longer to let it prove itself over time.

"It's a lot of money to be spending on one function," Palmer said, and suggested that the council should decide whether the AMS should be running a business at all. Arts and science president Ted Cape echoed this, saying the AMS should plan its ventures better before spending so much.

Miss Corkin said there might be buyers if the AMS wanted to sell the store now, but added that the price would probably be $5000 at most, leaving the AMS with at least a $5000 loss on Heffalump.

She said Heffalump should not need more funds to keep operating; "the summer will get us going." But a few minutes later she was asked what conditions were necessary to run the store over the summer, and suggested a loss ceiling of $15,000.

Senior meds representative Andy Pipe criticized Miss Corkin for vagueness and lack of information.

Her written statement said the Heffalump was set up to provide jobs for students both working in the store and making the crafts it sells; to improve relations with Kingstonians; but not to make money.

She also said the AMS should set up a buffer body, such as the proposed Queen's Student Agencies, to mediate between the outer council and such services as Heffalump.

The council, after long debate, voted to take her advice and keep the store open until it can be evaluated in the fall. The summer is the best season for Kingston business, next to Christmas, Miss Corkin explained.

Go ahead likely for health complex

Queen's and the other institutions responsible for Kingston's proposed health sciences complex have decided how it will be run, and have had assurances the government will soon approve its $106 million construction budget.

That good news was announced last week by Harvey L. Millman, chairman of the board of governors of Kingston General Hospital, which next to Queen's is the major body involved in planning the complex.

A letter last week from the chairman of the Ontario Hospital Services Commission said the Kingston plans will have "top priority" consideration by the province.

Millman also said everyone involved has agreed that the complex will be managed by a new board with four representatives from Queen's, three from KGH, three from Hotel Dieu Hospital, and two each from Kingston Psychiatric Hospital, St. Mary's of the Lake Hospital, and St. Lawrence College of Applied Arts and Technology.

Building of the complex will come in three stages, with the first one, costing about $15 million, scheduled to be completed by 1975.

That phase will consist of facilities shared by KGH and Queen's, in the area now occupied by KGH and surrounding buildings. These will include an outpatient clinic, life sciences and animal care buildings, and a $3.5 million rehabilitation centre.

Later building will include redevelopment of the hospital itself, at a total cost of $31 million. A new health sciences library and other facilities are also included in this phase, which is to be finished about 1978.

Later buildings, and construction at other sites including Hotel Dieu Hospital, account for the rest of the health science complex's budget.

The first step, for which digging is already beginning, is a parking garage beneath Queen's lower campus. Millman said last week that the 600-space garage, at a cost of about $2 million, is absolutely necessary to the project.

"It is of utmost importance that this project begin almost immediately," he said.

The parking garage will be paid for through fees charged for parking spaces, he said, since the government will not pay for parking lots.

QUAFHOP -- Queen's University and Affiliated Hospitals -- has asked the city of Kingston for tax exemption on the garage.

Describing long-term planning for the complex, Millman said the community will be required to provide $8 million of its cost. (The rest is to come from the Ontario government.)

A community fund drive is to raise $2.5 million; Queen's and the hospitals will contribute almost $2 million in cash; and the rest is to come from land and buildings already owned by member institutions.

Response to the Kingston proposals from the provincial government is expected within a few weeks.

Indian autonomy stressed

The basic problem facing the Canadian Indian is one of autonomy, both cultural and political. This was the topic of a panel discussion entitled "Citizen Plus: Native Rights in Canada" held Wednesday night.

The discussion was sponsored jointly by the Queeen's Law Society and the Indian Eskimo Association of Canada.

Peter Cumming, co-author of a revised volume of "Native Rights in Canada" said that the aboriginal rights of Indian, Eskimo and Metis peoples have been recognized in both British and Canadian law "right up until the present federal government."

Hunting and fishing rights were revoked with the passing of the Migratory Birds Convention Act in 1970, he said.

Two parliamentary bills were subsequently introduced in the House of Commons, to change this, but "both of them died, so nothing has been done," Cumming added.

He then pointed out that "to deny an Indian his rights is to deny his self-identity -- his Indian-ness and therefore the denial becomes a point of friction."

The meeting was also addressed by David Diamond, a student at McGill University and Charles Hill, a Student at Queen's.

Diamond told of the flooding of a large tract of land in the James Bay area, by Hydro Quebec, without consultation with the Cree community.

Native peoples have been moved out -- one band was split in half and another was relocated, he added.

Diamond recently took part in a demonstration march in Montreal, as part of his campaign to get a better deal for his people in the north.

Charles Hill, a Mohawk from the Six Nations Reserve near Brantford opted for due legal process as a means of gaining native rights.

"The Indian people want autonomy, a choice in what happens to them," he said and charged successive Canadian governments with holding to a policy of "non-consultation for hundreds of years."

Hill went on to talk of the forced integration in the educational system. There is no "Indian content" and his people are forbidden to speak in their native dialect, for fear of corporal punishment.

The Indians on the St. Regis Reservation, face a different problem, Ernest Benedict, a lecturer in Indian Studies at Trent University told the meeting. The reservation is located on the St. Lawrence and has to cope with the federal laws of two countries, Canada and the United States, in addition to the provincial laws of Ontario and Quebec.

Brazilian to speak

The former president of the Brazilian National Student Union, Jean-Marc van der Weid, will be talking here Wednesday April 5th, 8:00 p.m. in the small 2nd floor Common Room in the Union.

The Brazilian Student Union has been outlawed by the Brazilian Regime and van der Weid imprisioned. He was released as one of the 70 political prisioners who were exchanged for the kidnapped Swiss ambassador. Since then he has been travelling in order to inform people of the situation in Brazil.

van der Weid's visit to Queen's is sponsored by the Student Christian Movement.

Queen's women are getting together

By Leslie Diane Kaye

A subtle dig at women (students?) is the dichotomy between the need for a Dean of STUDENTS, and a Dean of WOMEN. the implication is that there are students here, and then there are women. Why not two Deans of Students, one who happens to be female, and the other male, and both available to all students?

On Tuesday, April 4, there will be a meeting in the small common room of the Students' Union to discuss attitudes of about women at Queen's. Women who are here in all capacities -- academic staff, clerical workers, janitorial staff, administrators, students, etc. -- are invited.

The basic aim of the meeting following Dr. Dorothy Smith speaking on "Women's Role and its Two Alienations" is to compare notes, so to speak, on the individual treatment women have received here.

A subtle discrimination can be practiced without the perpetrators (both female, who often are the worst offenders, and male) seeing that they are being sexist. Others are more deliberate. They have accepted the definition of "female" that has been subscribed to, in this culture, without questioning its basic, often false, assumptions, and have not changed to meet the new perception of woman as human being. This type of attitude can be manifested in many ways:

a) Do you get equal pay for equal work?

b) As a student, are you counselled out of "male" fields?

c) Do you believe your faculty has a quota on women students? women professors?

d) As a secretary, are you expected to do little, extra, housewifey things that are not part of your job, e.g., coffee-getting, whether you have time for that or not?

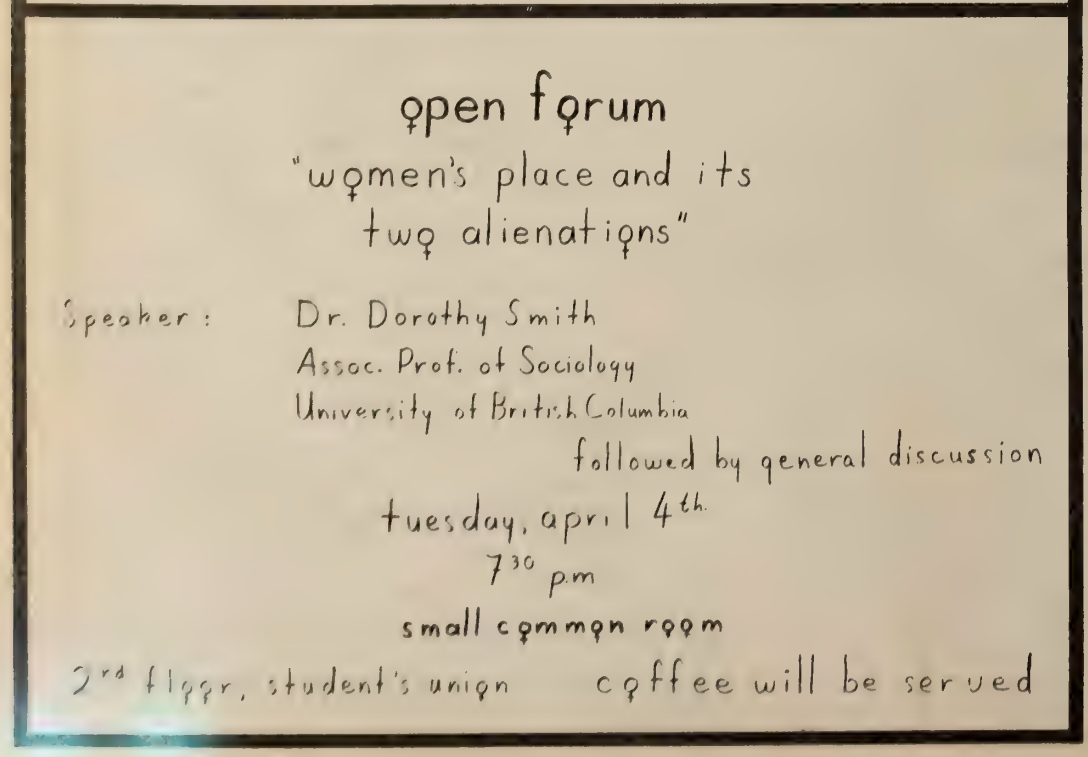
e) Have you heard the statement made by a male professor here that a woman's Ph.D. has about as much worth as a B. Sc., so she should be prepared to do the lesser-status jobs the B.Sc.-ranked staff do?

f) Is there a subtle indication that the things you say are not really meaningful? For instance, when you make a statement, does a male restate what you said (to legitimize it, perhaps?) before he will respond to your statement?

g) Are you aware of discrimination against other women even if you are not treated badly?

Queen's has a reputation as being a conservatinve university, and also the most sexiat, according to the Women's Civil Rights group associated with the Canadian Association of University Teachers. There are statistics (please see the table) which, in relation to the national averages, would indicate that such a sexist tendency does exist.

A university is supposed to have a liberalizing effect on one's perceptions. In relation to the liberal concept of the university, the sexism practiced here is even less justifiable than that in a non-university setting. The intellectuals(?) and scholars here are supposed to be the more intelligent members of this society. They are supposed to have access to knowledge about the real world, and to see world problems in a clear, rational way. Or at least be critical of dysfunctional social attitudes. (Sexual discrimination is a dysfunctional attitude for slightly more than half the world's population.) They are supposed to be liberals, in the good sense of the word - "characterized by or inclining toward opinions or policies favouring progress or reform."



Unfortunately, the universities of this country have not seen fit to be in the vanguard of social change, and Queen's is managing to keep to the rear quite well.

Discrimination:

If you happen to be a female student here, and you suffer from dysmenorrhea (painful menstruation), you may meet the same doctor at Student Health Service that I did last year -- the one who dispensed the age-old advice: "You'll be just fine after your first child." If you protest, as I did, that you might go into law or graduate studies or some other programme which means you will not be having children for quite some time, you might just get that other bit of age-old advice: "Women should stay home and have babies. Then you'll be fine." If you sit there and glare, as I did, he'll get a little nervous and ask if you're one of those women's lib types.

This is obsolete "advice" from a man supposedly SERVING the student population. He seems to have forgotten that about one third of this population is female, that females do not necessarily have to stay in the home nor do they necessarily want to have children. children.

There are a lot more ways you can get put down as a woman. The meeting next Tuesday will examine these put-downs in the wider context of general attitudes, and its organizer hopes to develop more ideas of what we can do to combat them.

An overview of w

by Bill Johnston

About the only prominent places where you will regularly find women on this campus are in the office of the dean of women or of nursing, the office of the principal's executive assistant, the cover page of the Journal and in Golden Words' co-ed of the week. In the faculty, in administrative positions, in grad school and as students in most faculties outside of Arts and Science, women are conspicuous for their scarcity.

Surely this is an exaggeration, you say. After all, is it not true that fully 39.2 per cent of Queen's undergraduates are women, while the national average is only 35.8 per cent? True. But that is almost the only level at which the percentage of women is higher at Queen's than for all the universities in Canada.

Take grad school, for instance. Wherever that 39.2 per cent of students who are women goes after graduating from Queen's, it does not seem to be into our grad school. Only 161 women are enrolled in graduate studies, on a fulltime basis, making up only 16.3 per cent of all fulltime grad students. The national level is 20.5 per cent.

At the Ph.D. level, 13.7 per cent of those enrolled fulltime at Queen's are women. Across the nation, this figure is 15.9 per cent. Over the past four years, Queen's has graduated 78 Ph.-D.'s: three of them were women.

WERE WOMEN.

(It should be noted that there is a built-in possibility of a bias in these comparisons, since the national figures are for the academic year 1969-1970, as compiled by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, while the Queen's figures are for this academic year. It is not unlikely that female enrollment has risen nationally in these past two years, so Queen's quite possibly compares even less favourably than indicated here.)

While Queen's falls behind the nation in student male-female ratios, the position of women does not reach its worst until one looks at the faculty. The table at right breaks these numbers down by rank, and compares them with the figures for all the universities in Canada. As is clear from that table, there is a much higher concentration of women faculty members in the lowest ranks of lecturer and instructor here than at all the universities taken together, and a much lower concentration at the ranks of assistant, associate and full professor. Even with its large number of low-rank women, Queen's still has a significantly lower overall percentage of women on faculty than is the case for all universities.

What is particularly important is the number of women who are classed as "casual academics"; that is, most of those classified as instructors. Over seventy per cent of these staff members are women, and, unlike the men at this level who are predominantly graduate students or recent graduates who will soon be promoted, many of these women work for many years at this level, hired for only part of the year, year after year. Not only are those at this level paid comparatively low wages, but also, because they are not fulltime academics, they are not eligible for some of the employment benefits that tenured, probationary and even sessional academics can get. These include a pension plan (for those fulltime staff here more than one year), and an optional life insurance scheme, which includes disability insurance, which will look after an employee who cannot work.

Women are not only not likely to be found in the higher ranks of faculty, but they also tend to be missing from the decision making positions of the university. Only one of the ten faculty deans is a woman (in nursing.) Of the 31 department heads in Arts and Science, the seven department heads in engineering, or the 23 department heads in medicine, none are women. None of the directors of Queen's 11 centres and institutes is a woman. None of the five vice-principals is a woman. None of the assistant or associate deans is a woman. Of a total of 86 administrative staff members listed in the local phone directory, only five are women, and that includes the dean of women, her assistant and the dean of nursing.

On the governing academic body of the university, the Senate, there are only four women of a total of 61 positions. This is a mere 6.6 per cent of the total, which underrepresents both the proportion of women students and the proportion of women faculty members. (Three of those four women Senators are from the faculty of nursing.) It is also a lower proportion than the national average: 9.3 per cent of all members of university Senates in Canada are women.

The position of the women support staff- librarians, secretaries, etc.- at this university became a matter of public discussion last spring, when the union members of the ing down, and thus there will simply be fewer faculty positions available for men or women. The other factor, which relates to the possibility of increasing the number of tenured women faculty members, is that Queen's, starting next year, will be hiring no more probationary staff members, but will hire all new staff on term appointments which cannot lead to tenure consideration. Thus, even if a large percentage of all new appointments were women, these would not be permanent appointments and would not necessarily effect the long range proportion of women in faculty.

Prejudice must also be considered in assessing the chances of improvement of the status of women within faculty. It is widely characteristic of this society- and it is no less discrimination for being that- that in times of a shortage of jobs, the preference for hiring men, especially married men, over women increases. This could likely happen with the coming decrease in new university appointments.

There is also an indication, and it is only that, as well as a fairly widespread feeling among faculty women, that promotion of a woman to full professorship in most departments here is very unlikely and that appointment to department headship is impossible. There are no woman department heads, and promotion to the rank of full professor is an historical rarity. All three women holding that rank now were appointed directly to it, rather than being promoted into it. (All three were also hired primarily for something other than teaching; they were hired to be a dean, a librarian and the official historian of Queen's.)

A few other observations could be made. One is that a woman has to be more qualified than a man to get into this university at any level, whether student or faculty member. In the faculty of Arts and Science, for instance, a higher percentage of women than of men at the ranks of assistant, associate and full professor have their doctorate. Women students, to get into any faculty on this university, have had to have higher marks than men. The Report of the Admissions Committee of the University Council, using the findings of a survey conducted in September, 1970, reported the following figures on Grade 13 marks of Queen's students. 11.4 per cent of women, and 8.3 per cent of men had Grade 13 averages over 85 per cent. 20.4 per cent of women and 12.3 per cent of men had averages between 80 and 84. 21.6 per cent of women and 15.3 per cent of men had averages between 75 and 79. In total, then, 53.4 per cent of women and only 35.9 per cent of men had Grade 13 averages over 75. At the other end of the scale, only 1.9 per cent of women but 6.9 per cent of men had averages between 60 and 64. This apparent requirement that women have higher marks to gain admittance to Queen's applies to all faculties. There is only one faculty (medicine) in which the percentage of men who had Grade 13 averages higher than 75 per cent was over 50 per cent. There is no faculty in which less than half the women had over 75 per cent averages in Grade 13, and in medicine, 93.5 per cent of the women surpassed that average.

One final note, by way of an editorial comment: It might be claimed- it certainly has been in the past- that it is reasonable to require that women have higher qualifications in order to get into a university, or to get a position on faculty, or that it is reasonable to allow only a small number of women into medicine or law or graduate school, because women are more likely than men to not finish their courses (opting for marriage instead) and are more likely than men to leave their faculty position (for marriage or child bearing and rearing).

As was stated in a preliminary statement issued by the Public Service Commission of Canada (and contained in Sex and the Public Service by Kathleen Archibald): "Equal opportunity for all persons employed or applying for employment...means that decisions on both appointment and career development must be based on the qualifications or suitability of a particular individual and not on the basis of characteristics assumed, accurately or inaccurately, to be associated with a particular category of people. Thus, it is discriminatory to women to deny or limit their access to jobs in which length of tenure is important even though statistics might indicate that women have a higher turnover rate than men in these jobs. ... To make an assumption about the capability or lack of capability of a particular individual solely on the basis of group tendencies is prejudice; to act on that assumption is discrimination..... It should also be noted that discrimination on the basis of marital status is no more legitimate than discrimination on the basis of sex. The giving of preference to a married man over a better qualified woman is discriminatory."

Mary, Queen of Scots

by Paul Gompertz

This movie has all the Pride, pomp and circumstance of a vintage Hal Wallis production. He revels in the Historical Pageant, and it is only to be regretted that history was not farsighted enough to make all its monarchial intriques as compact and dramatic as those portrayed in 'Beckett'. In that movie, the action was hand to hand, and an almost claustrophobic intensity captured both action and audience. "Mary, Queen of Scots" however, faces the problem of dealing with two protagonists who met but twice, and then briefly, and it is a problem which the movie never really comes to terms with.

All the basic ingredients are present. The lavish costumes, beautiful castles and gardens and magnificent scenery, and the movie has a value for these things alone. But the action is slow moving, concerning as it does political intrigue, and disjointed, leaping from Scotland to England with apparent ease and blithe disregard for duration of time.

Moreover, the acting is surprisingly poor. Perhaps, it is unfair to compare Glenda Jackson's as Elizabeth with her television version; but the latter portrayal was much fuller. Vanessa Redgrave, (despite her Oscar nomination) seemed to consider the part a sinecure, and Ian Holm has apparently forgotten the power of his Prince Hal, and Malvolio which he demonstrated during his long reign as lead actor at THE Stratford.

Patrick McGoohan is still playing Danger Man though now with a Scottish accent, and it was left to Trevor Howard, Timothy Dalton and most noteably Nigel Davenport to carry off the acting honours.

The film does not require a critique; it has no pretentions to being anything other than entertainment. As such it succeeds, though it has a tendency to lose its audience in its web of intrigue. Things happen; very often, we are left in ignorance as to how they happen. But they always have an effect, and the movie concerns itself far more with effect then cause.

To sum up, it is slow-moving, and a little disjointed, but lavish and spectacular. I found it boring at times; but as movie entertainment goes, this is considerably better than much that Kingston has offered in the past year.

Mary, Queen of Scots is playing at the Hyland Theatre.

The Glass Menagerie Shattered

by Paul Gompertz

Tenessee Williams provided in his play a variety of devices all of which were intended to deflate the sugary sentimentality that is evident in much of it. This Theatre Five production chose to ignore these, and yet unintentionally managed to undercut this element with nonchalant ease. Had this been their intention; all would have been well, but as it was, the play degenerated into a debacle which had the audience of at least 40 people pinned to their seats in disbelief.

'Degenerated' is perhaps the wrong word, for it implies a steady down hill slide. This is hardly true in this case, for the play showed a consistency of mediocrity which defies analysis. From the dramatic moment at the beginning when a single spot came upstage left to bathe the telephone in light, while Tom Wingfield (the prologue) stood in darkness stage right, everything that could go wrong, did.

The lighting throughout assumed a mind of its own, and seemed to delight in spontaneous experimentation; and more than once was so far ahead of its cue that the players were caught between scenes. Once the lights came up to find Amanda (Diane Gordon) scrabbling desperately under the bed, trying to find her knitting, and once the same actress was revealed stumbling over the telephone trying to beat the lights to her exit.

Further ill-luck manifested itself in the total disappearance of the glass unicorn in the scene between Laura and Jim, which left Steven Ruddy to crawl around in desperation behind the bed. The longest and loudest applause of the evening to Amanda for her decision to take 'this candle into the kitchen' after her repeated attempts (unsuccessful) to secure it in the candle holder.

The actors had neither the range nor the power to accomodate the exacting and delicate demands of the play. Theresa Sears gave a very wooden performance as Laura, and her voice, which is so unsuited to acting, was made more unbearable by the impositions of accents. She had neither the delicacy nor awkwardness of Laura; her awkwardness was very much that of an uncomfortable actress. Diane Gordon as Amanda, exhibited more confidence, and misplaced though it may have been, it gave a certain grotesque life to her parody portrayal. At times she came near to the character: but always there was a blatancy in her portrayal which resulted in a burlesque performance.

Steven Ruddy as Jim O'Connor knew his lines, and lines they most obviously were. With the lights glinting resplendently off the myriad hair-pins used to keep his hair in place, he drifted around the stage with a self conscious brashness which was out of place. Again, it approximated to the demands of the character, but it was too broad, too monodynamic ever to come to life as a credible character.

David Switzer as Tom laboured manfully to save the day; had it not been for his performance the play would have disintegrated long before the end. He was far from brilliant; but his adequacy was a straw for the drowning audience to clutch at, and scenes which required his presence came nearer to acknowledging the dictates of verisimilitude which the play makes than any others.

This was an insane choice of play for the company, and they paid the inevitable price of such folly in full. The production was flaccid, shambling and flat. Michael Kronenwetter's direction was mundane and unimaginative, and looked painfully underrehearsed.

Straw Dogs

STRAW DOGS is the story of a young American professor who returns with his wife Amy to her home Village in Cornwall, England. There is a suggestion in the film that he is 'running away' and that this remote part of England is his last resort. Ultimately, when his wife has been raped and both his life and hers are threatened by the local inhabitants, he is forced to turn and fight.

It is a VERY compelling movie, if a very violent one, and has been rated by different critics, both in the 6 best films, and the 6 worst films of last year.

This discrepancy is a result of the need for a final value judgement, of a personal nature, and can be seen in the following reply of a film critic (who had referred to Sam Peckinpah's silly and abominable 'Straw Dogs' in her 6 worst films of the year) to someone who said they 'felt' Straw Dogs was a good movie.

Now, to STRAW DOGS. As you've obviously gathered loathed the film. I don't think it said anything particularly new or important about man's will to violence. But I think what really bothered me was how totally unconvincing I felt the characters to be. I did not feel they belonged in their setting (Cornwall). And their reactions were not characteristic. That is because I know Cornwall and the Cornish people. Therefore I am in a privileged position. However, that's not completely the argument. If Peckinpah (as he has repeatedly in the past, notably in THE WILD BUNCH) had made a film that transcended a particular time, place, period, that was so right you were forced to believe it, my doubts about the setting wouldn't have mattered. But I think Peckinpah must have felt as much at odds with his story and his location as I did. For me, at least, it just didn't work. And there you come back to this business of feeling and thinking: I can give you ten good reasons why A CLOCKWORK ORANGE (which is just as violent) seems a better movie to me than STRAW DOGS, except the one vital reason: why the former works (for me) and the other doesn't. In the end, you can only come back to what you personally like.

I haven't been a bit of help, I know, but it has been nice talking to you. The best of luck in your studies and future career.

Yours sincerely,
Margaret Hinxman,
Film Critic,
The Sunday Telegraph,
London, England.

Good or Bad, it is nevertheless a Movie that should be seen at all costs. STRAW DOGS will be starting at the Odeon on Thursday.

CALGARY — Plans for the preservation of national artifacts and expansion of museum facilities were announced Tuesday.

The Government has set aside $9.5 million to implement the policy during the next year, including $1-million for an "emergency purchase fund."

The fund would be used to buy treasures which otherwise would go outside the country and to purchase Canadian works -- paintings, historical furniture, antique silvware -- which become available outside Canada.

However, Secretary of State, A. Pelletier, said, movement of such treasures to other lands "is not totally a bad thing, since it is equally important that Canada be represented internationally by its fine works of art."

In an effort to bring museum facilities to more Canadians, he said the Government plans to support a network of regional museum facilities and a National Loan Collection.

At the top of the regional network would be "associate museums," five to 10 of which would be established in the next year and up to 40 in the next five years.

The National Loan Collection would be separate from the museum framework. It would provivde materials for exhibition centres, public buildings, shopping plazas, recreation centres and schools.

ST ST. JOHN'S, Nfld. — Premier Frank Moores said yesterday he sees Newfoundland becoming more like Scandinavia than mainland North America.

Moores, whose Progressive Conservative Party captured 33 of 42 legislature seats in Friday's federal election, said he hoped Newfoundland would become like Norway, a place where people can live in a clean environment while excelling in the work they know best.

Moores, 39, said in an interview that Friday's vote was a clear signal that most Newfoundlanders agree with policies he first outlined when elected party leader in May 1970.

MONTREAL — About 250 Indians and Eskimos demonstrated in front of Hydro-Quebec's headquarters here Saturday to protest Quebec government plans for hydro-electric development in the James Bay area of northwestern Quebec.

Signs warning that the project would destroy the way of life of an estimated 7,000 native people were carried by the marchers.

TAX — The man who drinks a little, smokes some and loads up the station wagon to take the youngsters camping is going to raise $130 million in taxes for Ontario this year.

This is the impact of tax changes announced by Provincial Treasurer Darcy McKeough in the budget he presented last Tuesday to the Ontario Legislature.

McKeough's words to the little man who enjoys his pleasures were: "The major impact will fall on those who smoke and drink and on the use of private automobiles."

University students will have to pay $100 more a year in tuition, which means the average undergraduate arts student will be paying $585 starting next fall. And student nurses and teachers will have to pay tuition for the first time.

OTTAWA — Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau announced the appointment of Dr. Sylvia Ostry as chief statistician of Canada Thursday, the first woman to reach the top ranks of the federal public service.

Mrs. Ostry, a 44-year-old economist, will take over the post on June 1 from Walter E. Duffett who is retiring.

As head of Statistics Canada, the federal agency responsible for collecting and analyzing most statistical information used by the government, Mrs. Ostry will be Canada's first woman deputy minister and among the highest paid civil servants.

PETERBOROUGH — Trent University in Peterborough will start a Canadian studies program this fall with a $150,000 grant from the Ford Motor Co., of Canada.

The program, leading to an undergraduate degree in Canadian studies, will be offered through a number of departments in such areas as history, geography, literature, economics and politics.

Symons said the program will help "break through a taboo" against Canadian studies as something inferior. It will be national in scope, but the emphasis will be on Ontario studies.

BRITISH COLUMBIA — Premier W. A. C. Bennett said his province may not attend any more constitutional conferences without a prior commitment from Quebec on where it stands. His comment came after an announcement from Alberta Premier Peter Lougheed that his province won't attend further constitutional talks until Ottawa spells out provincial jurisdiction issues rather more clearly. Bennett said B.C. had gone through two rounds of constitutional debate — the Fulton Favreau formula and the constitutional charter — only to have Quebec veto each one. Quebec must say where it stands, he said, and be prepared to put its name on the dotted line.

DACCA — Prime Minister Mujibur (Mujib) Rahman announced a sweeeping nationalization last night to give his government control over Bangladesh's major industries.

In a broadcast on the first anniversary of the start of the civil war that led to the country's birth, Sheik Mujib said all jute, textile and sugar mills, domestic banks and domestic insurance companies are being nationalized.

Only foreign-owned banks and insurance firms are excluded from the government takeover of major business, he said.

Mujib also announced a gradual nationalization of foreign trade and internal transport services.

NEW YORK — The Roman Catholic priest who bought a full-page advertisement in Playboy magazine last January to stimulate recruitment for the Order of the Most Holy Trinity (Trinitarians) reported this week that 600 inquiries had been received.

SANGHAR, Pakistan — Thousands of Sindhi peasants yesterday staged the most crushing display of opposition to Pakistani President Zulfikar Ali Bhutto since he took power after the country's military defeat in the war with India.

As the president addressed a mass public rally of 15,000 at a sports stadium here, whole sections of the crowd rose and walked out in a massive silent protest.

Mr. Bhutto abruptly stopped his speech and hurried from the dias. Within minutes he has been whisked away by an army helicopter, leaving behind an empty stadium.

The president, speaking in his native Sindhi language, was only minutes into his speech when the mass walkout began in this small farming town 175 miles northeast of Karachi.

CHICAGO — An independent study group said yesterday that Chicago police killed more people over an eight-month period than police in any of the five largest U.S. cities. The group charged the city has "a trigger-happy society of policemen."

DACCA — The Bangladesh Government yesterday said it was setting up 73 special tribunals to try several thousand people accused of collaborating with the Pakistani military regime last year.

The tribunals would provide "expeditious and fair trials" to those accused the announcement said.

Although the exact number of people arrested as alleged collaborators after the Pakistani surrender is not known, about 10,000 people are believed to be in Dacca jails alone.

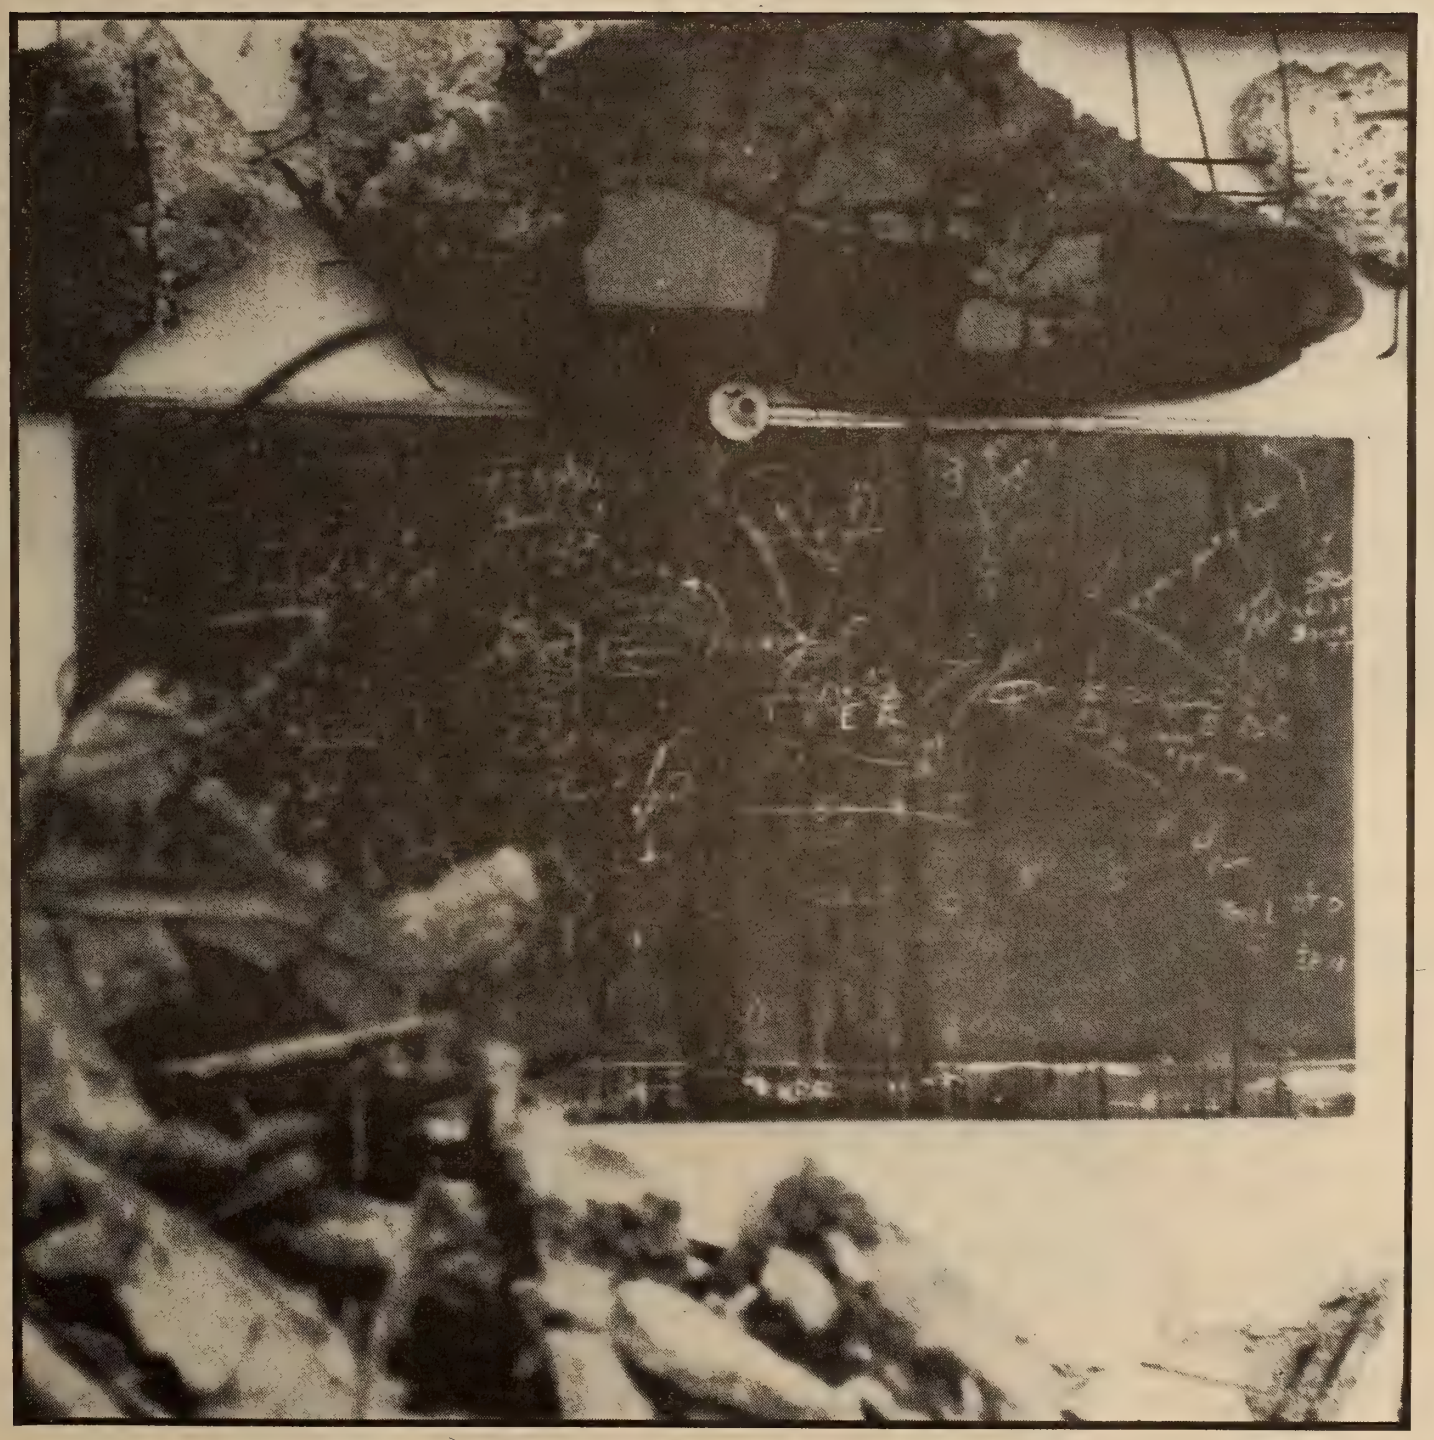
EAST BERLIN — East Berlin took on a festive air yesterday as thousands of West Berliners poured through the wall dividing the city and embraced relatives for the first time in six years.

The Easter holiday began on both sides of the wall and there was a big rush to take advantage of East Germany's decision to let West Berliners make three-day visits to the east.

The wall was opened for the West Berliners on Wednesday for an eight-day period, allowing them into East Berlin for the first time since 1966 and into East Germany itself for the first time for 20 years.

BELFAST — About 200,000 Protestant workers went on strike last Monday week, bringing Northern Ireland to an economic standstill, but at the same time a promise by a section of the Irish Republican Army to curb terrorism offered a glimmer of hope for ending Ireland's religious strife.

Ulster was largely blacked out by power cuts caused by the strike. All downtown stores in Belfast were closed and all big factories stopped production, either because of the strike or the power cuts.



BELFAST — William Whitelaw, Britain's new secretary of state for Northern Ireland, symbol and instrument of direct London rule in Ulster, got down to work Friday amid a renewed guerilla offensive with bombs and guns. Whitelaw was heavily guarded as he arrived in Belfast Thursday night. Earlier, more than 100,000 supporters of Northern Ireland's Vanguard movement crowded in front of Stormont in Belfast, revealing that the anticipated Protestant backlash perhaps had found its voice and a unified leadership. William Craig headed the movement, which called a general strike to protest against the imposition of direct rule. Industry and commerce virtually came to a halt for the duration of the strike.

Law students study pollution laws, propose new code

by Bob Mutrie

A group of Queen's law students have examined the anti-pollution laws of Ontario and Kingston, and proposed a model regulatory system for the environment.

The study group was made up of students from the environmental law course of law professor G. W. Alexandrowicz, and coordinated by second-year student Don MacDougall, who is also a member of Pollution Probe.

In their research, the group found that there were 45 relevant Kingston by-laws, but that most of them were antiquated and poorly indexed, Alexandrowicz said.

"The government must act to ensure protection of the environment as a critically limited resource," the study found, and it further suggested that the government should inform and educate individuals to recognize their responsibility in pollution abatement.

The report says cooperation must exist on both the provincial and municipal levels. Incidents of pollution, it found, are most apparent on the municipal level, but it recommends that the province have the greatest responsibility because it is neutral and more detached.

The study says a good system would involve a provincially-appointed officer in each city, to ensure efficient operation of both provincial and municipal laws.

The study advised continued operation of the Ontario Air Pollution Control Act, which has established branch offices across the province, including one at Kingston. The act provides for grants to municipalities according to the extent of their pollution problem, to assist them in administering and enforcing air pollution by-laws.

At present such assistance is provided to Hamilton, Oshawa, Windsor, Guelph, Brantford, Brampton, Oakville, Burlington and London.

However, the study found that Kingston would receive very little assistance, since its problem is not serious.

The report also found that air pollution can best be dealt with on a provincial level, administered by a local municipal officer easily reached by private citizens.

It suggests that air pollution be measured on a scale of five with a Ringelmann Chart, and that the limit be number one – measuring 20 per cent black on a ground of 80 per cent white. Numbers two and three could be permitted for very short intervals, it suggests.

Further, it suggests use of dust-separating devices on equipment intended for burning solid fuel.

It deplores the inadequately-controlled heating plant and low steel stack on Collins Bay Penitentiary west of Kingston, and the lack of dust-collectors on the stack at Millhaven Penitentiary nearby.

A consistently-applied set of fines should be levied on polluters, it says, running at $100 for the first offence and $300 for each offence thereafter.

The second area considered by the students was noise pollution. They suggested that Kingston should have effective and immediate legislation to prevent the sort of serious problem that now affects Hamilton and Vancouver.

They suggested laws against any unnecessary or unusual noise that would "disturb, injure or detract from the comfort, peace or health" of citizens. They also suggest heavy limitations on night noise from lawn-mowers or abnormally loud radios, phonographs and television sets.

Their report says few changes are necessary with regard to solid waste disposal, other than more extensive segregation of garbage to increase the degree of possible recycling.

There should be some degree of control over the design of new buildings, they say, especially in Kingston where there are so many historic buildings. Avoidance of eyesores and "ruin of view" buildings should be possible with the formation of site-plan committees, they suggest.

They further suggest improvements in by-laws regarding specific parts of the city: malls, wider sidewalks and shade trees would improve the central business area, they say, and extensive urban renewal is needed in old Sydenham Ward and the area north of Princess Street.

The study suggests that the entire Kingston waterfront be zoned for recreation.

In the field of water pollution, the study found that Kingston is far ahead of most areas, especially with its new sewage treatment plant. Previously, untreated street waste and sanitary wastes during overflow periods went directly into Lake Ontario. The study says all municipalities should maintain a closed system to treat wastes before they are dumped.

It found that a municipal officer could ensure the enforcement of federal and provincial legislation about water purity, at a municipal level where it is most necessary.

Alexandrowicz said the environmental law students studied the by-laws of many municipalities besides Kingston including Chicago, to draw a broad basis for their conclusions. Though they found no one set of laws to be complete, he added, they tried to draw together the best from each set.

Job Bank will seek summer listings

"Job Bank will extend its operations to include students from St. Lawrence College and Kingston High Schools," Gary Gannage, co-ordinator of the project with Tom Kennedy told the Journal.

Job Bank is a summer referral service for students seeking employment. Last year it found 275 full-time jobs and 500 day to day jobs in Kingston between May and mid-June.

The service closed down in mid-June because there was not sufficient student demand for jobs. "However we hope to remain open throughout the summer providing jobs for Kingston High School students," Gannage said.

This employment service is similar to Summer Manpower Gannage commented but added "we won't just wait for applications from potential employers, we will go out looking for jobs."

Brochures have been sent to all Kingston businessmen and the directors of Job Bank will follow this up with a phone call or personal call.

Financing for the project comes mainly from the University. But they hope to receive a grant under the Youth in Action Program of the Ontario Department of Education.

Job Bank will go into operation on April 24 in the Career Planning and Placement office. Applications can be submitted anytime before then.

AMS makes housing list

A list of all off campus housing facilities will be compiled this summer, Jennifer Duncan told The Journal.

This information will be available to all students searching for a place to live next year.

The AMS is sponsoring this project because it is felt that students either do not know about or just don't use the Queen's Housing Service.

"The lack of organized student housing in Kingston has resulted in many students putting up with inadequate accommodation," Jennifer Duncan said. To prevent this, information concerning the rights of tenants will be issued along with a list of accommodation.

It is hoped that this will eliminate the random apartment hunting which forces many students to knock on doors or phone other students in Who's Where.

Anyone interested in helping to compile this list or with strong feelings about student housing, please leave your name and a note in the AMS office.

Where will you be?
List it in the
Summer Who's Where

Who's Where in the Summer will list the addresses of Queen's students staying in Kingston. Fill out a card at Douglas Library, Victoria Hall desk, Gordon-Brockington desk, or the AMS Office between now and April 29.

If you will be somewhere outside Kingston, but not at your permanent address as listed in the winter Who's Where, you can have that address listed in the same way.

Who's Where in the Summer will be distributed free in mid-May.

The Queen's Journal will be publishing through the summer this year, for the first time ever. Students who will be away from campus may receive copies regularly by mail, at a cost of $1 for the full summer.

We don't know yet how many issues there will be: maybe once a month, on the average, maybe as often as once a week. But you can get them all, mailed as soon as they appear on campus.

Send your dollar now -- with your name, summer mailing address, and student number -- to Summer Mailings, The Queen's Journal, Students' Memorial Union, by campus or regular mail.

Mailing addresses and dollars will only be accepted in this way; please do not bring them to the Journal office.

If you're expecting to read something entirely new about Lighthouse, forget it. They were great, as usual, they played to a full house, as usual, and they were well received, as usual.

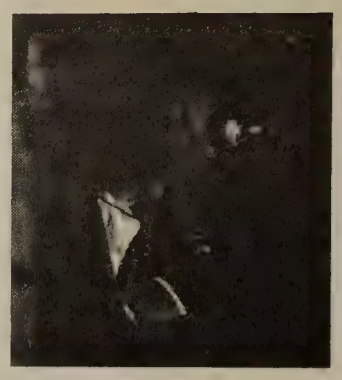
One thing that wasn't as usual, was that they were all there, even Bobby who almost managed to miss it again. "Shit man, I don't know what it is about him and this college."

Half an hour after folksinger Kearney left the stage and Queen's resigned itself to waiting for a concert that had looked like it might be on time for once, the "original Lighthouse" came on. The wait was worth it.

solman

Lighthouse started out slow and easy, with such hits as "Sweet Lullaby". They moved on through "1849", "What Gives You the Right", "Love of a Woman", reaching their peak with "Eight Miles High" and "One Fine Morning".

This I found to be the biggest fault of the concert. When they were a larger group they would blast you with "Chest Fever" and people really got into the mood they wanted to create. The same thing happened at Grant Hall four weeks ago. From there the audience was theirs. Not Tuesday though, they wanted to "work into their own thing their own way." building into their climax with the hour long "Eight Miles High". I had trouble getting into their stuff at first, something that has never bothered me with Lighthouse before. They worked hard, the music was good technically, it just failed to excite the audience from the start.



"Eight Miles High" featured lead guitar and flute, both excellent, but I missed Prokop's dynamic drum solo.

Bobby, lead singer, was worth waiting for. His style is very distinct and you know you're hearing the true Lighthouse sound the way it's meant to be in "One Fine Morning".

A standing ovation, an encore, then on to a European tour in May. Even with their slow start, Lighthouse was good, and are to be thanked for giving us an enjoyable break.

Christopher Kearney brought a new style to Queen's on Tuesday with his 'folk with a difference'. The difference was in his style, moving away from the standard key range of sound, into some superb guitar work, coupled with an excellent set of lyrics. It's difficult for any folk-singer to get up in front of a crowd in a place like the arena, and to back up a group like Lighthouse. If Tuesday was any indication of Kearney's future, we can look forward to hearing from him again. His first time on stage, Kearney was well received and wishes to thank Queen's for being a "great audience" and giving him such a promising start on his career.

Why is so much wrong with the Wright Report?

A critical look at the Draft Report on Post-secondary education in Ontario

by Bill Johnston

The Draft Report of the Wright Commission has evoked a great deal of comment, and very little of it has been favourable to the vision of the future of post-secondary education in Ontario which is contained in the report. Of all the things that have been said or written, the comment of a professor who called the report an "unmitigated disaster" was probably the most succinctly accurate.

Are these protests merely the cries of academics and students who do not want any changes in a system in which they are quite comfortable? This may be true in some cases, but, as I intend to point out, there are very fundamental problems, not just for the educational establishments but for society as a whole, which are likely to result if the overall concept of education which is embodied in the report is accepted by the Ontario government.

Moreover, there is a strong likelihood that that will happen. The Ontario budget brought down last Tuesday, with its increase in tuition fees for all post-secondary institutions, reflected at least one of the recommendations of the report. Also, Doug Wright, who was the head of the commission but is now only a member, has been appointed deputy minister in the new super-ministry for social development, where he will no doubt be instrumental in implementing the ideas contained in the report that bears his name.

There is also some evidence, according to the Financial Post, that whatever changes in education take place in Ontario will have ramifications throughout Canada. The Post noted that "Ontario has long been looked on as setting the pace in educational policy for Canada," and added that studies similar to the Wright Commission's work have been begun in Alberta, Manitoba and the Maritime provinces. If the Wright Commission report is indeed a disaster, it will lead to a nationwide disaster.

The major shortcoming of the Draft Report is its complete failure to carefully examine the goals and purposes of post-secondary education and the quality of the education being offered. No attempt is made to assess the types of needs which the society has which could be met by post-secondary education, or to assess what needs students or potential students have which can be satisfied, and may or may not be being satisfied, by education.

Without examining them carefully, the commission does note two purposes of education: "to prepare citizens for life and work. This, in turn, breaks down into two subsidiary categories of educational goals. One, the general and traditional aims of education: to transmit knowledge, to create and transmit new knowledge, and to stimulate the development of critical attitudes- habits of mind- in students. Second, equally traditional and admixed with the first one, is the preparation for a career through training."

The commission comments that, in their survey of current as well as historical literature, "we have not found any other educational goals or any more concise expression of them." This being the case, the commission apparently felt justified in not further examining whether or not these goals still apply today, or whether or not these two goals might possibly be split off from one another, or whether, perhaps, the two goals might not even be incompatible.

Moreover, the commission does not attempt to differentiate among institutions within the broad class of post-secondary institutions, and thus does not consider whether or not there are different goals and purposes which apply to different types of post-secondary education; that is, whether, perhaps, the universities should handle the training in critical thinking while technical colleges handle the job training goal, or whether these major goals should continue to be dealt with in the same institutions, but with different institutions giving differing emphasis to one or the other of the goals. In fact, the report gives the impression that all post-secondary education institutions ought to be doing exactly the same things.

This failure to differentiate goals and purposes for the different institutions is made extremely important because of the wide range of institutions which the commission considers to fall within the title of "post-secondary education." This range is very broad, encompassing not only universities and community colleges, but also agricultural and trade colleges, schools of nursing, museums, theatres, art galleries, science centres, libraries and "similar institutions." Surely, it would be reasonable that some consideration be given to questioning whether this vast array of not-too-similar institutions should all be striving to fulfill the same purposes.

(Why this group of differing institutions is considered by the commission to be institutions of education at the post-secondary level- as if they were only of use to those who have graduated out of high school--and why it is considered that they should all come within the jurisdiction of one department, presumably the department of university affairs or else the new ministry for social development, is never made clear in the report, although it does say that "post-secondary education should encompass the whole gamut of educational services"- including, perhaps, nursery schools and the public schools, too?- and that "the allocation of funds through one department would permit more reasonable and balanced comparisons, appraisals and choices among programmes." This has not been proven, and there is certainly no strong evidence, inside or out of the report, that the department of university affairs or of social development would best handle this task.)

Even though the commission, then, did not examine the goals and purposes of post-secondary education in order to determine if the traditional goals are really good ones, it might at least be expected that it would have undertaken an examination of the extent to which the education system, as it exists, has been fulfilling the goals that they did select. Unfortunately, no such examination of the quality of education in Ontario was made.

Never in the draft report does the commission consider whether Ontario's post-secondary education is good, bad, or indifferent; whether it is meeting the needs of society or of individuals; whether it is dealing with reasonable subject matter; whether what is taught is well taught; whether there are any important differences between the community colleges and the universities; or whether there are any possible alternatives to the present system of teaching, the current course offerings, the current degree requirements- in a word, to the status quo.

Instead of this kind of analysis of what the education system is doing, the commission created some criteria of how well the system is meeting the two major goals of education, criteria which have nothing to do with the quality of the educational experience within an institution of post-secondary education. The commission translated their two goals of education into six principles, "a set of principles by which we believe these goals should be accomplished in our society." These principles are universal accessibility (ie, education should be available to anyone, without regard to age, sex, geographical location, etc.); openness (ie, "educational services should be more and more open to the public, and indeed, integrated within the general cultural and educational activities of the community); diversity (diversity "not only of institutions but of admission standards, programmes, length of courses, and so forth); flexibility (it should be "sufficiently responsive to new social demands"); transferability (ie, it should provide for "orderly transfer of abilities, aptitudes and skills (not just formal credits) from one post-secondary enterprise to another, and, indeed, from any relevant activity in one's life to the educational process"); and public accountability (which "should not be confused with detailed bureaucratic controls and meddling.")

While these may be good principles, the commission does not make clear (and it is probably impossible to make clear) the relationship between an education system's ability to train people for life and work, and its openness, accessibility, accountability, flexibility, transferability and diversity. Even if a post-secondary education system completely fulfilled these six principles, this would not necessarily ensure that those getting the education from such a system would be getting good education. It would simply mean that anyone could take advantage of it, that the system would adapt to changing conditions, that people could easily get credit for what they have done, that there would be many types of institutions, and that the public would have reasonable control on the spending of their money.

(It could be noted, as an aside, that the commission, through its failure noted above, also failed to carry out at least one of its responsibilities, as set out in the terms of reference of the commission: "to study and make recommendations on the educational and cultural needs of students to be met at the post-secondary level in Ontario.")

By refusing to analyse either the goals of education, or the quality of the existing educational experience, the commission thus plainly opted for continuing these things as they are, without change. However, the commission was much less reluctant in recommending changes in the structure of the educational system.

The best that could be said for the commission, in light of their failure outlined above, would be that we will simply have more of the same in post-secondary education in Ontario, which, while not perfect, would at least be acceptable. But this is not going to happen. In hot pursuit of its six principles, the commission has recommended all sorts of changes in the structure of the system- in financial arrangements, in arrangements for acquiring degrees, in admissions standards and practices, in governing of the institutions, etc.- which could, and likely will, have serious consequences for the quality of the education being offered.

The implementation of the Wright commission ideas will result in a push towards greater uniformity in educational offerings throughout the province, less freedom to innovate on the part of the individual faculty member or institution, a vast increase in the bureaucracy of education, an even greater orientation towards job training and away from training in critical thinking than exists now, a gradual lessening in the quality of the education offered, and much greater government intervention and control of the operations of all post-secondary institutions. This becomes evident not only in looking at the commission's principles which they are trying to achieve, but also in examining the recommendations which are made.

The push towards uniformity and greater bureaucratic control is evident in a number of the ideas put forth by the commission. One recommendation is for the establishment of a University of Ontario which would "provide a testing and evaluation service available on demand to the people of Ontario" and which would be able "award formally earned degrees and, on the basis of (the testing) services..., degrees and diplomas where appropriate without formal course requirements." In other words, in line their principle of transferability, everyone person in Ontario should be able to take tests which would, if he passed them, allow him or her to receive a genuine university degree.

This will require two things. The first is a bureaucracy to administer these tests, and, of course, the testing procedures themselves would have to be designed. Second in order that the degrees granted by the University of Ontario will not be significantly lower in quality and status than those of the established institutions, it will be necessary that there be a fair degree of similarity between testing procedures used by the University of Ontario and those used in the other institutions. This, in turn, would be likely to lead to a situation similar to what existed in Grade 13 in Ontario, when the same exams were given to all Grade 13 students in the province, which led to a situation where nearly everyone was taught the same things to ensure that all students had equal chance to do well in the departmental exams.

A similar result would follow any strong pursuit of the ideal of transferability. The ultimate in transferability would exist when every university and every community college offered the same courses, since it would then be easy to ascertain what a student had taken.

The commission had a broader definition of transferability than just the transferability of course credits, however. It wanted anyone to be able to, in effect, "get credit" for any experience he or she has had outside of educational institutions, as well as inside them. One of the easiest ways to achieve this would be to have the material taught in educational institutions similar to the types of experience one would get while working. This, in fact, is already something like the situation in the various faculties of applied studies, such as medicine, engineering, business and law, and it would probably not be too difficult to arrange comparisons between practical experience and these courses, or to arrange transfer into such course at a level equal to a person's ability. But this would be much more difficult in the Arts, particularly where these faculties are concerned with the goal the commission referred to as development of critical habits of mind. If the commission really wanted to make transferability possible within the Arts fields, much of the abstract work of the courses would have to be eliminated, or else everyone entering or hoping to enter the Arts would likely have to start at the bottom, in first or perhaps at best second year courses, and prove their ability by the speed with which they are able to proceed. Either the ideal of transferability from daily experience into education must go, or the development of critical thinking will have to go, and the commission's position appears to be the latter.

The commission makes clear its inclination towards making the subject matter of the post-secondary institutions more closely related to ordinary life in their recommendation 4: "Formal programmes in universities and colleges should be more fully integrated with real opportunity for experience and practice so that pertinent practical experience gained outside formal institutions may be substituted for conventional laboratory and practice work." Whether the commission intends this only to apply to the applied fields is never made clear because of the commission's disinclination to differentiate among the many institutions of post-secondary education. This particular recommendation might lead one to believe that that is the intention, but the fact that the position of the Arts studies are never made clear makes one wonder, not just on this question, but on broader ones as well, which shall be returned to.

Other recommendations give credence to the idea that greater uniformity of courses will result from the implementation of the Wright commission report. For instance, it is recommended that students be able to attend two institutions at once, in order to more quickly gain their degree (which, in this type of case, would be awarded by the University of Ontario.) However, some effort will have to be made to ensure that students are not taking overlapping courses in the different institutions, which cover the same or much of the same material. Uniformity in course offerings could solve this problem, since the content of courses would be well known and overlapping impossible. the research carried on by the researchers, which results they could then incorporate into their lectures. Such a situation would be analagous to that of the high school teacher who does no research, or very little, for himself, relying instead on the reports of research being done to keep himself up to date. (The fact that the commission is strongly in favour of splitting, for funding purposes, the costs of research from the costs of teaching, and of having different sources of the two types of funds, could be an indication that this splitting of tasks is what they do have in mind.) Alternatively, the commission may feel that faculty members should continue to do their own research, but that, with a great increase in the standardization of courses throughout the province, a faculty member should be able to spend much less time on preparation for courses and will be quite able to fit both research and preparation into his or her two hours for every one of contact with students.

In either case, the independence of the faculty member would be lessened, either in pursuing research or in class preparation and his or her status and role would become akin to that of the high school teacher. Also, because of the bureaucratic nature of the system, there would be much more pressure than exists now for conformity of behaviour on the part of faculty members, and the criteria for promotion or even hiring would become even more rigidly restricted to participation within the university community and publishing, since there would be little outlet for outstanding work within the classroom because of the limitations of a standardized course set-up. This, in turn, could easily lead to a reduction in the quality of lectures, because of their low importance, with subsequent loss of quality in the educational experience for the students.

There are other ominous suggestions in the report, which often arise because of the contradictory nature of some of the commission's ideas. For instance, the commission, in recommendation 33, suggests the laudable idea that laws should be passed which would make it illegal for an employer to discriminate in hiring, against a person on the basis of his or her formal education. This would simply mean that a person would have to be judged on his or her capability to fill the job opening. This arises out of the concern on the part of the commission with the fact that people have become obsessed with "paper credentials." Yet, the commission also suggests that there should be greatly increased access to degrees (and it should be stressed that much of the concern of the commission is with access to degrees, not to the educational process which will allow a person to acquire a degree), so that anyone can get one if he or she can pass the tests set up by the university of Ontario, or if he or she can graduate from community colleges, which the commission recommends should also grant degrees. The commission rejects, here, the idea that social attitudes regarding the possession of a degree can be easily changed, and thus, instead, explicitly sets out to destroy whatever status value a degree has by making them widely held. Yet, while this process is happening to some extent now, it is still likely that people will attach differential value to different degrees from different institutions (unless, as suggested above, all the degrees are made the same), which will not resolve the commission's problem. (It is noteworthy, too, that, while the commission did not believe that it could change public opinion regarding the value of possession of a degree, it does believe that it can go some distance in eliminating the belief that, for instance, a community college education is inferior to a university education. This inconsistency is not cleared up.)

Moreover, while the intention of the commission seems to be to increase the job possibilities of those who do not possess degrees, it could well be that since degrees will be widely held, those still without them will find themselves in an even worse position, laws to the contrary not withstanding.

The commission also has produced recommendations which could well make difficult the achievement of universal accessibility. This relates to the financial arrangements, which are designed at least partly to make it easier for low-income students to attend university. While the grant-loan scheme established by the commission would no doubt go a long way toward increasing the likelihood that poor people could get into university, the fact that the biggest grants (which, in effect, provide free education for the lowest income groups) are vailable for only three years would have a tendency to push such students, if they entered post-secondary education, into three-year arts courses, whose value on the job market is low. Students from poor families would be less likely than those from well-off to go into debt (even a debt which might never have to be paid off) in order to acquire an education, yet that is what the three-year provision forces them to do if they are to get the type of training which offers any likelihood of leading to a job, which is a prime motivator for a poor person. The fact that tuition fees would be increased makes that prospect even grimmer, since the amount of debt would increase.

The major problem with the type of education system proposed by the commission concerns the place of the university in such a scheme, particularly that part of the university, mainly the Arts faculty, in which the emphasis is not on job training but rather on training and developing critical habits of mind.

The commission makes no mention of the place or role of the university as a centre for development of critical thinking, and it appears that the reason is simply that there is no place for it in the commission's view of education. After mentioning that one of the two goals of the post-secondary education system is to develop critical thinking, this goal is forgotten. Job training and training in coping with society are what is really important.

The fact that a great deal of the educational budget, which is apparently not to increase greatly over the next few years, will be spent on creating testing mechanisms, on spreading about the supporting materials for home study courses, and on paying those who do not seek education an amount equal to what would have been spent on them if they had gotten an education (recommendation 68), will mean that support for all the existing aspects of post-secondary education will have to be less than is the case now. Add to this the emphasis on job training and it is likely that the parts of post-secondary education which will be hardest hit will be universities.

The lack of concern on the part of the commission with the quality of education also gives credence to this view. At the very least, this lack of concern will merely reinforce the current trend toward job training in post-secondary education. At worst, it will lead to utter neglect of training in critical thinking.

The reasons behind the whole approach to education which the commission's draft report indicates can be traced to the ideological leanings of the commission, which are spelled out more or less explicitly early in the report in the section on Aims and Objectives.

The author (s) of the draft report are essentially conservative. This is made clear early in the report. It is noted that "it would be wrong to conclude that the only way to correct social injustices and inequities is through a radical reform of our educational system." This statement, which by itself is reasonable, is supported in a way which makes it clear that the commission views radical reform not only as the wrong way to correct social injustices and inequities, but also as totally inapplicable to Ontario's post-secondary education system.

The commission noted: "The educational system, like the mirror, reflects the reality in front of it. If the reality is beautiful, we are captivated by its image; if it is ugly, we are tempted to destroy it. But it is futile as well as senseless to break the mirror; the warts and wrinkles will not disappear." Radical reform is here equated with destruction, and the use of that false equation allows the commission, thinking in terms of sharp dichotomies, to reject radical reform and opt for the only remaining alternative, no change.

It should be noted that the conservatism of the commission is not a conservatism which rejects any changes, no matter how small. Rather, what the commission shows itself bent on preserving is the present structure of society; minor changes, in the educational system for instance, which in no way threaten the power relationships of the society, are not viewed as threatening to the commission; fundamental changes or threatened changes in these relationships are viewed as threatening, and, with the tools at its disposal, the commission has attempted to do all it can to prevent any possibility of such changes arising.)

The conservatism of the commission is indicated in other ways, as well. The commission, in the passage quoted above, regards education as a mere reflection of society, rather than a shaper of society. Yet, as the commission notes elsewhere, education also acts as a socializing agent for society. Thus, it is possible for the educational system to, at least to some extent, effect the attitudes of people, which in turn can have an effect, perhaps even a profound effect, on what society is. Moreover, many types of societal change can perhaps be accomplished only as the values and attitudes of the people within society change (improving the status of women is only one such case), and, in many ways, education in such cases, which will shape attitudes one way or the other anyway, is perhaps the only means of bringing about societal change. It may not be the only way to bring about change, but it may well be the most effective, a viewpoint which the commission rejects.

The commission, in fact, instead of desiring to train people to look for new ways of doing things, wants people to be trained to cope with society, to adapt to it, no matter how bad. The commission refuses to suggest how society could be improved, because such an outlook is alien to theirs. Instead, they say that "we must never allow the educational system to get out of touch with reality by assuming a type of future which might never be realized. We would be creating unhappiness and new injustices if we prepared young people to live not in our society but rather in some Utopian world of educational reformers." Again, the dichotomous and essentially conservative position adopted by the commission is that we have either to accept society as it is or develop and train people for a Utopian world which will never exist. This dichotomous thinking again allows the commission to opt for the status quo, since no middle ground is considered.

What this means is that the commission thinks we must train people to cope with a world, which the commission itself describes as bureaucratic, dehumanizing and unjust; "education must prepare and help the individual to live in a highly complex, rapidly changing, technological and probably bureaucratized society." The commission gives no thought to the likely consequences of preparing people to cope with such a world, yet to the extent that such an education succeeds, it will ensure that people will perpetuate just the type of society which they inherit.

There is also something very troubling about the commission's supposed concern for the individual's happiness, as described in the earlier quoted passage. Essentially, the argument, that giving certain types of education or knowledge to some people will make them uncomfortable or lead to unhappiness, which is used above is the same type of argument which has long been used to discourage blacks or women, for instance, from pursuing higher education; such people would only be frustrated and unhappy with their newly acquired knowledge when they returned to their positions as menials and housewives. Certainly, this is probably true; and the answer is to free the group from enforced attachment to that type of position, not to deny them the education. Yet, it is the latter, approach, opposed to fundamental change within society, that the commission adopts here.

The system, then, in the commission's view, is a taken for granted reality. Changes within the structure of the system are permissable, but anything which threatens the system itself is taboo. This is basically the world view of the bureaucrat, which is not surprising considering who is on the commission and for whom they are writing. But it is a world view which gives lie to their claim that they are humanists who put the individual at the centre of their concern: "the individual must be central" to the educational process. As already pointed out, it is the system which comes first, which does not change. The individual is trained to adapt to the system, however much it may fail to satisfy his needs or the needs of the wider society outside of the bureaucracy.

This anti-humanist approach is made clear in several ways. One way is the above mentioned false concern for the happiness of the individual, which is really a cover for their concern for making the individual adapt to the system.

More importantly, the commission makes clear their lack of concern for the individual in what it is that is examined in the educational system and what it is that is left out. What is examined, as has been indicated before is the structure of the system -- who gets into it, how they can transfer credits from one phase to another, how they will pay for their education, how the system will be controlled, etc. The educational process, on the other hand, the experience of people within the system, the needs of people which must be fulfilled by education, the ways individuals react within the system, and what they get out of it (other than degrees, with which the commission is very concerned), all these things are ignored.

Most glaringly lacking is any consideration of intellectual growth and development, outside of the cursory mention that it is a goal of the educational system to stimulate "the development of critical attitudes -- habits of mind -- in students." In fact, one would be hard pressed to find the word intellectual, either as an adjective or as a noun, used in the whole report. The reason is to be found again in the attitudes of the commission: it is basically anti-intellectual, because critical thought, which is the prime and only requisite of being an intellectual, its not congenial with maintenance and continuance of a bureaucratic status quo. Training in critical thought, inevitably leads people to question what is and to examine and consider alternatives to what is. Obviously, there will be people who will do this regardless of the education system, but it would be highly undesirable, from the commission's "what is, is good" viewpoint, for there to be a significant number of such people, since such people might indeed become unhappy with society as it is and might seek to change it, advocating perhaps fundamental change, or radical reform.

Thus it is that the commission has done all it can in the report to downplay the importance of the university, as a centre of training in critical thought. It would be difficult for them to take any direct action against it, so instead they have suggested various ways of counter-balancing its force, including flooding the world with degrees to give everyone the trappings of academic achievement and which will make the intellectual appear to be no more qualified than anyone else (especially, any government official) to make comments on the world; diverting the educational budget away from the university; and simply ignoring the university's role. This is an anti-intellectual age, in many respects, when reasoned debate is often replaced by confrontation tactics, when it is often true that violence is the only way to gain a hearing and when men like our prime minister (there are countless others in power, too) find dissent and criticism a difficult and unnecessary burden to bear. To the extent that a commission, whose express purpose is to examine education, can totally ignore the prime importance of the intellectual to society, of open and free criticism and discussion, then to that extent the commission has contributed to this anti-intellectual condition.

The ideology of the commission is very similar to that of the government to whom the report went, and be summed up in the concept of functionalism. Basically, the functionalist accepts the status quo and has as his whole purpose making the existing system function more efficiently. Minor alterations of the system are acceptable, but any major change is unthinkable, for, in the view of the functionalist, change is inherently disruptive, while the status quo is characterized by stability and order. The functionalist strives to ensure that things stay that way.

It is thus apparent what type of threat is created by the existence of the intellectual, who questions the basic assumptions of the functionalist, who suggests alternatives to what is, and who openly criticizes what he or she sees as wrong. Such people disrupt the smooth running of the system, and, in fact, by suggesting alternatives, can create dissatisfaction with the existing system among people who previously had seen the existing system as the only one possible.

From this viewpoint, the commission, then, has sought to lessen the impact and importance of those institutions which train people in such thought. Their report, if implemented, will bring us one step closer to the bureaucratized, inhuman, unjust world that the commission wants to adapt people to, a world admirably described by Zbigniew Brzezinski, in New Republic, in the following words: it is "a society in which major social divisions have been largely overcome, the domination of technologically competent elites is more or less widely accepted, and the general course of social development is determined by a relatively harmonious process of economic growth. In such a society, there will be no basis for widespread dissent. It seems unlikely that a unifying ideology of political acton, capable of mobilizing large scale loyalty, can emerge in the manner that Marxism arose in response to the industrial era . . . The largely humanist-oriented, occasionally ideologically minded intellectual dissenter, who say his role largely in terms of proferring social critiques, is rapidly being displaced either by experts and specialists, who become involved in special governmental undertakings, or by the generalist-integrators, who become in effect house ideologues for those in power, providing overall intellectual integration for disparate actions."

Le Cycle - A Microcosmic Reflection of a Society

Le cycle is the second novel by Gerard Bessette to receive a Governor General's Award. The other was L'incubation, which in 1965 won both the Governor General's Award and the Province of Quebec's Literary Prize.

Born in 1920 in Sabrevois, southeast of Montreal, Gerard Bessette received his Doctor of Letters degree from the University of Montreal in 1950. He has been Professor of French Literature at Queen's University since 1960. Before that he taught French literature at the University of Saskatchewan, at Duquesne Universsity in Pittsburgh, Pa., at the Royal Military College in Kingston, and at Laval University.

His other novels are La bagarre (1958), Le libraire (1960, translated into English under the title Not for Every Eye), and Les pedagogues (1961). He has also published a volume of poetry, Poemes temporels (1954) and two critical works, Les images en poesie canadienne-francaise (1967) and Une litterature en ebullition (1968). He edited L'anthologie d'Albert Laberge (1962) and De Quebec a Saint-Boniface, an anthology of French-Canadian short stories (1968), and co-edited Histoire de la litterature canadienne-francaise par les textes (1968).

Gerard Bessette: le cycle, roman Montreal, les Editions du Jour, 1971 Collection: les romanciers du jour (no. 3) 213 pp. $3.50

- by Pierre B. Gobin -

At the funeral parlor little Jacot is kneeling; "Grandpa is in there in the large brown box, he doesn't move any more". The daydreams of a little boy (how old? three? four? - he can count "up to twenty, and fifty maybe", but can't manage to go down to the toilet on his own) gradually reveal the pattern of relationships within the surviving members of the family. "Mother" (Berthe) is not a "good mother" because she neglects her little boy; since Dad has gone ("he is not dead, but he is no longer here") she has taken up with that ugly Roberto; "he is a nasty foreigner - I'd like him to be 'the late' "; she now talks to him; she pays no attention to her little boy (and yet "he is a prince") when he needs to go to the toilet. Uncle Roch is thin as a whip...he looks dumb but he is "smart as a whip"; he makes lots of gestures when he talks. Aunt Anita is fat and breathes heavily; that's because she is all bound up in her corsets, "she is bound up in every way". Grandma has a veil over her face, "maybe so that one can't see that she's been crying" .... "I have to pull her by her sleeve so that she pays attention to me" - she is not like mother, impatient, "she doesn't mind me, she lets me pee in my own good time..."

But as Jacot provides an introduction to the assembled family, he also reveals his own fantasms. As the priest ("a man of God") drones on the interminable prayers, the child speculates on Grandpa's status as "a man of God", evokes memories of his walks to the park with the arthritic old man now in the box, tests his independance by attempts at obscenity, checks them, rewords them, modulates on his rebellion, and for ever reverts to the leitmotiv of his urge "to pee - no, that's not polite, one should say urinate, or perhaps to go on an errand; a properly brought up little boy goes on errands....that's not dirty", the painful intensity of his need sucking him gradually into a maelstrom of conflicts, a descent into revulsions and trauma ("mother is on the toilet, my eye at the keyhole, the door suddenly wide open, mother frightening, ferocious, screaming, yells - I'm burning with the need to go").

As we move on from Jacot to Gaetane, his teen-age aunt - babysitter in spite of herself, resentful of that brat's forcing his attention on "Mother" (his grandmother), jealous of that little monkey that used to drag "Poor Dad" to the park every day - we seem at first to be merely shifting the point of view, repeating the same scene with just enough change in focus to reveal additional details ("Poor priest, one has to be real dumb like Aunt Anita to think that the poor dope is eloquent"; Aunt Berthe and her Sicilian, with his big nose like a plowshare). But in actual fact we are moving in time as well as merely turning from one stream of consciousness to another. Moreover, from the fantasms of solitary exploration, from the trauma of voyeurism (of the Medusa like stare that Sartre describes in Being and Nothingness) to visions of social promotion, to dreams of recognition not only by "the good mother" but by an adored teacher (with overtones of homosexual passion), to memories of an idealized brother ("I followed him around like a little dog..."), the pain and discomfort of kneeling are enhanced by a cut on the knee, but become a mortification that releases a moment of glory (Mademoiselle Lacoste bound it, she cleaned the wound, "Mademoiselle Lacoste knelt in front of me, she pulled down my stocking ever so gently...."). The kneeling becomes a delectable path to blessedness - and at the vortext of repressed urges, a moment of shame and anguish and pain is transposed into triumph ("Julien kneeling before me - me, little girl, in tears with her blood-stained knee, with her mud-splattered dress...Julien...kissing me, licking my wound"; "Forgive me, my little Gaetane, having knocked you down; I wish my knee hurt like yours - I wish they'd cut off my own leg").

We now realize that the family that had appeared complete in its bereavement is not all present: Julien, the favorite brother, the shining hope of the parents, the scholar of the family "could" not attend the wake because he was to take part in a political rally. "And what if he was right?" wonders Gaetane.

The Gaetane sequence then not only provides a more sophisticated look at the web of relationships in the family, it places the wake "in situation" within the overall context of a society. Psychologically it diversifies and enriches the fantasms and turns the awesome censured vision into a sequence of actions (pain, mortification, homage received - a dialectical "triumph" - dereliction, resentment, judgment conferred; a miracle play in a nutshell). It introduces a dramatic dimension into the novel. Of course Jacot, threatened by the evil giant, turned his physical urge into an epic flood. "I'm going to pee on that filthy Roberto, I'll drench him, drown him, he struggles in the flood he calls for help with his foul foreign accent nobody pays any attention he stops crying we are left in peace." But Gaetane assigns parts to her antagonists, offers a cat and mouse release before giving in to a vision of horror. She sees herself as the revolutionary inspiration of Julien, displacing "that Sophie with her hair like a mare's", sitting in council with her comrades, setting up a tribunal to investigate the renegade Sophie Tennebrocker, that spy in the pay of the F.B.I., that trollop picked up by a G.I. in a dive off Rotterdam's harbor; she exposes her rival, and generously pleads for forgiveness; the comrades administer rough justice and boot the spy out (but the evil rival is caught again . . . in China the spies, the traitors male and female they pour acid into them . . . their stomach is stretched to bursting . . . they crawl to their tormentor's feet . . . they beg forgiveness").

The novel moves on to other members of the family - Vitaline, the newly-widowed mother, - Julien, the activist son in the clutches of that Flemish trollop, -Berthe, the "grass widow" with her Sicilian, -Roch, the eldest son, "the next in line to die", and finally Anita, the fat elder daughter, a widow with two children, "gaping with admiration before the assistant parish priest".

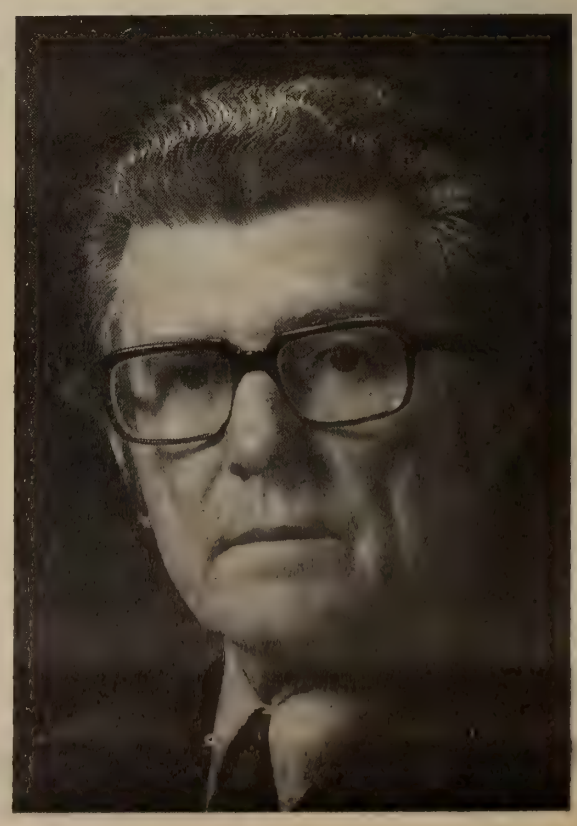
With each new turn of the cycle, the range expands: - in the past, with Vitaline, who evokes visions of her maidenly days when she waited for her patriarchal father to help him with his heavy bobcat skin coat as he left for work in a subtle parody of traditional pictures of the static stable caste order of the "Je maintiendrai" society;

- in the present, with a dynamic evocation of a supercharged nationalist meeting in the Julien sequence (presented in the clipped, intense, pretentious and earnest style of the young man who wants to be "with it"), enhanced by a nostalgic vision of bygone walks with the dead father, "We aren't rich but we aren't paupers", that evokes bittersweet pages of Bonheur d'occasion;

- in the timeless agony of "an awful night", the vigil of Berthe who tries to take stock of her life, listening to the breathing of her sleeping son whose resentment she senses, anguished at the silence of her lover who is not calling, after being "stared out" by the family circle;

- in the mediocre triumph of each additional day of survival for Roch who feels his death asserting itself in him, only held at bay by repeated shots of bourbon;

in the opiate religion of Anita whose "faith" reeks of bad faith, whose "selfless" devotion to the young parish priest covers dreams of self-canonization, whose scrupulous concern with "purity" is haunted with the awareness of triggering concupiscence.



Thus the novel comes to a close. Seven sequences - why a cycle? Surely not because of a "Shakespearian" seven ages of man approach (or of a Leiris-like attempt to establish a "revolution" through self awareness). But then of course the Canadian "man" is only complete in its avatars and the family of the novel gives a fair cross-section of those (notably matriarchal in its structure). In a way, Le cycle is a brilliant take-off on Les Plouffe, probing in depth through psychic modulations the patterns which are only presented glancingly by Lemelin through anecdote and multiplicity of episodes. It also complements the unerring but narrow expose of Tremblay's Les Belles-soeurs by a counterpoint with the male outlook -- complacently assertive with the child Jacot, pathetically bent with the dead father, stiffening in revolt with Julien, the son with the crowd, the extrovert, gnawing, ruminating with Roch, the lonely bachelor

In a way the range expands all through the book, but at the same time, the temp, gradually amplified from Jacot to Julien, ebbs again towards fat, passive Anita. The passions aroused become more intense and more sophisticated as one progresses through the first half of the book (to the open violent expression by Julien, and the memories of overt homosexual experiences by Berthe -- the only two characters who "live in sin" comme on dit, the only two who mate with foreigners, the only two who assert themselves against an "anglo" order); they gradually are "digested" as we return to the end (to the "anal" freudian stage?)

A cycle, I can also detect one in the pattern of emotional responses each character develops as he or she gets caught into a day dream. From a statement (factual, based on the "world" around) it moves to an appeal (mute attempt at communication - unheeded); but this appeal is soon brought under control ("that is not said; that is not done"). Yet that polite control is inadequate; the repressed pulsions break out again more violently (revolt, upsurge of violence, sadistic vision of cruelty) rising to a climax where an inner censorship steps in brutally (no! no!). The dream then collapses, the character, ridden with guilt and remorse, tries to turn to a vision of hope and innocence and relate it to the world around.

I may say I found a certain sameness in the series of responses, in the repeated warnings, first purely cenesthesic (itching, discomfort, burning, tingling, catch in the throat, faster heartbeat, etc.) then consciously verbalized (that is not fair; you are not being a good little boy; were you such a good wife?; perhaps I did not try, etc.) and finally sharply called out (no! no!). But a second reading brought the fascinating realization that the succession of responses of all the characters, taken in sequence, modulates the individual pattern. In other words, the structure of the book, the cycle is an amplified version of the internal form of each chapter, from the statements of Jacot, to the resentlful appeals of Gaetane, the attempt at control of the mother, the open revolt of Julien, the "sinful" violence of Berthe, brought to a halt in the censorious monologue of Roch, the Father-successor (if not substitute, since he fails to face up to his task and turns to the solace of alcoholism) the guardian of the fear of death. Then the final chapter, that of Anita the pious, the proper, atones for the whole book and returns us to the kneeling posture.

That image of kneeling is indeed the most significant in the book, with an amazing wealth of connotations. This is an obvious enough posture if one thinks that the book is set in the time-interval between the wake and the funeral (starting at the wake, ending before the funeral -- very much the expression of a pre-Pascal pattern -- what Pierre Emmanuel once called at a lecture at Queen's "the Easter Saturday syndrome").

But the kneeling in prayer, if accepted, may be meaningless (Roch "does not believe"). It may be only a gesture, a concession to respectability (for the mother, for instance). It may evoke images of submission, mortification, as a way to triumph (Gaetane). It may be a point of departure to homosexual fantasies (Berthe). Even if refused, as by Julien, it reasserts itself; vomiting into the lavatory, the would-be tough revolutionary ruefully reflects that -- kneeling that way -- "he might as well have attended the service of prayers for his dead father".

Significantly enough, the only posture that is not emphasized is the upright, except in idolatrous references to heroes: to the teacher (Gaetane), to the solid father-figure "Who might have been a Prime Minister", (the mother) to the preacher in his pulpit (Anita), and especially to the "sovereign leader, surging up from his leather boots, his body sheathed in a tracksuit of shiny black nylon, his arms erect, his legs astride like an indestructible X" (Julien). All the characters will allow themselves as a "fantasy posture" is riding (in sexual embrace or its substitute - related to the horse, the "mare", the rocking horse, even the old Quebec "berceuse" (rocking chair), amplified by Julien and especially Roch to a grandiose cavalcade (amusing counterpart to a cossack charge - shades of Jules Verne's Michel Strogoff, of Gogol's Tarass Boulba, of Byron's Mazeppa and (overt wink of Bessette) of La Jument des Mongols, Jean Basile's recent novel) or better still, sitting in state. For, if riding is strenuous and dynamic (as befits males and revolutionaries), sitting in state is a sedate, dignified, and thoroughly conservative posture. The child, on the toilet seat, enjoying the attention of his grandma, holds court, as an epicene regal figure. ("I am a prince, a king, I can be either a man and smoke a lot and stink like the dickens, or a lady, and smell nice and pucker my mouth in front of the mirror"); the teen-age daughter in her visions of a glorious future, sits as a hostess; she pours tea; but she is also intronized as the apostolic successor of her revered teacher. The grandmother, evoking the golden days of her courtship, sits on the "plush-covered" davenport, to receive the homage of her suitors. The fat daughter sits day dreaming instead of ironing her son's trousers; she thinks of modesty of gathering her skirts, of not being an object of concupiscence, (her daughter sprawls, her skirts ride up - did Father Latour see that shameless display?) but she sits with propriety, decency, ladylike and refined, thus earning a place sitting in heaven among the elect. Even the revolutionary son, in his fantasy of triumph, in the guise of a conqueror, receives the abject surrender of the maidens of Westmount and the matrons of Mount Royal, who crawl up on their knees to the chair where he dispenses justice.

Bessette's book is the most fascinating presentation I know of that symbolism of postures. It offers a devastating social comment as well as a rich psychological probe. Is the French Canadian condemned to sit? Must one sit, after kneeling so long? The characters of the book that are stirred to action are challenged by foreigners, by Sophie the Fleming, Roberto the Sicilian. The ones who wish to fit in turn to English catch phrases to assert themselves within the order. Gaetane "has first prize in English". Her revered Mademoiselle always addresses her in English (and her message is that of conformity - in English in the original - "Self respect begins with neat clothes, girls" - doesn't one hear Miss Brodie's burr?(. Roch, to improve himself "followed courses at the Industrial design Institute". For the mother, English is the tongue of the Devil, of those who invented "falsies", of painted women in the "Red light" district; but the nationalist son can find no better way to stand up after kneeling to vomit than admonishing himself "methode et determination! self control et patience!"

The cycle is therefore not an easy one to get out of (yet not necessarily a "vicious" one, not "an infernal circle" either). The novel is a survey, an epic, a tour de force of sensitive psychological writing, a microcosmic reflection of a society - and perhaps also the proof that French Canadians can get up and go and stand proudly, once they find their own expression.

Successful Year at Bitter Grounds

Bitter Grounds is closed for another year after what must be termed as a successful. We were able to bring to Queen's good Canadian entertainment and to provide a place for local talent to perform. Among the highlights of the past year were appearance by Mose Scarlett, an old friend, and an up-coming young Canadian folksinger, Dave Bradstreet. Everyone who came will remember our last two weekends - the appearances of Columbia recording artist Allan Ryan, and Dave Wiffen, who brought along Bruce Cockburn. All our performers played to full, often packed houses, and the entire committee would like to thank everyone who came up to the Grounds for their support. Also a big thank-you to everyone who worked so hard to make Grounds a success, to the old committee, and to all the media for their co-operation.

Next year we are looking forward to bringing in some bigger and better talent, and to diversifying with jazz and blues. The committee for '72-'73 is as follows - any of them would be glad to hear your ideas and suggestions. Chairman - Harry Angus, Entertainment Manager - Dave Forbes, Secretary - Charlotte Estey, Housing Manager - Dave McCreath, Technical Manager - Phil Casson, Food and Personel Manager - Gail Campbell, Advertising Manager - Georgina Pickett, and Advertising Assistants - Dale Williams, Tony Van Kessel, Rhonda Williams, and Lee Kozlik.

A newspaper is not just for reporting the news as it is, but for making people mad enough to do something about it.

Mark Twain

Parting shots ...

This is the last official issue of volume 99 of the Journal. There will be another couple of 'extras', produced by anyone who happens to be around with time on his or her hands, but our terms as editors are up.

Time ran out before we got all our editorial ideas into print, but rather than just accept that, we've decided to run a couple of mini-editorials, as follows:

Dr. Deutsch should publicly denounce the overall approach of the Wright Commission, of which he is a member, an approach which greatly de-emphasizes the role of the university as a training ground for intellectual, i.e. critical, thinking. Because Dr. Deutsch is highly respected within university circles, his criticisms of the report would cast serious doubt on the worth of the commission's report and would perhaps cause many people, including other members of the commission and members of the government, to seriously reconsider the approach to post-secondary education contained in the report.

The university, and particularly the faculty of Arts and Science, should reconsider its approach to compulsory courses. We feel that something important will be lacking in many people's educational experience here, because they will not necessarily choose certain important courses.

Courses which could well be made compulsory would include one philosophy course, any three courses which deal primarily with Canadian subject matter, and one of the special inter-disciplinary courses in human problems, if and when such courses are ever established. Philosophy is essential in teaching people how they think, the Canadian courses are essential because this is a Canadian university which is to train people to live in Canadian society, and the human problems course is essential because, after all, we are all human.

The position, Dean of Women, should be abolished, and the person now holding that position, Mrs. Reid, should be made a Dean of Students. The split between students and women is unnecessary.

All those teaching with a rank below that of lecturer should be allowed onto decision making bodies, both within their faculty, their department and the university. They make an important contribution to the university, and should be allowed a say in its affairs commensurate with that contribution. Those who have taught for a number of years, perhaps three, should also be eligible for tenure.

The Tricolor Awards Committee should reconvene to consider the name of Steve Cutway. Cutway, who was active in student government and CFRC, was nominated for an award, but his nomination was lost.

A 'u' should be added to the word Tricolor whenever it is used on this campus. This is a Canadian university and Canadian spellings, rather than American, should be used, particularly for words which play such a central role in the life of this campus.

The administration should check each year to ensure that all openings for faculty positions are advertised in University Affairs, and that they are advertised early, in order to ensure that Canadians, to whom that publication is primarily directed, have full opportunity to apply for any openings. At least one Arts department did not advertise its new positions in that publication until March, at which time it would be rather late for any new applicant to get full consideration. Severe penalties should be instituted for departments which fail to so advertise.

The library should shorten the loan period for faculty members, and set up some kind of fine system to ensure that books are returned on time. At present, faculty can safely keep out books for years.

The government should outlaw all term paper companies. If a person cannot write a decent essay by his or herself, then he or she should not be here. Moreover, the sale of term papers gives an unfair advantage to the rich, since they can purchase more and better papers.

The university should, in future, refuse to accept any scholarships which are restricted to members of only one sex. There are now three such scholarships, two restricted to women, the other to men. Academic ability should be recognized, regardless of the sex of the person displaying it, in the same way as discrimination in awards on the basis of race, religion, creed or place of national origin is now not allowed.

— Bill Johnston, Leslie Diane Kaye.

A look into the future

Careful observation and lack of judgment lead us to predict:

- that, as a tercentenary project to celebrate Kingston's 300th anniversary next year, Queen's will expropriate the entire city of Kingston, will declare itself the city council of the city, will demand of itself complete tax-exempt status, and will get it -- and even faster than they get such status now.

- that, by 1974, Doug Wright will be appointed as Chancellor and Principal of the new University of Ontario, whose board of governors will have complete control of all the formerly independent universities of Ontario. None of the former principals of the former universities will sit on the board, which will consist entirely of lay people, who, however, will not be able to outvote the chancellor.

- that, by 1975, the entire campus of what was Queen's university will be covered with concrete. In response to anguished cries from nature lovers, the grounds crew will paint large sections of it green.

- that, by that same year, USI will have taken control of the Alumni Review, Gazette, Campus, and Golden Words, giving them complete control of campus publications here.

- that, by 1976, Prof. Lazier will be able to report that graduation exercises will have been speeded up, that is, made efficient, to the extent that the average time for lauriation will be a mere 2.7 seconds, including 0.4 seconds for spontaneous applause.

- that, by 1977 co-ed residences will completely dominate the campus residences, with the exception of Chown Hall, where Dean of Women Cindy Davidson will have set up her office. Dean of Students Doug Romans will refuse any comment on the co-ed situation to the Journal, and will merely smile as he plays a tune on his bagpipes.

- that, in 1980, Defense Minister Flora MacDonald will refuse to send the army into troubled British Columbia after a kidnapping by separatist terrorists there. MacDonald will also refuse to give in to the kidnappers ransom demands, telling the kidnappers to keep their hostage, Premier WAC Bennett, The Tories popularity will soar.

- that, in 1984, Queen's will consider promoting a woman to the position of full professor - only to discover that the faculty member they had in mind is retiring at the end of the year.

- that, in 1990, the NDP federal government, under Prime Minister James Laxer, will institute a guaranteed maximum income, such that no one in Canada can earn more than $35,000. This move will prompt denunciations from the Dean of the faculty of Medicine, Norman Eshoo, who will brand the plan a plot to reduce us all to the poverty level

- that, in 1995, the 24 year old debate at Queen's on whether or not to set up a special course on human problems wll come to a sudden end, as the stench from pollution in Lake Ontario forces the closing of the Queen's branch of the University of Ontario., thus eliminating the need for any courses. The subsequent outbreak of world war III will make impossible the resumption of such discussion at any other place.

Missing library material

Dear Editors;

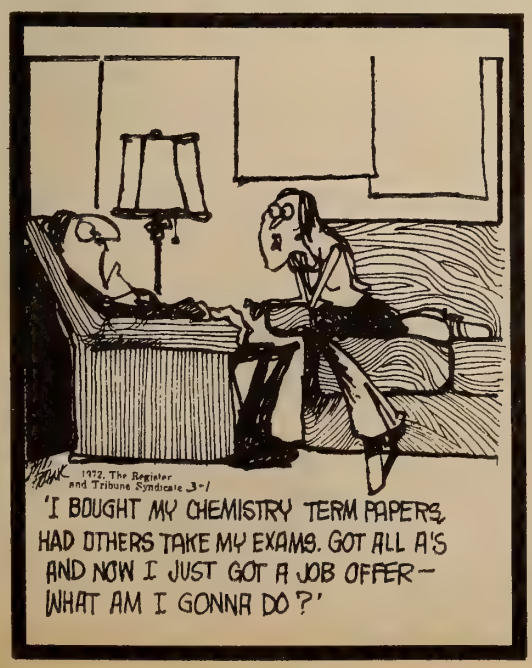
Missing and mutilated books are a problem of grave concern to all libraries. Money spent to replace such items---when they can be replaced at all!---would be better spent on more books and new subscriptions. Tight university budgets this year are not merely newspaper items. They are a real handicap in the face of rising book and periodical prices.

But more important than the money problem, to all Queen's students, should be the handicap caused by missing and mutilated volumes.

Removing library material deprives every student---except the culprit---of access to that information. In the Periodicals Room of Douglas Library, about fifty missing or mutilated items a month are reported. The library absorbs the cost, but students are the immediate losers. Even when a replacement can be located, time has been lost.

This letter is prompted by two extraordinary losses from the Periodicals Room. Would anyone who knows the whereabouts of the entire run of the Objectivist, or of a lens from one of the microfilm readers, please return them to the library. No questions will be asked.

Any of the other material that finds its way home will also be welcomed. Our red carpet is a little muddy this week.



A ripoff hurts library users first, hurts them more than it hurts the library. The library is to serve users. Users can only be served if they respect the rights of other users.

Pub dance and dishonest students

Dear Queen's Students:

I would like to thank all the people who helped put our pub dance together and who made it work. I consider the dance a success in that people enjoyed themselves. Financially we will just break even or lose a little.

The pub dance theme is a good idea if it is supported and appreciated. I will from now on be sceptical of running one unless I can show profit or break even.

It's too much work and added headaches to get nothing out of your effort. If I broke even and everyone were honest I would run a pub dance as a regular thing. This, it seems, is not the case.

We had no profit because of many factors, but the main ones that bugged me were - getting ripped off by people using phony beer tickets and people faking our stamp at the door.

I just don't like getting ripped off by the people for whom we're puttin this on. The childish mentality of the people who took advantage of us is going to screw things for people who are honest and pay for what they get.

I've talked to "friends" who beat us and they smile as they say it and think they're pretty good. At least you know who your "friends" are. So you "beat the establishment" but you're beating yourself at the same time.

We're all on the same ship and you people had better stop ripping off the sails or we're not going to get anywhere. You could say I'm pissed off - I don't mind busting my ass, but I had the shit I get in return. I really wonder why organizers keep putting events on when the appreciation they get is zero.

I like the pub dance idea. I put it on at the cheapest prices possible both at the door and on beer. If I run one again the price will go up so that it will be honest people subsidizing the mature, intelligent university students who are just so cool and who beat everyone every chance they get.

Man, it may be a dirty, shitty world out there, but I'll tell you we do mighty fine right here. And maybe because "tomorrow's leaders" are right here we do it better than the rest of society. Perhaps only the naive can be idealists.

The Swinger

Dear Editors;

I would like to say something about a caricature which appeared in the Journal of Tuesday, March 28, 1972. What I am talking about is the sketch on the back page of an ape which resembles the Prime Minister.

I am not saying anything about my political beliefs when I say this is a disgrace. Mr. Trudeau is our Prime Minister regardless of which party I support. The point is I respect the position he occupies and I also respect him because of the way he tries to appeal to the different age groups of Canada, his electorate.

Therefore I can not bring myself to see why the Journal published this trash instead of some of the other trash that it prints from time to time.

The Journal, like any other newspaper, has goals of informing and entertaining its readers. Obviously this picture is not informative and I do not think that too many readers find it entertaining. In case you have not heard this is the leader of the government and maybe, just maybe, you should try and show some damned respect (Believe me it will not hurt.)

May I suggest that if you need some fillers to take up space you can add some funnies to the rest of this comic book, or else just leave it blank and this would be as informative as the rest of the paper.

Since we, the students, are part of this paper because we attend the University, you should not print things which reflect upon the student body as a whole as well as upon yourselves.

One evening last week, a group of friends and I discovered a great new party game. It is called "Family Memories".

Family Memories can be played by any number, and in virtually any setting. The optimum number is probably about six or seven, so that everyone can take a part, but there is no harm in having non-participants act as spectators.

The game is a sort of theatre game. Basically it involves someone remembering something of the personalities of each of the people in their family, hopefully something quite isolated. A short description of each member, capturing something peculiarly characteristic about them, is ideal. The group then assigns characters to each participant, and a scene is chosen. The participants then act out the scene.

Take someone who remembers his family this way.

"My younger brother was one of the most stupid people I ever ran into. We used to call him The Cluck. My sister, who was always rather fat, was known to us as Pudgy. My father was a very formal man who used to travel a lot in connection with his business, and we rarely saw him. My mother was very authoritiarian, and was somewhat of a viscious bitch. Her father lived with us, but was inform, and we knew him as Old Turnip. Our family name was Eldridge."

The group takes this basic data, and assigns characters; a grandfather, a father, a mother, a son and a daughter. They then choose a scene, perhaps a breakfast time scene as might occur on The Donna Reed Show. They then proceed to act out the scene.

It would open with a man straightening his tie, a bow tie, and putting on a pair of tails, in a bedroom. A suitcase lies on a single bed, and black patent leather shoes lie beneath the table. In an adjacent single bed, a woman with a hair net moves suddenly under the covers, opens her eyes, and spots the man.

"Who are you," she queries sleepily.

"Good morning, Viscious Bitch," he replies stiffly.

"I am your husband, home from Cleveland for breakfast before I fly on to Halifax."

"Good morning, dear husband," she says, getting out of bed with her knees together. She goes over to him and shakes his hand, and kisses him lightly on the cheek, while he counters with a kiss on the forehead.

"It is so nice to have you back," Viscious Bitch smiles, looking quickly for her gown so as not to remain in a compromising position for long.

"It is wonderful to be back, and it has been such a long time," he says, straightening his tie for the fourth time. "Is breakfast on the way?"

They both go to the kitchen, where Viscious Bitch begins getting out eggs and other breakfast foods. Suddenly a little tyke bounds into the room, bouncing off the door jams.

"Good morning, Viscious Bitch," he shrieks, tugging her gown.

"Good morning, The Cluck. Do you remember your father, who has just arrived home?"

"Good morning The Cluck," the man in the tails says.

"Good morning, Mr. Eldridge," responds The Cluck, and the two shake hands. Mr. Eldridge pulls out a chair for The Cluck, who bounces into it, hitting his head on the edge of the table in the process. All heads then turn to the door, for there is a dragging noise in the hallway. A very large girl then walks through the door sideways.

"Good morning, Pudgy," they say in unison.

Pudgy eyes the man for a second, then turns to the woman and says, "Where is the food, Viscious Bitch?"

Viscious Bitch pats her on the head, and asks her if she remembers her father, and Mr. Eldridge and Pudgy shake hands. He pulls out a chair for her, and then on second thought puts two chairs together for her, upon which she sits.

A gaunt figure appears in the doorway, teetering precariously as if he were about to topple into a pile of bones.

"Good morning, Old Turnip," they all chime, with the exception of Pudgy, who gongs.

"Lovely day," Old Turnip wheezes, shuffling over to Viscious Bitch, who he attempts to kiss on the forehead, but due to a sudden teeter lands the kiss on the blender.

"Wonderful to see you again, Old Turnip," offers Mr. Eldridge, putting out his hand to the old gentleman.

"Lovely day," says Old Turnip, reaching for the hand, but grabbed by another teeter he turns on the oven by mistake. He turns to pat The Cluck on the head, but crushes the eggs instead, and he then goes to pat Pudgy's cheek, but she is so hungry that she bites his band, mistaking it for barbecued chicken wings.

After a breakfast of banal chattering, everyone talking at once, Mr. Eldridge puts on his top hat, grabs his suitcase, and the family forms a line at the door. Viscious Bitch shakes his hand and kisses his cheek, and asks him if he has his tickets. The Cluck bounces about, repeatedly asking Mr. Elridge to bring him something, and Pudgy leans against the wall, munching crusts from the toast. Old Turnip postulates for the thirty-second time that it is a lovely day. Mr. Eldridge bows, leaves a parting aphorism, and exits. The scene is over.

And the glory of it is that any number can play.

If the Messiah were indeed to return and wipe out all diseases, physical and mental, and do away with all man's inhumanity to man, then I, Lenny Bruce a comedian who has thrived both economically and egotistically upon the corruption and cruelty he condemns with humour, who spouted impassioned pleas to spare the life of Caryl Chessman and Adolf Eichmann alike, who professed the desire to propagate assimilation and thereby evolve integration would in truth know that I had been a parasite whose structure of success depended on despair: like J. Edgar Hoover and Jonas Salk, like the trustees, wardens, death-house maintenance men, millions of policemen, uniform makers, court recorders, criminal-court judges, probation officers and district attorneys whose children joyously unwrap Christmas presents under the tree bought with money earned by keeping other men from seeing their child's face beam at a cotton angel, who would have been without jobs if no one in the world had ever violated the law; like the Owl-Rexall-Thrifty Drugstores, crutch makers, neurological surgeons and Parke-Lilly employees on the roof of the Squibb pharmaceutical house, ready to jump because the blind can see, the deaf can hear, the lame can walk; like the ban-the-bomb people who find out there really is no bomb to ban and they don't know what to do with their pamphlets. The dust would gather on all the people who hold that superior moral position of serving humanity, for they will have become aware that their very existence, creative ability and symbolic status had depended wholly upon intellectual dishonesty. For there is no anonymous giver, except perhaps the guy who knocks up your daughter.

Smoke coming from old boiler

An out-of-date coal-fired boiler at the Queen's heating plant is producing black smoke which has government pollution control engineers concerned.

But the university is not being charged with pollution because the noxious gases emitted are not "gross enough" to warrant action, according to the air management branch of the Ontario department of the environment.

The old boiler is in use because the newest, biggest boiler has been shut down for alterations by its manufacturer, Canadian Vickers Ltd., according to Queen's physical plant director C. W. Jones. He said it should be back in use this week.

Government engineer Gordon Thom said the temporary problem is "one of those things that can't be avoided".

"If the emissions from the old boiler were gross enough we could order a shut-down of the plant," he said, "but in this case, while the puffs of smoke are noticeable, there is not an extreme amount of noxious effluent."

Jones said the problem is not a continuous one, but happens when there are "changes in load and at times of heat release and cleaning of tubes" from time to time.

City hesitant to grant Queen's use of parks

The Kingston city parks committee expressed fear last week that a Queen's request to use parks for athletic fields is the beginning of a university takeover of City Park and the Cricket Field just east of Barrie Street.

Queen's officials asked permission to use the Cricket Field and part of McCullough Park, near the west campus, for outdoor sports this summer and fall, while the lower campus is torn up for construction of a parking garage and the outer field is in use as a construction site for the arts social sciences complex.

Several aldermen were opposed.

"It was not too many years ago that we were promised by Queen's that they would never expand onto Barrie Street," said alderman George Speal. "Take a look at where they are now."

He said the question should be taken to city council where everyone could express a view. "This is not something any one committee should rule on."

Speal said the request might represent "a foot in the door" to further expansion which Kingston residents might oppose.

He said, "From a psychological point of view, they may already have taken over the Cricket Field and City Park. Look how close they are now."

Alderman George Vosper pointed out that "over the years the university has been very generous" in letting Kingstonians use Queen's recreational facilities.

But, he said, "it is quite possible that the field could very easily become the centre of the campus".

The parks committee agreed to a minor point in the Queen's request -- that some city softball diamonds be available for Queen's use from time to time during the summer -- but hesitated on the rest.

It accepted a suggestion that other aldermen, as well as city individuals and organizations, be asked to comment on the proposal.

The committee will meet next Wednesday to consider the proposal again.

"We're here to help students," exam proctors say

"Exam proctors are just here to help the students," chief proctor Ralfe J. Clench, Jr., declared last week.

And his assistant, J. L. Murray, echoed his words in a Journal interview as 1972 spring exams began Monday.

"To help the students -- this is the chief idea," Murray said. "The purpose of the proctor is not to be a policeman. We don't have our proctors going around peering at people."

Instead, he explained, they look after the comfort of students writing examinations, providing paper, keeping down noise, and following the other exam rules which exist to give students an opportunity to do their best.

Murray said the Jock Harty Arena, which at 706 seats is the biggest exam hall at Queen's, is an excellent hall for the purpose, with bright hockey lights almost eliminating shadows, and with a fine public address system. "You couldn't get a much more ideal examination hall."

Murray will supervise the twelve proctors who look after the arena when it is in full use, and the proctors at Grant Hall, Ellis Hall, the gymnasium and Jackson Hall.

Though the exam system is hyper-organized from the Richardson Hall offices where the Ralfe Clench legend centres, its whole purpose is the benefit of students, Murray said. He cited as an example the big blue X on the back of each exam book; it shows through the last inside page so that a patrolling proctor can tell when a student has almost finished the book and will need another.

He also mentioned the rule, sometimes criticized, that no one may leave an exam hall during the final fifteen minutes of the exam. It is to prevent disturbances that might break a students train of thought, he said: "I have seen a number of candidates writing desperately right up till the bell went."

Ralfe J. Clench, Jr.

He pointed out that a warning is given five minutes before that rule goes into effect, so that a student who is virtually finished has a chance to leave the hall.

The attendance card which a student must fill out at each exam has a similar purpose, Murray said: it proves he was at the exam in case the professor should lose his paper afterwards.

Exam papers should be handed in at the exit to the hall, he said, not left on an exam desk.

A student who arrives up to half an hour late can start his exam without difficulty, Murray said, though he may be asked to write it in a separate room so he can have the full three-hour time without tying up the arena or gymnasium.

After half an hour he can write the exam only if he signs a statement of his tardiness, indicating he knows his exam may not be counted, Murray said.

And if a student misses his exam altogether he should see his professor, not the exam proctors, about the matter, he said.

He stressed that in the end an examination is a dealing between the professor and the student; exam proctors are just there to make the dealing as easy as possible.

SUMMER'S COMING...
Where will you be?
List it in the
Summer Who's Where

Who's Where in the Summer will list the addresses of Queen's students staying in Kingston. Fill out a card at Douglas Library, Victoria Hall desk, Gordon-Brockington desk, or the AMS Office between now and April 29.

If you will be somewhere outside Kingston, but not at your permanent address as listed in the winter Who's Where, you can have that address listed in the same way.

Who's Where in the Summer will be distributed free in mid-May.

LEAVING?
Get your Journal by mail

The Queen's Journal will be publishing through the summer this year, for the first time ever. Students who will be away from campus may receive copies regularly by mail, at a cost of $1 for the full summer.

We don't know yet how many issues there will be: maybe once a month, on the average, maybe as often as once a week. But you can get them all, mailed as soon as they appear on campus.

Send your dollar now -- with your name, summer mailing address, and student number -- to Summer Mailings, The Queen's Journal, Students' Memorial Union, by campus or regular mail.

Mailing addresses and dollars will only be accepted in this way; please do not bring them to the Journal office.

Don't forget Tricolor

If you won't be back in the fall, have your copy of Tricolor 72 mailed to you in September. Mailing labels are just $1 at the AMS office in the Union.

If you're going to be back in the fall, save your pink student card. You'll need it to pick up your Tricolor if you haven't paid to have it mailed.

FACULTY MEMBERS

Students of Queen's each pay $3 every year for their copies of The Queen's Journal. This student subsidy makes up roughly half the Journal's budget. None of The Journal's money comes from Queen's University (except for a few advertisements).

We welcome faculty readers, but we would like to remind them that they have made no contribution to the costs of the paper. During the summer, when faculty make up a higher percentage of our readers, we invite them to share the costs of producing the newspaper.

Is $3 too much for a clear conscience and a year of participation in The Journal?

Cheques may be sent to The Queen's Journal, Students' Memorial Union, Queen's.

Canada being "eroded", speaker says

"The foundations of Canadian sovereignty are being swiftly eroded," Flora Macdonald said at the annual Inter-Residence Council banquet Wednesday night.

Miss Macdonald, who was a founding member of the Committee for an Independent Canada will run in the next Federal election as the Conservative party candidate for Kingston and the islands.

The selling out of Canada was the subject of the speech she delivered to a group of fifty people attending the banquet. "If Prince Edward Island continues to sell land at the present rate, 50 per cent will be owned by American residents by 1980," she pointed out. To prevent this the Canadian government must place a tax on the sale of land to foreigners she suggested.

Miss MacDonald also commented that a comprehensive programme for controlling foreign investment was necessary in Canada. She agreed with the recommendations of the Gray report concerning the screening of foreign ownership but added that the scheme was not new.

"We have been nice too long," she said. The government must actively involve itself in freeing the Canadian economy from foreign hands.

The Canadian Bureau of Statistics shows that foreign investment controls 2-3 of our primary resource industries and 3-5 of our secondary industry. 4-5 of the investment in secondary industry is American and this trend is on the increase.

Miss MacDonald also suggested that a tax be placed on exports of raw materials. This would ensure that more processing is done in Canada, subsequently creating more jobs for Canadians. "We should encourage foreign direct investment to be converted to debt," she said.

McClelland and Stewart Publishers was cited as an example of the problem which is plaguing Canadian industry. The company needed a million dollar loan but was unable to raise it from any Canadian bank. The Ontario government subsequently granted them $980,000 last year with the result that they have now extricated themselves from financial difficulty.

"A nation's first defence is a belief in itself," she claimed and added "we need a national leadership that dares to reject and that has a desire to preserve what is deep within us."

In the question period Miss MacDonald was questioned about the influence of party funds in the formation of party policies. She replied that she had long supported the opening of party books. "Contributions to party funds are not significant enough to influence decision making, but I endorse full disclosure to destroy that myth." she said.

Arts 72 gives trees

The graduating arts and science class is using part of its money to plant trees on campus, and the rest to augment the university's loan funds.

Arts 72 treasurer John Scott has announced that $250 of the year's remaining funds will buy white oak trees which will form part of the landscaping of the new arts-social sciences complex.

The landscaping designer has been consulted and the senate grounds sub-committee has approved, said project coordinator Peter Andrews, who added that a plaque will be set up indicating the source of the gift.

It is tentatively to be unveiled when Arts 72 has its first reunion in October 1976.

The rest of the funds, about $400, will go into the short-term loan fund administered by the assistant registrar for student awards. Students can have low-interest loans from this fund over short periods, but funds for arts and science students have been scarce in recent years.

It is hoped that 1972 graduates will make private donations to the same fund in the future, increasing the size of the earmarked Arts 72 donation.

Grads students protest fee increase

Ontario graduate students and university leaders both declared Friday that the doubling of graduate fees imposed by the recent Ontario budget will be hard on both universities and students.

Graduate Student Society president Doug Pritchard said the Canadian Union of Graduate Students protested the "ridiculously short notice" of the increase from $485 to $877 of twelve-month graduate tuition fees, and pointed out that the increase would drive financially disadvantaged students out of graduate school altogether.

And, he said, "half a Ph.D. isn't worth much."

Pritchard said the Council of Ontario Universities, meeting at the same time in Waterloo, expressed "reasonably strong" opposition to the increase and agreed to explore all possible avenues to stop it.

One possibility, he said, was an end to the limits imposed on graduate students' income -- such as the $1800 maximum a teaching assistant can be paid.

Pritchard also said he thought the fee increase had come as a surprise to the Committee on University Affairs, the buffer body for university-government dealings, and possibly to some government officials as well.

A meeting Tuesday of the Queen's Graduate Council discussed ways of combatting the increase, and Pritchard said the university would try to pressure the government and would consider asking the income ceilings be raised and limiting recruitment of graduate students.

The Canadian Union of Graduate Students meets at Queen's May 19 to 21 and the matter will be discussed then as well.

Briefs about this, that

Wright briefs

The Commission on Post-Secondary Education in Ontario -- the controversial Wright Commission -- has announced that it will accept written reactions to its preliminary report until May 30.

Because of "the overwhelming response to the Draft Report" the deadline has been extended for two months, a commission statement said.

The commission can be reached at suite 203, 505 University Avenue, Toronto 101.

Union loses

Canadian Union of Public Employees has lost its battle to unionize the five staff members of the Queen's public relations department.

The Ontario Labour Relations Board ruled last week that the department was not a suitable bargaining unit. It indicated that a more suitable unit would be clerical staff across the campus.

CUPE already has one local at Queen's: non-professional library staff.

Gym coach named

Queen's gymnastics coach Barry Brooker has been named as the coach of the Canadian Olympic gymnastics team at Munich this August. Brooker, 30, is a former Olympian and has spent the last two years at Queen's. During this time, the quality of gymnastics competition at Queen's has improved by several orders of magnitude. Brooker's abilities as a coach have obviously not been lost on Canadian Olympic Officials.

The plain truth about today's top cult

by Leslie K. Tarr
Administrator of Central Baptist Seminary, Toronto.

And who is Herbert W. Armstrong? Why, he's the founder of the World-wide Church of God. It has 70,000 members in 200 North American centres, though you'll never find it in the telephone book. Its annual income from givings is $34 million - twice that of Billy Graham's association, more than three times that of the national United Church - and going up 12 per cent every year. Armstrong claims that the beginning of his ministry in 1934 was the key towards fulfilling "90 per cent of all the prophecies in the Bible".

Since that earth-shaking day, Armstrong's individual blend of teaching has been heard by millions every week on radio and television and read by two million every month through his slick, full-color magazine Plain Truth distributed free in five languages.

Forty radio stations in nine Canadian provinces are among the 300 which broadcast his daily half-hour program, "The World Tomorrow". The broadcast now features Garner Ted Armstrong, the founder's fast-talking, sound-alike son. A weekly half-hour telecast also is carried on stations in nine provinces, frequently on prime time.

"The World Tomorrow" is heard at 10 p.m. Sundays on CKWS, Kingston (960 kc). Until last month the broadcast was daily, but weekday programmes were stopped "at their request", a CKWS spokesman told The Journal.

Success should not be surprising if Armstrong's claims about his church are true. Since he began with a 15-minute broadcast over a 100-watt radio station in Eugene, Oregon, Armstrong has insisted that he and his church were "merely poor human instruments in the very work of the Almighty Living God, preparing the WAY! Even now, this work is changing the lives of thousands every year. Soon, under the world-ruling Government of God, it will result in not only CHANGING THE WORLD, but also in SAVING THE WORLD."

Lest anyone hearing those claims has misgivings about the Worldwide Church of God, the founder adds that all other churches are "satanic counterfeits".

The true message, which has been in such short supply and has only recently been resurrected by Armstrong, turns out to be an interesting amalgam of borrowed beliefs from Seventh Day Adventists, British Israelites, Jehovah's Witnesses and Mormons. The founder of the Worldwide Church of God has welded them together to form a distinctive and marketable product.

Armstrong contends, as do the Seventh Day Adventists, that Saturday, not Sunday, is the true day of worship. Anybody who observes Sunday, says Armstrong, is disobedient to God and is not a true Christian. Such a person has "the mark of the beast".

From the British Israelites, he borrows the concept that Britain and America are actually the lost tribes of Manasseh and Ephraim. Hence all of the predicted splendor that was to be the inheritance of Israel has been transferred to the Anglo-Saxon world. The throne of England, insists Armstrong, is actually the literal throne of David.

From the Jehovah's Witnesses and their historic predecessors, Armstrong seems to have taken the rejection of the traditional Christian view of the Trinity.

Also like the Jehovah's Witnesses, he rejects the concept of the physical resurrection of Christ. Some liberals too, doubt the physical resurrection - but Armstrong professes to accept a rigid, literal view of the Bible's teaching.

> "In these last days when the gospel must go around the world, Jesus chose a man amply trained in the advertising and business fields to shoulder the mission -- Herbert W. Armstrong."

He appears indebted to the Mormons for the teaching that an obedient disciple of the movement will become God. "The purpose of your being alive," he assures followers, "is that finally you be born into the Kingdon of God, where you will actually be God, even as Jesus was and is God, and His Father, a different Person, also is God!"

The Armstrongs do not serve this heady mixture in large, undiluted doses on their programs. Instead, the radio and television presentations are more likely to deal with contemporary issues such as family breakdown, the ecological crisis, the drug proglem, juvenile delinquency, or technology - complete with rapid-fire Armstrong commentary and slams against others' attempts to tackle these issues.

A recent issue of Plain Truth further exhibits this soft-sell, contemporary approach. The main article dealt with the subcontinent of India and prominently features a picture of Herbert W. Armstrong chatting with Indian Prime Minister Indira Gandhi. Name-dropping, coupled with superficially issue-oriented presentations, impresses readers and establishes Armstrong as an international figure and modern prophet.

Recently I heard Garner Ted Armstrong on the car radio - how can you escape him? He told his listeners that newspapers and newsmagazines reported events that had happened, and television or radio news could sometimes manage to report news as it was happening. But, he contended, he and his associates reported events before they happened!

The programs and the slick literature are bait to lure people into investigating further. Listeners who write to the Canadian office in Vancouver or the world headquarters in Pasadena, Calif., receive a free subscription to Plain Truth. As they read the superbly-produced 48-page magazine, they will notice mention of another magazine, Tomorrow's World, and of Bible correspondence courses.

If they write about the second magazine or enrol in one of the mail courses, they will see references to "co-workers" whose generous financial support makes possible the vast broadcasting and literature ministry which presumably they have appreciated.

If they write indicating further interest or appreciation, a pastor or elder will call at the home to tell about the closest local meeting, whose location until then has been a closely-guarded secret.

These weekly area meetings, conducted in 200 major centres across Canada and the United States, are held in rented premises on Saturdays. Since devoted followers are expected to give at least a tenth of their gross income to the Worldwide Church of God, the only true church, large offerings are received.

Those offerings are forwarded in their entirety to headquarters in Pasadena. With no overhead for church buildings, programs, and usual congregational expenses, the Worldwide Church of God can pour all its $34 million income into publishing, radio, and television to disseminate Armstrong's unique views.

And lest followers be tempted to give a portion of their money elsewhere, they are delicately reminded: "To give to a different church would be worse than not giving at all!"

Don't search in a yearbook of denominations for a listing of the Worldwide Church of God. It's not there.

> Its income is twice as big as that of the Billy Graham organization. Its magazine is read by two million people. Its theology mixes at least four Christian and pseudo-Christian sects. It is the Worldwide Church of God, and its founder considers himself the successor to Jesus and Paul.

Nor can you find it in the yellow pages of the telephone book or advertised on Saturday's church page.

You see, despite that intensive radio coverage and an incredible literature output, the Armstrongs want to maintain secrecy about their local meetings to guarantee that only the dedicated attend. There's no room for dialogue or probing questions in their system.

How can we account for the success of the Worldwide Church of God and its related enterprises?

Some members of liberal churches long for more authoritative leadership from their ministers. They want definite answers. The dogmatic, articulate Armstrongs supply confident, no-nonsense affirmations.

Any reader of Armstrong literature becomes aware of his over-kill in the use of CAPITAL LETTERS, italics, and exclamation marks!!!! His dogmatism is evident from a glance at a page where the emphatic overwhelms the ordinary.

His appeal to evangelicals must be that he makes his message appear relevant to the times and thereby strikes a note often lacking in evangelical circles. His literature and the content of his message indicate that he must have a good research staff. He alludes to contemporary problems and happenings with familiarity. Anyone who had an uneasy feeling that his own evangelical faith is overly other-worldly would perk up his ears.

Finally, it's all FREE! The 70,000 members who attend those secret Saturday enclaves make it possible for the Worldwide Church of God to ship out tons of free first-class literature to all inquirers. Of course, if the inquirer bites, he'll share in paying the bills.

Time may be running out for those enquirers. According to Armstrong's chronology, 1972 is a year of destiny.

Here's his reasoning. "God marks off time spaces. . .by the movement of the earth, the moon, and the sun in relation to one another. . . . Also God divides time into 19 year time cycles - for every 19 years these three bodies come into exact conjunction."

Armstrong "proves" his theory this way: 19 years after Paul's conversion, the way was opened for him to preach the gospel in Europe. Nineteen years later, Jerusalem was captured by the Romans. Darkness settled over the earth until Armstrong began that 15-minute broadcast in 1934.

Nineteen years after that dramatic entry on the world scene, in 1953, the door was opened for preaching the "true gospel" to Europe over Radio Luxembourg.

And 19 years from 1953 brings us to 1972. Something akin to the destruction of Jerusalem or worse can be expected.

Lest there be doubters, Armstrong engages in further calculations. Since a day with God is as a thousand years, he asserts, the 6,000 years of the earth's history to date (he accepts Archbishop Ussher's pinpointing of creation at 4004 B.C.) are equivalent to the first six days of God's creative activity. Next ahead comes the seventh day, the day of rest or the thousand years of the millennial kingdom. Simple, isn't it?

An Experiment in Creative Dance

By Sur Denim

On April 13th and 14th at 8:30 p.m. there will be a free presentation of three original compositions for modern dance in the Studio Theatre (room 102) at the Queen's Drama Department.

Allen Rasdill, Tony Morgan, Pam Arder and Nancy Wilson, who have been working with Sandra Aitken on modern dance and improvized movement since January, will be using their physical training and discipline, as well as their sensitivity to sounds, both environmental and electronic, to create an improvizational experiment which will result in a "visualization of music".

Bill Buxton has composed both electronic and instrumental pieces which the dancers will not have heard. They will react spontaneously to the music, their bodies syphoning the sounds around them and counterpointing the determinate factors of taped electronic patterns and instrumental accompaniment.

Sandra Aitken will be performing a solo to a totally controlled electronic piece. In another composition, the four dancers will be restricted to three movement patterns and the instrumentalists; saxaphone, accordion, flute and string bass, will also be restricted to three musical patterns. What will happen is that, theoretically, the dancers will be choreographed automatically to the music, without any routine rehearsal.

This program will be an exciting one both musically and visually. The concept and the production should be of great interest to anyone who is interested in the experimental aspects of the arts.

Radio Drama Workshops Offered

Two Radio-Drama Workshops will be offered this summer, corresponding to the Intersessional and Summer Schools at Queen's. The purpose of the Workshops is to provide practice in the techniques of Radio acting, and to encourage and promote the use of creative imagination. The writing of Radio plays will be encouraged, and participants will have ample opportunity to continue producing and acting after the Workshops themselves are over.

Each Workshop will be limited to 15 people, with selections being made on the basis of future interest. Applications may be directed to Russ Waller of the Drama Department, or to Suzanne Atkinson through CFRC.

The deadline for applications is April 18, and at 8 p.m. on the evening of the 18th there will be an organizational meeting at the CFRC Radio Station, in the basement of Carruthers Hall. Persons unable to attend this meeting should note this on their applications, or contact Russ Waller or Suzanne Atkinson personally.

There is no fee for the Workshops, which are offered through the facilities of Radio Station CFRC. Instruction is being offered by Russ Waller, Norma Edwards and John Burgess.

The Workshops are of 6 weeks duration, and will be held two evenings a week, on Mondays and Wednesdays.

Faculty Women's Club

THE ANNUAL GENERAL MEETING of the Faculty Women's Club will again take the form of a DINNER to be held on Wednesday, April 19, at 6:00 p.m. in the Faculty Club, King Street.

At 9:00 there will be a free recital by concert pianist Valery Watts in Dunning Hall. This performance is being sponsored jointly by the Faculty Women's Club and the Queen's Music Department.

Mrs. Watts, who is currently a studio instructor in the Music Department at Queen's, is an Associate of the Royal Conservatory of Music, Canada, and the Royal College of Music, England, and a Licentiate of the Royal Academy of Music, England. She has a Master of Music degree from the University of Wisconsin and is currently enrolled as a Doctor of Music Arts candidate at that University. Winner of eighteen scholarships and awards including the premiere B.B.C. broadcast performance of the Fricker Toccata for piano and orchestra with the Royal Liverpool Philharmonic orchestra under John Pritchard. The program of Baroque Music she will play is a preview of the one she will give in Madison, Wisconsin, the following week in partial fulfillment of the requirements for her doctorate. Bach, Mozart, Haydn and Soler are included in her program.

Rebecca Penney's concert scheduled for April 14 has been cancelled due to illness. Refunds will be made at the Division of Concerts.

The scheduled production of Harold Pinter's "The Caretaker" which was to run from Wednesday April 19th to Saturday April 22nd in the Convocation Hall has been cancelled.

Straw Dogs Catch Fire

By Paul A. Gompertz

The first time I saw this movie I was tempted to leave before the end, as I wasn't sure I could take any more; indeed, by the end, I was shaking with the tension that had been generated. I hoped that a second viewing would prove that it was only the film's shock value that had achieved this, and when I was proved wrong, I was left with the problem of analysing the movie, and not knowing where to start.

Peckinpah and violence are becoming synonymous; the Wild Bunch was as brutal a study as Straw Dogs, and yet it did not have the same impact. A comparison of these two movies immediately suggests some of the sources of the power of Straw Dogs. Firstly, the Wild Bunch was a western, and death by six-shooter, no matter how vividly depicted, is too much a common place in film tradition. Thus the parallel use of slow motion deaths produces vastly different reactions. In the Wild Bunch, it is evaluated as a piece of virtuosity, a new way to settle old themes, and the death implications are easily ignored. Moreover, one expects death in a western, and it is in a sense in harmony with the action.

Death on Straw Dogs is discordant and out of place, and the movie takes the smallest and quietest of villages as a setting, so that the subsequent cacophony of death will be the louder. The slow motion death of an 'ordinary' person blasted at point blank range by a shot-gun is far removed from the 'serenity' of the Wild Bunch.

Secondly, the violence in the Wild Bunch is both general and expansive. There is little direct reaction evoked between audience and violated character, so all brutality can be watched objectively. Even the outdoor setting helps to dissipate the intensity, and makes the periods between killings relatively tranquil as the scene shifts.

Straw Dogs denies both these possibilities for escape. The audience is forced, or at least required, to associate with one character, the one who is both trapped and under attack. The single scene, inside his house, produces a heavy claustrophobia which transmits itself to the spectator.

It would seem, then the prime difference is that Straw Dogs enlists human sympathies in a way which Wild Bunch does not. It is more real, more believable, and there is little comfort to be had from chanting 'Remember it is only a movie' (I know, I tried it, to the consternation of those sitting around me!) The strength of all the performances in the film add greatly to its immediacy. Dustin Hoffman is perfect as the academic American, David Sumner; and Susan George gives an all too believable performance as his wife, Amy. Her rape in particular is horribly vivid, and, if you care, very disturbing, for one feels not only the impotence of her husband, but one's own possible inadequacy in such a situation.

Straw Dogs, then achieves what it sets out to do. It is an intense, harrowing and very frightening movie that succeeds where the Wild Bunch failed. The most important question is whether this type of movie has any validity. It achieved an effect, but did it do more? It certainly cannot claim to be nothing more than entertainment; and yet it does not seem to attempt to relate itself to individual experience in any but the most general way.

I am forced to admit I still do not know how valid the movie is, for powerful as it is, that alone does not justify it. I suspect that it may be taking advantage, very deliberately, of a simple faculty for emotive reaction, and that its aims are no more elevated than that.

I have perhaps discussed motivation at the expense of plot, acting, etc., but every film tends to raise one particular issue more than others, and the raison d'etre of this one has bothered me for a long time. Hence I make no excuses, but would urge that it is well worth seeing. It is either very good or very bad, but either way it is an experience to be undergone at all costs.

letter

Dear Editors:

After meeting the requirements for a Bews athletic letter, I was more than a little peeved to find out that, for the second year in a row, no letters were to be awarded to those in Arts and Science who earned them. As always, at the Bews banquet, those athletes in Applied Science and Commerce were awarded their letters. Not so for the Artsies. I was informed that, due to the fact that the ASUS would (could?) not provide the funds for their purchase, even though money was supposedly budgeted for this purpose, no Arts letters would be awarded. I find it funny that the largest undergraduate society at Queen's cannot afford the letters that other societies can.

There are a few problems posed by the fact that no letters have been awarded for the past two years. The first concerns those graduating. It would be nice to be presented your letter while you are still a student. And even though it is too late to acquire the letters this year, what is to be done about next year? Will the letters won in previous years be presented in the beginning of next year (a good idea in my opinion) or will the ASUS budget enough (for real this time) to pay for all three years at the next year's Bews banquet? I would appreciate it if the ASUS would reply.

If this keeps up, there won't be any Arts Faculty letters left on campus.

Rick Smith.

sports comment

by Chris Boon
Sports editor

With reference to the accompanying letter from Rick Smith, it appears that A.S.U.S. has made another of its famous, unannounced, non-decisions; namely, those in charge of finances have deemed support and recognition of mere intramural athletes as being beneath the aims of such a high-minded, intellectual organization. Of course, this decision was not well publicized, and if Mr. Smith is correct in his statement regarding the original budget allotment, it was never officially taken. Which brings up another point. If money was originally budgeted for the purchase of crests, and no crests were purchased, then what was the money used for? It seems to me that if this money was re-allotted without consulting the people concerned, then those in charge are guilty of a blatant misuse of funds, not to mention an inexcuseably arrogant attitude to a sizeable portion of the A.S.U.S. constituency.

At any rate, if A.S.U.S. is dealing themselves out of intramural athletics, then the decision should be taken officially, and the whole matter put before Arts and Science students as a whole to decide. The results might be interesting.

by Alan Broadbent

Exam time is a very revealing time of the year. When the spring comes around, and the final examinations of the academic year are due to be brutalized, the basic nature of almost everyone in the university community comes out.

This is largely because it is the only real pressure point during the year for most people at the university. Cool veneers which have stood their occupants in such fine stead for eight months begin to crack and wear, gradually falling in a disparate pile around tremulous ankles.

For many students, the examination experience is outrightly embarrassing. Their pastel vestments give way to primary scratches and blotches. Previously hip and carefree hordes shed their poppish attire and appear in jeans and sweaters, hair in frantic array, as they trek the now timeworn path from library to coffee shop and back again.

The game has gone into the final minutes for them, and they are overly aware that they need a touchdown, or at least a long field-goal, to pull it out of the fire. Having happily drifted down the academic sidelines for most of the year, they suddenly find that an examining defensive back has the angle cut down on them, and they desperately try to turn towards the centre of the field.

These students tend to become wild eyed and frantic at examination time. They dispel the usual assemblage of pleasantries and banalities that have accounted for the fringes of their social life for the past year, and raw emotions leap to the fore. They are so caught up in the desperation of their efforts that the subjugate the external world to the pain of their internal turmoil.

As mentioned, physical appearances disintegrate as well. This can be observed as a progression, for it is somewhat of a gradual process. Hair is generally the first to go. It becomes dirty first, due to the strain of washing. Showers, of course, are out of the question, for the beating of water on the naked body is a needless premonition of what the examination will hold. The clothes are the next to fall, for one does not get to do a laundry in the heat of the inquisitor's gaze. Old shirts and pants which have hidden in the darkness of trunks for a year suddenly re-enter the world, looking dazed by the seldom seen sunlight. Beards grow, dirt cakes, ink marks proliferate; the disintegration process is in full swing.

This is also a time when faculty members show their true colours. One of the major ways in which they do this is by the examinations they set. Some formulate the most pompous questions that ever crossed a copying machine. Others delight in boggling students with whimsy or intellectual cosmopolitanism, while still other sparsely decorate the examination paper with tedious simplicity. It is always interesting to walk down faculty office corridors when professors are in the process of composing examinations. Some are jotting and carefree, some are smuggly revelling in their graduate school knowledge, while others are intensely poring over esoteric reference material, looking for that obscure quote which they can ask students to comment on. Unemployed psychiatrists doubtless find great enjoyment in analyzing examinations, imagining the fascinating complexes which populate the minds of those who have composed them.

The pressure of examination time extends to the administrators as well. They are the ones who must cope with 900 people appearing at the door of Stirling Hall "D" lecture room, which holds considerably less than that number. They are the people who must receive a telephone call from an obviously harassed vigilator (a word from the Latin, meaning those who drink coffee, smoke cigarettes, and talk in deafening whispers) who has 58 French students and 235 geology examinations. It is they who must tell a professor of Russian that he cannot have his examination held in the arena with no-one else present.

This makes it the time of year most difficult to phone someone in the administration and have a well reasoned discussion with them. They are moving with the speed of a lazy squirrel seeing the first snows of an early winter. They are a flurry of motion, one moment in Grant Hall counting chairs, the next in a classroom in Carruthers Hall measuring distance between desks.

The grip of examinations is almost total. It demands students, faculty, and administrators. It squeezes, twists, pulls, and flogs, until at the end of the examination period there is a collective sigh of relief, and an ensuing calm that exists for almost a year.

Graduate fees and women

Dear Editors:

I reserved a guest room in the Students' Memorial Union for the evening of April 6th for the Assistant Registrar of Trent University. To be quite frank, I was happy with the rate -- $5.50 a night. It was to say the least cheap. Unfortunately so were the accomodations as I was to discover much to my chagrin.

That evening, I proudly showed my guest to his room and sat down to talk over the events of that evening. But we were continually being interrupted. Living in the Students' Union myself, I have grown accustomed to all sorts of interruptions at all hours of the day. However, the interruptions in my case are usually of human origin. The interruptions in Room No. 3 were caused by a happy family of silverfish. After stepping on six or seven of the adult members of the family, we proceeded to step on six or seven of the young ones. It was like trying to fight the Chinese Red Army with a worn-out boot -- THEY JUST KEPT COMING!

When I informed the office next morning of this happening, I overheard a caretaker say "they don't hurt anybody." Remind me to stay the night at his house. Yes, I paid my $5.50 and my guest fled home to a D.D.T. shower after a "restful night at the Ritz."

Perhaps the Union could spend the $5.50 on a large can of Raid or Black Flag or perhaps they could install a hammer in every room or perhaps they could clean the rooms properly and save a lot of embarassment for everyone. After all doesn't the reputation of Queen's University at Kingston (established 1841) mean anything? Or is the whole University going to the dogs or rather the silverfish?

Health sci. library theft

Dear Editors:

There is evidence at the Health Science Library, and we are sure at every other library on campus, of an endemic outbreak of a disease, seen usually prior to exams and assignment due dates. This disease is characterized by: disappearing books, bound journals and magazines from the shelves, destruction of information a whole class may need by removal of a picture or article from a publication, and deliberate vandalism of library property and premises. Sometimes, a major symptom subsides and long lost books reappear, but usually the disease manifests itself in a chronic form. It is incurable.

We are very concerned as to the extent of the 'disease'. Miss Parker, the head librarian, has spoken to us about the present situation. This year is apparently the worst yet at Queen's. What can be done, she asked us?

As a faculty, we would like to hope that Queen's students, grads and profs are mature enough to work efficiently within the established system. We have a lot of freedom with the use of Health Science Library facilities and would like to keep this freedom. As usual, it is a minority which makes life hard on the rest of the student body, and the minority is probably not even reading this letter. But to all concerned, we ask: Think of your poor struggling fellow student, who is left in quite a predicament if the only copy of a book or magazine he (she) needs is listed 'presence unknown'. It is exam time and each of us needs all the help we can get. Please don't make it harder on us all.

Grad Residence bugged

Dear Editors:

Inspired by Leslie Kaye's article in Tuesday's Journal, "Queen's Women are Getting Together", and by the comments about graduate fees, made by Doug Pritchard, we would like to point out some further ramifications of the coming increases in graduate fees.

As mentioned, an unmarried graduate student with an average income of $3200 per year from grants and teaching assistantships will lose 20 per cent of that money in taxes, fee increases, etc. The same is true, however, of a grad student with a working husband, although she would be in a better position to absorb the loss than a grad student with a non-working husband. For the grad with a non-working husband will lose about 10 per cent of her income in recent increases, based on a 3 per cent increase in the cost of living.

The subsistence level of $5300 for a student with a working husband should be accessible, but a grad with a non-working husband would never make ends meet.

Long live the working husband!

Agnes Whitfield
Maureen Ball

P.S: Of course, these further ramifications will only apply to 16.3 per cent of grad students.

AMS constables "clique"

Dear Editors:

It appears that the clique syndrome has struck again! The choosing of the AMS constables seems to have been made merely on the basis of a very impersonal application (age, rank and serial number is not too much to go on). Such a position of responsibility should not be taken so lightly -- or should it?

It is great having all your friends on the "team" -- it makes for better parties. However, is this the real reason for the "campus cops"? Perhaps breaking in some fresh blood would stimulate an otherwise exclusive group.

My question -- how were the people picked, and who made the decision? It may seem obtuse of me, but is it possible for one or maybe two people to know all of the applicants?

There are a few institutions at Queen's that require reforming. It appears that this is one of them.

Canada: news takes second place to Leafs, Habs games

MONTREAL — Canadians watched the Stanley Cup quarterfinals on CTV and a makeshift network after the National Association of Broadcast Employees and Technicians expanded their two-month rotating strike programme to prevent CBC coverage. Monday, seven hundred CBC employees in Montreal were locked out by management when they failed to provide TV coverage in French.

English coverage was granted to CTV and MacLaren Advertising after NABET action blacked out the opening games over CBC. The earliest games were seen only in part as CTV scrambled to put a network together; by the weekend it included several CBC affiliates including CKWS in Kingston.

As NABET action continued, Ontario premier William Davis refused to be interviewed by a non-union CBC news crew. Other reporters tried to block out CBC cameras filming Davis outside the legislature in Toronto. Liberal leader Robert Nixon also said he would not answer CBC news questions during the strike.

MONTREAL — About 200,000 employees across Quebec stayed away from work Tuesday in the second general strike there in two weeks - this one without a time limit, said Louis Laberge, president of the Quebec Federation of Labor. Hydro Quebec was affected along with schools, liquor stores, government offices and hospitals.

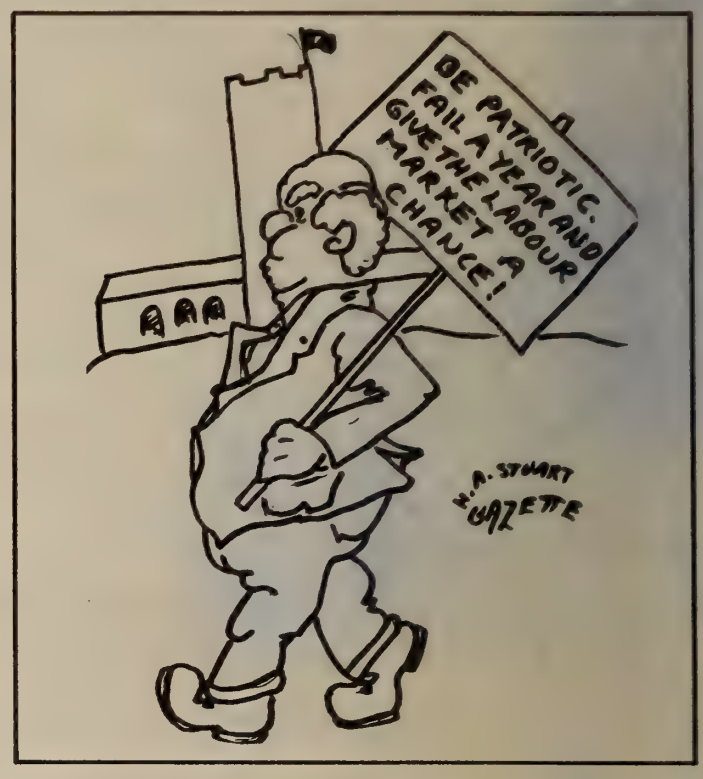
Public service minister Jean-Paul L'Allier said injunctions were still in force requiring workers to stay on the job at psychiatric, chronic-care and a few general hospitals, and also affecting workers in essential services at Hydro-Quebec.

TORONTO — Garbage collection and other public services in Metro Toronto stopped Monday when the 3750 members of Local 43 of the Canadian Union of Public Employees went on strike. In Toronto, 56 garbage disposal areas are being set up for residents to use, but in York and East York, where there are none, the boroughs laid off 255 employees because public dumps were closed by the strike. Problems with rats are "remote", the city health inspector said.

Ambulance service was reduced about 50 per cent by the strike, but the situation was not serious.

KINGSTON — Collins Bay Penitentiary inmates met with warden John Meers Monday and settled some of the 43 grievances they presented last week. Unsettled grievances include a demand that prisoners receive federal minimum wages for their work, that swimming be permitted, and that rules on temporary leave, conjugal visits, beards and hair length be relaxed. The inmate committee also asked for an end to "slander and discrimination by all staff toward all inmates and particularly toward homosexuals". Meers said some of the demands were outside his jurisdiction and depended on policy set in Ottawa.

OTTAWA — Unemployment rose in March, contrary to the usual trend, from 627,000 to 642,000 across Canada. It was 650,000 a year ago.



MONTREAL — Robert Fojanesi, a 28-year-old McGill University geology student, pleaded not guilty Wednesday to charges on ripping pages out of 31 library books for his own use. Sessions Court Judge Guy Guerin released the accused on his own recognizance pending preliminary hearing on two charges of damaging private property to the extent of $1,150.

TORONTO — A country-wide survey by a Toronto-based hospital journal indicates that legal abortions more than tripled in the first nine months of last year.

A poll of 361 hospitals by the magazine Canadian Hospital Administration found there were 15,516 abortions in the first nine months of 1971 compared with 4,889 the previous year.

OTTAWA — The consumer price index ("cost of living") rose to 137.4 in March from 137.3 in February. The index, based on 100 in 1961, was 131.3 a year ago. Food prices were down slightly; gasoline was up.

TORONTO — Almost 4000 applications have been received for the 396 student jobs open at Ontario Place this summer.

The World: B-52's hit North as heavy fighting resumes

SAIGON — United States B-52 bombers struck North Vietnam this week for the first time in more than four years, making the deepest penetration of the north ever carried out by U.S. bombers.

The bombing came in response to a North Vietnamese offensive that reached within 60 miles of Saigon with tank, infantry and artillery assaults. The new offensive, begun a week ago, is concentrated on three fronts: the area north of Saigon, the central highlands, and the area just south of the demilitarized zone.

B-52 bombing concentrated on military targets around the city of Vinh. In Washington, defence secretary Melvin Laird said additional U.S. air and naval forces were being sent to southeast Asia. At least eight warships left southern California Monday, reportedly for Vietnam. There are about 90,000 American troops in Vietnam at present, down from almost half a million five years ago.

MILWAUKEE, Wis. — Senator George McGovern established himself last week as a major contender for the Democratic nomination for United States president by scoring a smashing victory in a Wisconsin primary that knocked New York Mayor John V. Lindsay out of the race for the White House.

The South Dakota senator, making the breakthrough he had forecast here, won 54 of the state's 67 votes at the Democratic national convention, increasing his total to 94.5 of the 3,016 convention votes, one behind Senator Edmund Muskie of Main, who came fourth in Wisconsin.

SAN DIEGO, California — Two men were arrested Sunday after hijack attempts in the western United States. In one, a man bailed out of a United Airlines jet with $500,000 ransom and four parachutes; Richard Floyd McCoy, an amateur skydiver, was later arrested in Provo, Utah. Most of the money was recovered. Stanley H. Speck was arrested after a Pacific Southwest Airlines jet was ordered by a hijacker to land at San Diego.

BELFAST — The British government began freeing political prisoners last week, announcing that 73 men held without trial would be freed at once. There were 728 men in jail "on suspicion of having a hand in guerrilla activity" as of early last week. But bloodshed went on; Friday four persons were killed, three of them apparently Irish Republican Army members blown up when a bomb exploded prematurely in their car in a residential area of Belfast. A British soldier patrolling the Catholic Ballymurphy district was killed by a sniper. Three bombs shook other parts of Belfast Friday without causing serious injury. Monday, two British soldiers were killed by a guerrilla time bomb in Belfast while trying to disperse stone-throwing youths from the area where the explosion was expected. There have been 300 deaths in the three-year Northern Ireland conflict.

CAPE KENNEDY, Florida — The countdown started Monday for Apollo XVI, a manned expedition to the mountains of the moon.

Job situation will improve for worried education grads

"So far only 70 out of 640 education students have teaching jobs next year", David Wroe told the Journal but added "this estimation is relatively meaningless as hiring is not done until June."

Dean Peruniak of the Faculty of Education explained that previously the practice was to hire in mid winter but because of government fiscal restraints county boards can no longer act upon expected projections. "They must wait until they know how many are resigning," he said.

"There was a similar panic last year at this time," Peruniak commented, "but 80 per cent of our students got jobs."

In spite of the surplus of teachers the faculty of Education will increase its enrolment by 100 students next year. When asked to comment. Peruniak replied, "I believe students would prefer to have a crack at the job market after they leave the Faculty of Education rather than before."

Students help as citizen advocates

Queen's students have helped start Canada's first Citizen Advocacy Programme -- "the missing link in the rehabilitation of the mentally retarded", its organizer claims.

Mike Garrah, director of the service, said many people who have left mental hospitals "cured" later fail in community life because they cannot cope with a new way of life.

Citizens Advocacy, he said, provides a citizen friend to help a person who is slightly mentally retarded to help him deal with day-to-day problems that are new to him.

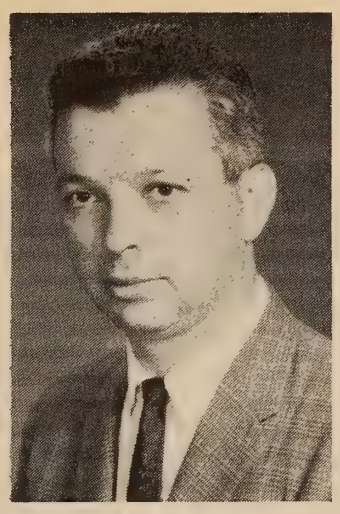
Such people, he said, may never have used a telephone or gone shopping; they may not know how to budget. These may be "little every-day things to most of us", Garrah said, but for the inexperienced they may be colossal problems.

Kingston's Citizen Advocacy Programme, the second of its kind in the world, was originally begun last spring at the Rockwood Institute for the Mentally Retarded; it is now run in the community, with an office at 80 Johnson Street.

There are presently 125 student and community volunteers, but Garrah said 300 are needed.

The citizen friend, he said, provides one or two hours a week to help his "protege" in coping with his weekly activities. "It is to provide a bridge between professional help and complete freedom in the community," he said.

The organization itself will bring together volunteers with people who need help, he said, and provide guidelines and general knowledge. Since the programme began last spring there have been no major problems that neither the advocate nor the organization could solve, Garrah said.



Students have been especially valuable volunteers, he said.

McArthur opening is May 2

Ontario premier Bill Davis will be the principal speaker at the official opening May 2 of McArthur Hall, the west campus home of Queen's faculty of education.

Celebrations of the opening will include a symposium May 3 on "National Dilemmas in Canadian Education" and a lecture that evening entitled "Today Will Be Yesterday Tomorrow" on recent changes in education. The speaker will be Dr. Walter Worth of the Alberta Commission on Education Planning.

Symposium participants will include Dr. Sylvia Ostry, Canada's chief statistician; Dr. Garnet McDiarmid of the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education; and Dr. George Tomkins of the Canadian Studies Foundation.

D. A. Soberman

Law dean retiring

The Queen's dean of law, Daniel A. Soberman, will be retiring a year from now, and a committee will shortly be set up to help choose his successor, who will take office September 1, 1973.

Meanwhile, comments are invited on "the future development of the Faculty of Law and . . . suggestions of possible candidates for the position of Dean." Such comments should be sent to the chairman of the committee, who is principal Dr. John J. Deutsch.

Goodwin Hall is open

Goodwin Hall, on Union Street across from Miller Hall, opened late last week and the department of computing and information science moved into the fifth floor.

Finishing touches are still being put on other parts of the 7-storey building. The departments of mining engineering and metallurgy, the Canadian Institute of Guided Ground Transport, the Industrial Relations Centre and other offices will move into the building later this year.

ASUS committee rejects proposals of Wright Commission

A number of Ontario University Students are getting together to ask - How should we as present university students respond to the Wright Commission Draft Report? The A.S.U.S. has formed such a committee and the following is a comment on the Report written by one of its members.

Various associations have criticized the Report on the basis that it discriminates against the chances of the poor getting a university education. Although this may be true (and if true it is important), I am concerned with the quality of university education and the effect on Canada that changes in the quality of university this education may have. Criticisms will be directed under the general idea that "reforms" suggested by the Commission will lead to a general decline in educational standards, an increase in specialization by the university, a decline in original research in Canada and particularly a decline in the quality and diversity of graduate education. The picture that emerges is one of further integration with the United States and a Canadian public which is in an inferior position within that North American system.

One of the most interesting points is evidence in the change table derived from a comparison of tables E2 against E3 found in Appendix E to the Draft Report. Since financial pressure is a very powerful effector of changes in the educational system and a number of recommendations in the Report rest largely on the model sketched in table E3, it is important to note its implications for change. When we know that financial levers are most easily controlled by the implementing body (as opposed to "esteem", financing can be legislated and quickly at that) and see that recommendations of finance will probably be most quickly implemented, it becomes important to examine the effect of new financial arrangements now.

On page 43, the Commission recommends that the "public subsidy to institutions should amount to 50 per cent of the operating costs for instruction". It is clear that finances here have been treated as though the university were strictly an instructional institute. Finances are based on professors devoting their full working time strictly to formal class instruction and preparation for classes (table E3). As can be seen from the change table, this involves considerable increase in time preparing and presenting lectures. In fact, no time is allotted to counselling individual students, personal supervision of individual essays or projects or research work or clinical practice by the professor himself.

There are a number of reasons for believing that research funding will at best ameliorate the tendencies outlined above. There are no specific recommendations in terms of dollar amounts concerning research funds. It seems to be granted secondary importance in the Report and will probably be treated in this way by government and lay bodies, particularly as government agencies have recently been cutting back research funding in any case. Research money is not tied in any way to the number of researchers. The foresightedness of non-academic administrators in regard to the importance of research is not legendary; they will better understand the rational of "teaching" expenses and may well hold back from expenditure on what they can not see as being immediately beneficial. It does not seem likely that research money will increase at the rate needed to sustain the present level, or even remain equal to its present level.

Parallel to the increase in time spent on class instruction is the increase in the student - faculty ratio. There will then certainly be no decrease in the size of classes or increase in the opportunity for small group discussion between students and faculty resulting from the increased teaching load for professors. The size of first year classes and classes open to general students have increased drastically in recent years. This trend can only continue and accelerate if the Report is put into action.

Few if any active scholars will want to devote their full time to teaching (in fact, it is hard to see how one can be a full-time teacher and devote a great amount of time to scholarly pursuits as well). One of the advantages of university training is that the lag between discovery and communication of new ideas is low because the discoverers and communicators are the same people. Time will be made, either at the insistance of employers who want people with the new ideas, for research work. At the same time, some senior subjects can only be taught in small groups with time spent on individually supervised projects. It seems then, that more classes will become larger so that some can remain small. If students wish to pursue any set of ideas in the manner made possible by seminars, they will have to specialize more and sooner.

Alternatively, preparation hours may be cut decreasing the value of lectures given.

Another possibility, is that the first rank of scholars will leave and go elsewhere where their research is valued as much as their lectures leaving a second-rate group of professors in Ontario.

Of course, it is possible that the best students may leave for places with smaller class sizes, or to follow the better professors (assuming it is financially possible for them to do so).

Another way that a university could "balance its books" is to specialize increasingly in one area. I believe that this is the likeliest course and the one most consistent with practices in other areas of Canadian life. By increasing the class sizes and restricting the research funds in some departments or faculties, and having more of the teaching in those departments done by junior professors or teaching assistants, a university can "load" some other area with smaller classes, lower teaching loads for professors and provide more time and money for research in that area. This would also attract better scholars to the "loaded" area and worse scholars to the other areas. This tendency would be increased by implementation of the recommendation that research money be allocated to universities on the basis of performance (page 43, No. 5). To "perform" well, a university must produce large amounts of good scholarly research in at least some areas and it seems that this can only be done by weakening others considerably. Especially when programs (Recommendation No. 52, pages 34-35) and presumably research (Recommendation No. 50, page 34) will be evaluated by non-scholars, the pressure to "publish or perish" (where the rate of publications will likely be taken as a measure of "performance" by a lay body) will be enormous and can only increase the tendency to specialize.

The tendencies in graduate schools, where the monetary and research pinch will be even greater (again see change table), keeping in mind that the higher the level of instruction the greater the need for individual consultation with professors, can only be an exaggeration and continuation of the trends forecast in undergraduate program. The efficiency of transformation of the universities will be insured by the local administrations; since they will handle both "research" and "education" funds as a whole since the Report envisages "instructional costs and other costs including research "being" separate at source but not at the institutional level.

If there are to be any superior centers of instruction and research in Ontario, it seems that this is the likeliest course i.e. universities will tend to offer mediocre or worse instruction and research in most areas in order to offer good or leading instruction and research in others. Succinctly 1) except in a limited number of areas Ontario university degrees will become increasingly meaningless. The recommendations make it possible for almost anyone to obtain a B.A. by making it worthless, in general. 2) With areas of leading scholarship narrowing in Ontario (which at present leads Canada) widening areas of employment requiring specialized high level knowledge will be filled by persons from others than Ontario Universities. The possibilities of ever being able to regain prominence in these areas decreases the longer the recommendations have in effect. It seems likely that these areas will be dominated increasingly by Americans as an integral Canadian university system breaks down. An important point to remember when we are increasingly concerned with the disappearance of a Canadian nation and the subjugation of this country to integration with the United States. Therefore, we must recommend most forcefully that the system of providing financing of universities and determination of programs at universities in Ontario which are recommended in the Report be rejected.

If they are not rejected, they must at least be revised to account for a lower student - faculty ratio and higher adjusted formula weights than those assumed by the Report.

What does Queen's do for Kingston? Quit

By Chris Redmond

What does Queen's do for Kingston?

Kingston is a city of some 56,000 people, with businesses, some industry, many public service institutions, and a university -- which some Kingstonians bitterly resent and many of the rest just tolerate. From time to time some point of contention arises, and the citizenry's charges against Queen's are brought out again.

They include charges that tax-exempt university property drives up city property taxes; that students drive up rents and make housing difficult to find at any price; that students are noisy, obscene, sloppy, and undesirable; that the university is blighting a beautiful historic residential area; that university people want to run the city, or maybe the world.

To some extent each of those charges is true. But this article will talk about the other side of the coin: what does Queen's do that is good for Kingston?

The answer is -- and this may surprise some people -- quite a lot.

The first point, inevitably, is an economic one. Queen's pumps a lot of money into Kingston's economy; a recent statement from a Queen's official says that "in 1970 the cash flow generated by the University's operation from: student fees, research grants from a variety of sources, the operation of residences and dining facilities, student rent for other living accommodation and their out-of-pocket expenditures, plus government assistance for both capital and operating expenses totalled about $60 million. We believe that at least 70 per cent of this total was spent directly in the Kingston community."

Seventy per cent of $60 million is $42 million(about 750 dollars per Kingstonian.

(The $42 million figure seems reasonable: five years ago, a brief to a Kingston city committee indicated that Queen's had spent $22.1 million in the city in a year, and estimated additional student expenditures of about $7.5 million.)

Not all Queen's money is spent in Kingston, of course; purchases are for "highly complex scientific equipment not available locally", but that the university buys from Kingston firms whenever it can, even when prices are slightly higher. That policy is still in force.

No other institution generates that much revenue to the city. And, of course, the money is not just spent once; since most of it comes from outside the city (e.g. government grants, or the expenditures of students from Toronto and Ottawa), it is pumped into the Kingston economy and circulates in the city a number of times.

The benefits do not stop with money, though. Many Kingstonians find themselves involved with the university in other ways. To begin with, about fifteen per cent of Queen's students (slightly over a thousand) are Kingstonians themselves; most Kingston high school graduates who go on to university choose Queen's, and the economic benefit to the families of those who choose to live at home is considerable.

Another 2300 Kingstonians are Queen's staff. Of course, many of those are academics, brought in from outside, who do not really consider themselves long-term Kingstonians; only a few hundred support staff (janitors, secretaries, and a small number of faculty) are permanent residents. But even if only those are counted: how many other institutions employ several hundred people?

Finally, many Kingstonians who are neither staff nor full-time students benefit from extension courses, non-credit night courses and similar university offerings which would not be conveniently available if they lived anywhere else -- or they enroll intramurally as part-time students.

Those residents who do not actually take Queen's courses can still benefit from its cultural offerings. "Throughout the entire year over 500 cultural events are held which are open to the public," says a recent brief by Queen's vice-principal Jim Courtright, from which some of the following information is taken. Those events include concerts, plays, films, poetry readings and lectures; virtually everything the university does is open to the public at the same ticket prices professors pay (students often get reduced rates).

$42 million a year

Agnes Etherington Art Centre is open to the public; since September staff members have taken 1404 school children on 55 tours through the gallery, at no charge.

Queen's supports the Vaghy String Quartet, who take part in music education programmes in Frontenac county schools and are crucial members of the Kingston Symphony Orchestra.

CFRC-AM and FM, the Queen's radio stations, broadcast 66 hours a week to the Kingston area, carrying (without commercials) music, and educational programmes, of a kind not available on the city's other stations. The university finances CFRC and students run it.

Kingston residents, and especially high school students and St. Lawrence College students, can make use of the Queen's libraries; those beyond high school can borrow books, and high school students make extensive use of Douglas Library for essay research and exam-time studying. In the past year Queen's libraries lent about 4600 books to Frontenac County residents, 4000 directly and 600 by interlibrary loan.

On a similar basis, Queen's athletic facilities are open to Kingston residents, a tradition dating back to the days when the old Jock Harty Arena was the only artificial ice surface in the city, and boys' pick-up teams used it when the Golden Gaels were through.

The arena gets especially high use, but other areas of the Phys Ed Centre are also available. Besides letting Kingston groups use the space, the recreational services staff at the Phys Ed Centre sponsor programmes specifically for them from time to time. At present a "learn-to-swim" class for infants as young as six months has attracted overflow enrollment.

Richardson Stadium, both at the old site and now on the west campus, is an important centre for high school football games, other athletic events, and community occurrences like the annual Parade of Drums.

Many Kingstonians follow the Golden Gaels avidly, and they are welcome at all home games. At football, basketball, and hockey, where admission is charged, they pay the same rates as faculty; admission to other athletic events normally is free for all.

Community groups can use other campus space as well, at no charge (unless janitor overtime incurs costs to Queen's). Such organizations which have used Grant Hall, lecture theatres, classrooms and seminar rooms recently include B'nai Brith, the Cataraqui Canoe Club, the Fort Henry Guards, the Kingston Arts Council, the Kingston St. Andrews Royal Country Dance Society, Theatre 5, the Board of Education, and several dozen others.

The closed-circuit television unit at Queen's has been made available to civic officials for preparation of video tapes to instruct election returning officers and for similar purposes.

Queen's expertise has been used in other ways as well. Two engineering professors, Dr. Jim Brown and Dr. Reg Clark, conducted a study on garbage disposal and reclamation, and as a result Kingston will soon be setting up a pioneer development plant capable of treating all the city's solid waste.

A staff member of the Queen's school of nursing is one organizer of the Dial-a-Dietitian programme under which Kingston housewives can call a phone number for free dietary information and advice.

Shinerama (for children's camp and systic fibrosis), blood drives, and the Heart Fund drive, which takes several hundred students canvassing door-to-door.

Also in orientation week, engineering students conduct a cleanup of Kingston parks and recreation areas.

A final example: Queen's is one of the few divisions in Kingston's annual United Fund drive which always meets or exceeds its quota ($45,000 this year), accepting contributions from staff and students to support Kingston charities.

Besides all the things Queen's does for Kingston, of course, are the benefits Kingston shares with the rest of Ontario, or Canada: technological advances, progress in the humanities, in appreciation of life and a development of a Canadian identity, the contributions made by graduates in later life -- everything a university is supposed to do for society. All the things that have been listed are over and above a university's central job.

What does Queen's do for Kingston, then?

Quite a lot.

Arts sports letters

Dear Editors:

In response to Mr. Smith's letter (Journal, April 13): the ASUS budgets $200 to athletics. Last year $111 was spent. I would imagine on equipment and advertising -- the exact breakdown is not yet available. It seems that in past years the executive has forgotten about athletic letters and it had just gone unnoticed until this year, when Dennis Fitzpatrick, ASUS athletic stick, brought this matter to the executive on March 28. Upon receiving this information "the Society agreed to give the necessary money to catch up on past expenses". It was moved by Duncan Bull and seconded by Wil Kranenburg that "the Athletic Stick purchase prizes and crests to be awarded worthy students in recognition of their participation in the intramural programme". The motion was passed and $200 has been allotted to this end. Past crest winners will receive their crests through the mail. Mr. Smith's letter was an objective questioning of a situation which he found to be peculiar. Chris Boon's reply was almost hysterical.

Chris, your own Queen's Journal printed notices about that March 28 meeting -- you chose not to attend. You chose not to contact any member of the executive to see if you could clarify the situation.

We could not re-allot funds very easily; the most we can do is to draw on two or three funds for an event that might fall under two or three headings. For example, Jim Bouton comes to Queen's to speak about major league baseball and its true nature: we would draw on the athletic budget and the other events budget. That's about the only reallotment that takes place.

I think you would agree that it is impractical for us to post all minutes of meetings on every door. The interested come, or they find out what happened. Before you begin calling us "High-minded, intellectual, arrogant" people, Mr. Boon, could you not even have examined the situation and clarified it rather than ignore journalistic responsibility and merely obscure the question?

Objectivity and facts in your letter surely would have made a greater impression than subjective, uninformed, hypoethetical opinion.

Constables not "clique"

Dear Editors:

In response to Miss Howes' letter in the Journal of April 13, 1972, may I offer the following information.

First, of the 106 constables that have been selected so far (the selection of male constables for next year is not yet complete) there are 79 people who have never been a constable before, so Miss Howes' demand for some "fresh blood" has already been answered.

Secondly, there were 61 applications from girls to fill 20 places for next year. Why only 20 girls? Because we felt that it would be better to hire 20 girls and ensure them a reasonable amount of work, than to hire 50 and have 20 of them working and 30 others with their armbands collecting dust in their desks.

Thirdly, the constables were picked by six people (the chief, deputy, and 4 sergeants) not one or two as Miss Howes indicated. Could even six people know everyone? Of course not, and consequently we picked a lot of people we didn't know. Unfortunately for Miss Howes, a girl's chance of being picked was about 30 per cent against a guy's chance of about 85 per cent.

Fourthly, I would like to assure Miss Howes that neither myself nor any of my staff take their positions "lightly", and for you to suggest that we do is insulting not only to the AMS Outer Council which appointed me, but to every student at Queen's who has worn or is going to wear, the AMS constable armband.

It is unfortunate that we could not hire everyone who applied. Selections had to be made and we made them in what we considered to be a reasonable and fair way. I agree with Miss Howes' suggestion that there are certain reforms needed within the constable system, but give us the chance to change from within.

Yours sincerely
Ian Nordheimer

Fee raise protests

Dear Editors:

After reading Thursday's Journal, it is painfully obvious to us that only the Graduate Students' Federation is protesting Wm. Davis' cutbacks on student grants and loans, and his $100 increase of student fees.

We feel that these are serious issues which demand student reaction and involvement. The A.M.S. has been delinquent by not acting on behalf of Queen's students in formulating a letter of protest to the government of Ontario. Queen's Park should at least have a hint of the discontent it is generating among the student block.

Canada Council money

Dear Editors:

Attached is a copy of a letter that we sent to the Canada Council, signed by the award holders of the math department. Would it not be a good idea that award holders of other departments send a similar letter? The Canada Council should receive thousands of those!

Paul-Jean Cahen

For five years Canada Council Scholarships have not been raised. Yet there has been an increase in the cost of living.

Moreover Scholarships are now taxable. Fees are also dramatically increased in Ontario (from $485 in 1970-71 to an approximate $900 for next fall).

In a Canada Council booklet, given to students applying for a scholarship, one can read (June 71, page 4):

"In the event that doctoral fellowships become subject to income tax, the Council will make an adjustment to offset, in a general way, the impact of such taxation- award-holders will be notified of the nature and extent of this adjustment."

We would appreciate receiving such notification.

Money is recovered

Dear Editors:

Thanks to the diligent efforts of the phys ed complex staff (in particular Mr. Allan and Mr. Whalen) and the Queen's physical plant staff security (in particular Mr. Lucar) in working with the police, the $70 stolen from us while playing hockey March 18 was all recovered. Security at the complex is difficult, even at the best of times.

Modern Dance Charged With Excitement

By Sue Denim

The modern dance program, which ran last Thursday, Friday and was held over Saturday evening, was so successful that approximately 70 people were turned away each evening. Those who were lucky enough to get inside the Studio Theatre of the Drama Department, left it, an hour later, charged with excitement.

The program was entitled, "Three Pieces For Modern Dance", but you got more than you bargained for. The program consisted of four choreographed and improvizational pieces and a "warm up", performed to music from Miles Davis' Bitches Brew, which was as invigorating to watch as it must have felt for the five dancers.

The first piece, Quartet for Eight, was an experimental study in choreography, using four instrumentalists and four dancers. Musical patterns were imposed upon the dancers who worked independently, but because of musical disparities the dancers were unable to sustain their concentration, and only for a couple of sporadic moments, when they came together and related their patterns, did the visualization work.

As an exercise, the dancers were fascinating to watch. Their bodies were amazingly supple and innovative in mirroring the fluctuating musical patterns, and when they lost themselves to their environment, the experiment triumphed.

In the second piece, which was entitled, Forsan, Sandra Aitken, who has been teaching modern dance and movement all year, danced to an electronic composition by Bill Buxton. Unfortunately, the choreography was not appropriate for the sound. Miss Aitken danced smoothly and fluidly, but the jarring rhythm of this electronic piece created a dissonant impression.

The two, sound and movement, as separate disciplines, were intrinsically intriguing, but it is understandably difficult for the juxtaposition of a fluid form upon a jarring one to look unified. Instead, the impression was discordant, and Miss Aitken's physical control was not displayed to its utmost.

In Duet, four dancers, in fencing masks, stood in front of the audience and did not move. Someone coughed and the cough was magnified. Five microphones suspended from the ceiling, just above the spectators heads were picking up atmospheric sounds, hence the accompaniment for the dancers. An amazing change came over the audience, a confidence grew from the initial realization that "theirs was the only music that could make them dance."

Soon a harmonica piped in from the far corner, people began to whistle, whistling led to a line from a song and inventive way of producing sounds from the microphones were tried.

The excitement of creativity was enveloping the audience as well as the dancers who were responding with their bodies to this indeterminate stimulae. Each new sound produced a new movement. People laughed, people tapped, they crumpled their programs, they scraped the mikes, and the dancers jerked and swung and jumped and swirled spontaneously to each sound.

The audience was directly controlling its entertainment, a privilege it is not often accorded and as creative and diversified as they became, so the dancers interpreted their sounds and visualized the "music".

Etc, the final piece was a spontaneous, lively, rock number which was accented by coloured gels and an hypnotic strobe. The evening, which became progressively more and more dynamic, ended on a highly charged note. People wanted to dance with the performers, to move, to let off the energy which had been kindled in them.

Gavin Semple's design, which cleverly utilized aluminum mirrors, reflected the dancers' bodies and a sophisticated lighting scheme, operated by Christopher Miller.

In retrospect, the evening's emotional intensity had an enduring effect.

The enthusiasm of Anthony Morgan, Pam Arder, Nancy Wilson and Allan Rasdill spread to the audience, particularly in Duet and Etc and the warm ovation they received was testimony to this.

Miss Aitken's instruction and her professionalism, in collaboration with Bill Buxton's electronic and musical compositions, created an evening loaded with excitement, the kind of creativity which is emblematic of the positive aspects of our overwhelming technology.

Incidentally, it was a great way to break up the evening's studying too. Thank you.

The World: U.S. bombing pauses, North hints at talks

SAIGON — United States fighter-bombers and B-52's Monday stopped the heavy bombing of North Vietnam which heavily damaged fuel depots in the central Hanoi-Haiphong area Sunday. North Vietnam said hundreds of civilians had been killed, but the U.S. insisted only military targets had been attacked. Military spokesmen said one reason for the bombing pause was to see how North Vietnam and other countries would react to the six-day resumption of air attacks.

In Paris, the chief North Vietnamese negotiator, Xuan Thuy, said a key official who met secretly last year with Henry Kissinger, top U.S. security advisor, would return to Paris for possible secret peace talks if the bombing was stopped. The longstanding peace talks in Paris were broken off by the United States March 30 after the North began a major offensive in South Vietnam.

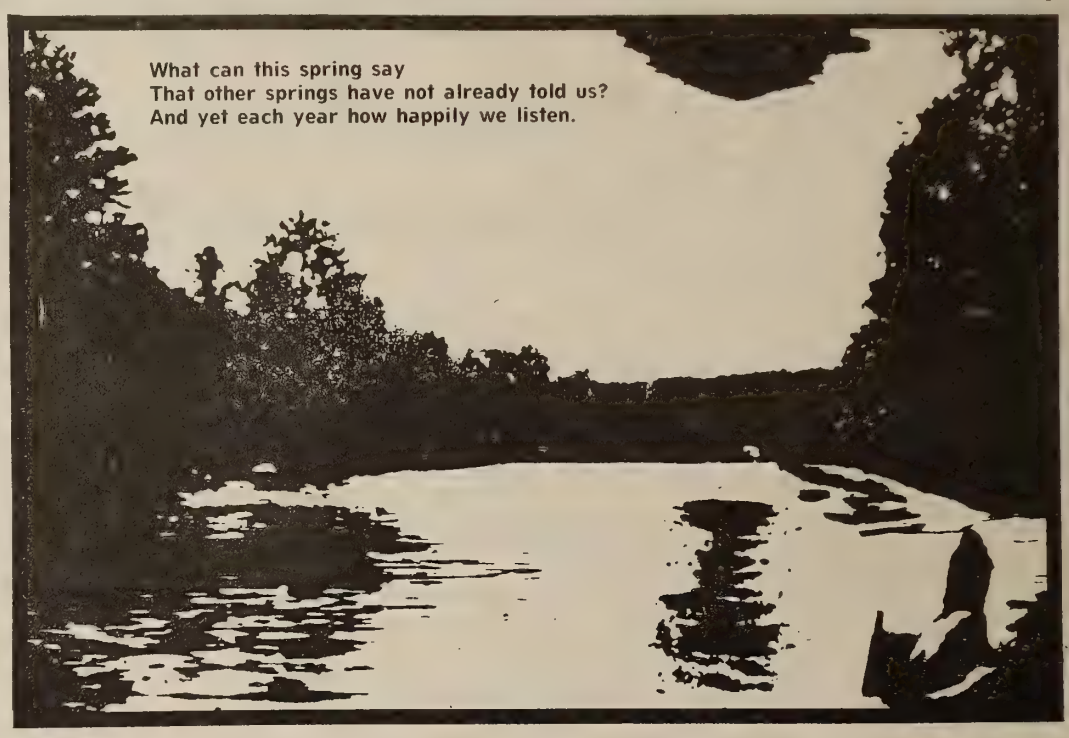
Administration officials said in Washington that the U.S. is now prepared to bomb military targets almost anywhere in the North, but that U.S. president Richard Nixon personally must authorize raids on "politically sensitive areas". Secretary of state William Rogers declared that the U.S. is not about to abandon South Vietnam.

Meanwhile, the foreign relations committee of the U.S. Senate voted 9-1 Monday to end all spending on the Vietnam war by the end of 1972: an action that would require the withdrawal of all U.S. troops from Vietnam, if the full Congress supports it.

Canadian External affairs minister Mitchell Sharp said in Ottawa that Canada opposes the resumption of bombing in the North.

BELFAST — Bernadette Devlin, 24, member of Parliament for Mid-Ulster and a firebrand Catholic leader, was sentenced last week to six months in jail for taking part in an illegal parade in February in Enniskillen, Northern Ireland. Similarly sentenced was MP Frank McManus.

Violence continued in Northern Ireland; Thursday was the worst day, when about 30 bomb explosions left an estimated $2.6 million damage as well as one death and eight injuries. British officials, who are in charge in the North since Britain took direct control three weeks ago, blamed the bombings on the outlawed Irish Republican Army.



HOUSTON — Apollo XVI was was launched on time Sunday afternoon and started for the moon a few hours later, carrying three astronauts to spend a record 72 hours on its surface, starting today. The first problem developed Tuesday when the protective skin of the moon landing unit began flaking, but engineers said the mission was in no danger. A guidance and navigational malfunction was overcome later in the day. Air force Lt.-Col. Charles Duke and navy Capt. John Young will land on the moon today; during the return trip, navy Commander Thomas Mattingly will walk in space.

NEW YORK — Women would make good soldiers, a New York psychiatrist has declared. "I think women would make very effective killers if they get the same kind of training our Vietnam soldiers do," said Dr. Leon Salzman. "Women don't take to killing comfortably, but then no one really does." Women could theoretically be drafted and sent into battle if a pending women's rights amendment to the U.S. Constitution is approved.

BELGRADE — The world championship chess match between Bobby Fischer of the United States and Boris Spassky is no closer after the U.S. Chess Federation refused to post bond guaranteeing that Fischer would appear if the match were held here. Fischer and Spassky have tentatively agreed on Belgrade and Reykajavik as sites for the match.

LONDON — The end of the world is not at hand, the British Association of Young Scientists was told last week by Dr. Gordon Fogg, a marine biologist. "We ought to remind ourselves that we do have conscious choice and free will," he said.

WASHINGTON — Death from heart disease is on the increase among American women under 45, a team of government medical experts has announced. They said that "with the new women's action programmes, many heart disease factors of the so-called man's world become factors for women." They mentioned overeating, diets high in fats, cigarettes, and "affluence -- too much car-driving and sedentary living".

Canada: Nixon praises "separate identity" signs pollution pact

OTTAWA — U.S. President Richard Nixon visited the capital Thursday and Friday; he conferred with prime minister Pierre Trudeau and other officials, addressed a joint session of the Senate and House of Commons, and signed a U.S.-Canada treaty committing the two countries to a joint fight against Great Lakes water pollution.

The joint programme, which is expected to make Lake Erie, Lake Ontario, and the St. Lawrence Seaway noticeably cleaner by 1975, will cost about $2 billion. Under the agreement both countries will abide by cleanliness standards set by the International Joint Commission, which will have greatly expanded powers.

Shortly after his arrival, Nixon made headlines by observing that the United States respects "the separate identity, the right to pursue its own way that the people of Canada desire".

He said, "Canadians and Americans must never miss the opportunity to see each other in person and to discuss their differences."

QUEBEC — Sporadic bargaining continued as the general strike of about 200,000 Quebec public service employees entered its second week. Conditions in some hospitals were reported "critical" as thousands of hospital workers joined the strike, despite injunctions ordering some of them to stay at work. Strikers and supporters jammed Quebec City Tuesday as the provincial legislature met to hear the 1972-73 budget; meanwhile, government negotiators made a new offer involving $32.9 million in salary increases over three years.

TORONTO — Four thousand outside workers, including garbage collectors, continued their strike against the City of Toronto and Metro Toronto, and the mediator said a settlement was not likely soon. Unusually warm weather made residents uncomfortable as odours spread from garbage piled at temporary dumps around the city. Local 43 of the Canadian Union of Public Employees is asking for two wage increases of 10 per cent; the city and Metro have offered 5 and 4 per cent.

VANCOUVER — The Canada Post Office may have to resume Saturday mail delivery in order to make postal service efficient again, postmaster-general Jean-Pierre Cote said Monday. The end of Saturday delivery has meant serious pileups early every week, he said.

NEW WESTMINISTER, B.C. — About 20 convicts from federal prisons will spend six months working on a construction project near Victoria; they will receive the minimum wage of $1.75 per hour and in return will pay the prison for room, board and clothing.

KINGSTON — Five Doukhobor women who are inmates of the federal Prison for Women were transferred to hospital last week because of their weakened condition after a long hunger strike. The five had refused to eat government food since their imprisonment for arson in British Columbia, three in 1970 and two in late 1971. Except for a brief period in March when they agreed to eat solid food, the five have been force-fed liquids since their imprisonment. Solicitor-general Pierre Goyer faces a choice between the reported $900 monthly cost of force-feeding, and letting the five Sons of Freedom Doukhobors become martyrs.

A letter to the editor of The Kingston Whig-Standard, April 7, 1972:

STUDENT POLLUTERS

Sir: According to your editorial April 4 a group of Queen's students plans an anti-pollution campaign. May I suggest they start, right now — on the houses where students themselves live. I pass several of these on my way to work daily and they are an absolute disgrace — open paper bags of garbage and other junk on the front lawns, not to mention the trash now appearing from under the melting snow banks.

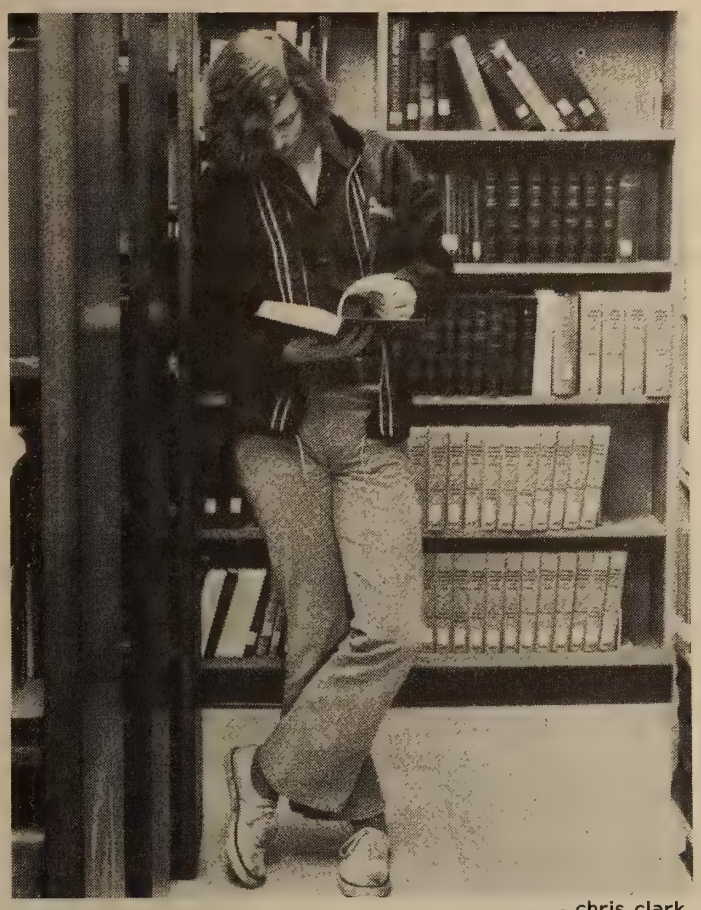
Grad protest asked



"Darcy McKeough and his buddy George Kerr have lifted the bounty from wolves and put it on graduate students," 200 grads were told yesterday by Graduate Student Society President Doug Pritchard. He asked them to write protesting letters immediately to Kerr, who is minister of colleges and universities for Ontario, or to Premier William Davis.

Ontario graduate fees will be highest in Canada as a result of the raise from $485 to $877 recently announced by the provincial government, Pritchard said. He quoted a fee of $3,510 for a four-year PhD compared with $1,735 at the University of British Columbia.

In addition, a grad with the average $3,200 income from scholarships and assistanceships will pay $210 in tax next year, compared with none this year, he said. Income tax and the fee increase have cost an average grad 24 per cent of his income, Pritchard stated.

Government advisory bodies have recommended an increase from $1,800 to $2,400 in the maximum amount a grad may be paid, he said, and the government is considering the idea.

MEDICAL COMPLEX IS APPROVED

- chris clark

The Ontario government has approved the $106 million health sciences complex for which Queen's, its affiliated hospitals, and the city of Kingston have been hoping for more than five years.

Approval, which came from a committee of government officials responsible for education and for health, means the go-ahead for specific planning, and a general indication that Queen's will get the money to complete the project, said John Ackland, planning coordinator for the multi-institution board which will be responsible for it.

The largest share of the money, about $83 million, will go for a major centre incorporating Kingston General Hospital (largely rebuilt) with medical science departments of Queen's, and related services. Lesser shares will revamp Hotel Dieu Hospital downtown, Kingston Psychiatric Hospital and St. Mary's of the Lake Hospital.

First units of the project will be a parking garage under the Queen's lower campus -- which the government said must be built before the complex can go ahead -- and a $2 million outpatient unit for KGH.

Work on both is to begin this year -- on the garage, probably as early as mid-summer, so that the lower campus will be unavailable for the summer, fall and spring at least.

Another early item is the $5.5 million new wing already approved for St. Mary's of the Lake; digging there will start in July.

Hotel Dieu will get $14 million for expansion and rebuilding, though its plans are not ready in detail yet (they will go to Queen's Park soon). HDH will need new facilities to house expanded services in family medicine, obstetrics and gynaecology, fields in which it will specialize when the health sciences complex is completed.

KGH, giving up obstetrics and gynaecology, will take over plastic surgery, cardiovascular surgery, and (at Angada Children's Hospital) paediatrics.

The hospitals in the complex will have about 1050 beds altogether, 150 more than at present.

Of the $106 million which the complex will cost, about $80 million will come frrom the Ontario Health Resources Development Fund, where the money is half federal and half provincial. The rest will come from the Ontario government and the Kingston community (including the results of a planned national fund-raising campaign).

Though governments don't budget ten years in advance, as would be necessary to guarantee the funds, Kingston can expect "the necessary funds to complete the project", Ackland said last week when government approval was announced.

Approval was in fact given to a "functional plan" which "describes the clinical services which will be provided by each of the affiliated hospitals, and the programmes for the education of medical, nursing, and paramedical students. It also outlines the new facilities which will be required to provide the hospital services and the educational programmes," a statement said.

Government approval means that Queen's University and Affiliated Hospitals, the body now responsible for the project, will go ahead with development of plans, though the government will have to approve each stage of construction over the next decade.

Besides Queen's and the four hospitals, QUAFHOP includes St. Lawrence College of Applied Arts and Technology.

Rehab is now four years

Rehab therapy will be a four-year programme at Queen's, leading to a Bachelor of Science degree, for rehab students who start in September 1972 and thereafter.

Since the school of rehabilitation therapy was founded in 1967, its basic programme has been three years in length, leading to a diploma in physical or occupational therapy. Students could return later to take a fourth year and receive a degree, and Queen's gave its first rehab B.Sc. at 1971 convocations.

The new programme will make the fourth year compulsory, and it will follow the first three without the present two-year gap.

The change will have no effect on students now at Queen's, according to Donna Collins, president of the Rehab Therapy Society. But it will mean that there will never be a class called Rehab 75. This year's freshettes are Rehab 74, and in the fall newcomers will be Rehab 76.

As the change goes into effect, a new director is being sought for the rehab school.

The present director, Dr. D. C. Symington, is also head of the department of rehabilitation medicine, but with the expansion of the school the university has decided to separate the two positions. Symington will remain in charge of the rehab medicine department.

Chairman of the committee to find a successor is Dr. Douglas Waugh, vice-principal (health sciences).

There are 36 students in each year of rehab.

Dean of students resigns

Dr. T. Stewart Webster, dean of student affairs since 1966, has resigned and will return to full-time teaching in the department of history.

As previously announced, he will take a sabbatical leave next year.

Webster came to Queen's from the University of Manitoba six years ago. His resignation is effective June 30.

The university's announcement gave no indication that a new dean will be appointed.

A retiring professor: W. H. Evans was chairman of French

This interview, one in a series with faculty members who are retiring in 1972, was written by Journal reporter Sue Bourbonniere.

1) Could you tell me something about your academic background?
A. I was born in Cardiff, Wales, and graduated from the University of Wales during the depression. I was fortunate enough to go on to graduate studies for three years by way of scholarships at 100 pounds a year, and did quite nicely on that. I went to Paris and taught there until 1934 when I went to the University of Liverpool where I stayed, with the exception of the war, until 1948 when I came to Queen's as head of the department, taking over from Mr. Tirol who had died.

2) What changes have you noticed particularly in your years here at Queen's?
A. When I first came here there were only 2500 students and the veterans were still here. The French department consisted of a staff of four, with 250 registrations and we had nine honours students that year. (1948) It was a cozy little place and there were disadvantages to that, of course. Everything was in the Douglas Library. Besides the library, before it expanded, the principal's, vice principal's, and dean's offices were located there. The head of the department had more freedom to talk to his colleagues and was not sunk in the administration system. He had more power then to, but we never realized that until now when we don't have the power.

3) What were your main objectives as head of the French Department?
A. I insisted that courses be given in French and students write as much French as possible, and that thesis be written in French. I initiated, here at Queen's, the program where students could spend their third year at a foreign university.

4) Do you feel that an academic should ever retire?
A. My predecessor was appointed in 1922 at the age of twenty-four and retired at the age of seventy. Principal Grant had appointed him for life, and he was reluctant to retire. Heads have now been appointed for a five year term. When I was appointed you had the feeling that you could do something and there were not so many committees.

5) What do you plan to do after you retire?
A. I am teaching one course, a first year section and I am staying in Kingston to keep in contact with the university. I intend to do all the things I have always wanted to do and never had the time, like take a nap after lunch, as my predecessor did.

Queen's works with Apollo

Astronomy experts in the Queen's department of physics are doing radio-wave studies in cooperation with experiments being conducted by the astronauts of Apollo XVI, the United States moon excursion which finishes this week.

Researchers headed by Dr. V.A. Hughes of Queen's are observing radio waves from the constellations of Scorpio and Cygnus to determine the cause of the waves' variability. At the same time, x-ray studies of the same stars are being done by the astronauts.

"These observations that we are taking are using a 150-foot diameter radio telescope at Algonquin Park," Hughes said. Queen's has a smaller radio telescope, located near Westbrook, Ontario, but it is not being used.

Observations are going on all this week.

Student arrested at welfare sit-in

A third-year law student was among three people arrested Thursday when police cleared about 30 persons from a sit-in at the social and family services office on Princess Street.

Michael McLachlan, 24, was charged with obstructing police after eight officers began clearing the office at 797 Princess Street.

Two other men were charged with causing a disturbance.

The group invaded the Princess Street office Thursday afternoon to protest a delay in announcing a decision of the department's view board about the welfare payments of two Kingston women, who have not been receiving payments for several months.

A spokesman for the group told The Kingston Whig-Standard that the sit-in was "a last resort" to force a decision. The department told the sit-in that decisions on both cases were in the mail.

Thursday's sit-in lasted about two hours. A second demonstration Monday was less eventful as police prevented picketers from entering the building.

Family practice chairman is sought

A committee has been announced which will select a chairman for the university's newest department: the department of family practice in the faculty of medicine.

The committee will also be asked to write "terms of reference" under which the new head will run his department. Faculty and students have been invited to let the committee know what they think about the development of the department, and to suggest candidates for the headship.

Chairman of the committee is Dr. Douglas Waugh, vice-principal (health sciences).

Principal joins panel on television

Queen's principal Dr. John J. Deutsch will be among university officials taking part in an informal television discussion of recent problems facing universities in Ontario. Moderator of the discussion is Dr. Barry Thorne of the Queen's English department. The broadcast is scheduled to appear at 6:55 p.m. Saturday, April 29, on channel 11 in Kingston.

Wright group disowns $100 fee raises

The recently-announced $100 student fee raise wasn't the Wright Commission's idea, the commission said in a press release late last week.

That commission, which produced a controversial draft report about Ontario post-secondary education last November, said it views the change, and the reduction in student award money, "with regret".

It was not consulted by the Ontario government before it made the change, the commission declared.

"The Commission noted that the public had linked the government decision to the draft report of the commission, and the commission wished to make clear that the commission had not been consulted," the statement said.

"The Commission indicated further (to the government) that while the commission was not opposed to fee increases as such, it considered such steps to be desirable only if they took place simultaneously with increased financial support to those who need it."

Queen's principal Dr. John J. Deutsch is a member of the Wright Commission.

Abortion forum planned

An "abortion forum" May 1 will be part of a Canada-wide campaign for repeal of federal abortion laws.

The Kingston Coalition for Abortion Law Repeal says in flyers distributed this week that May 6 will be the climax of the present campaign, with a march in Toronto and presentation of a petition to the Ontario government. Actions will be taken later to pressure the federal government, the flyer says.

It deals in detail with the case of Dr. Henry Morgantaler, a physician on trial in Montreal for performing illegal abortions. (Under federal law an abortion is legal if a hospital panel of three doctors certify that it is necessary.)

Morgantaler has not been brought to a hearing yet, it says, because judicial authorities "are seriously threatened by what he will reveal".

He will speak out against existing abortion laws, the flyer says, and open his medical records. "In his files are the names of some very prominent women -- the wives and mistresses of some very important figures in the Quebec power structure, and the Canadian medical profession.

"There could hardly be more conclusive evidence that Canada's 'liberalized' abortion laws just don't work."

There are at least 100,000 illegal abortions in Canada every year, it says.

"Only two or three of 100 women seeking to terminate their pregnancies can have safe legal abortions under present law."

The Kingston forum will begin at 8 pm Monday, May 1, at St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church at Princess and Clergy Streets.

Water polo still winning

WATERPOLO STILL WINNING
CAN REACH CANADIAN FINALS HERE SATURDAY

Queen's Waterpolo team may be going to the Canadian Waterpolo Association finals in Quebec City May 5, 6, and 7. If the Gaels can defeat the other finalist (either Carleton or Ottawa-Pinecrest) in the Ontario Waterpolo Association's Ottawa Valley Division, they will be Eastern Ontario's representatives in the All-Canada playdowns.

The finals will be held here at Queen's this Saturday (April 29th), with the first match in the best two of three series getting underway at 2:45 pm. Spectators are welcome. Queen's earned the right to host the final games by finishing first in regular league play.

In addition to the Canadian finals, the American challenge cup series will be played off, between an Ottawa Valley All-star team and an American squad. At least six Gaels will be involved in this playoff.

Grad leagues start soon

The Graduate Student Society will again be sponsoring summer softball and soccer leagues this year. In order that games may begin by mid-May, it is important that all interested participants notify the organisers as soon as possible.

In the case of soccer, team captains should submit a list of players to Basil Ramsey, 2nd floor Gordon Hall Ext. 6182. Any other persons wishing to play should leave their name with the Commissioner and they will be assigned to teams in due course. Participants need not be Grad students. Eligibility rules have not yet been determined for this year, though in the past restrictions have been minimal.

All persons wishing to play softball should leave their name with Howard Pearce's office in the Phys Ed centre (ext 6984). Mr. Pearce would particularly like to hear from anyone who is willing to help organize the league. Rules governing eligibility will be determined shortly. In the past, participation has been limited to people connected with Queen's, and persons playing in other leagues have been excluded.

Further arrangements will be posted as they become available. The deadline for entries in both leagues is 5:00 pm Friday, May 5th.

A retiring professor: E. A. Walker used to know almost all the fac

This interview, one in a series with faculty members who are retiring in 1972, was written by Journal reporter Rachael Edwards.

Alistair Walker remembers saying to his wife when they first came to Kingston in 1941, "God, wouldn't it be awful to have to spend the rest of our lives in Kingston!" But now, thirty-one years later, he admits that he has enjoyed every minute of the time he has spent here.

Walker, who is retiring at the end of this academic year, has been teaching in the English Department at Queen's since 1944.

His memories of Queen's as it was when he first arrived show that it was quite a different place from what it is now.

Walker pointed out that, because there were only 40 people on the staff, he used to know almost all the faculty members at Queen's. Kingston Hall, where he had his office which he once shared with Dr. George Whalley, also housed most of the other professors in the Humanities. He said that in that building it used to be possible to hold long conversations with people from many different disciplines. But this sort of interaction has been greatly reduced by the growth of the university and the separation of faculty into different buildings, he added.

There was also great communication between the Principal and members of the faculty when Queen's was small, he said. He pointed out that a professor could walk into the Principal's office without an appointment and talk to him at length.

Queen's has always had the greatest principals in the country, said Walker, and especially Principal MacIntosh. He recalled an occasion on which Principal MacIntosh was able to recite word for word a speech that he had delivered from notes scribbled on the back of an envelope more than two weeks earlier.

Walker worked in close association with Principal MacIntosh when he served as President of the now extinct National Council of Canadian Universities, in the early 1950's. It was at these meetings, he said, that he met all the "bright guys" in Canadian universities.

When he first came to Queen's, Walker taught English to Engineers, and although the university only had about 2200 students, the classes he taught had 50 to 100 students each. He described his first years of teaching as "slave-driving", because in his 12 hours of lectures a week, he repeated the same two lectures six times.

He came to Queen's after receiving an M.A. from Cambridge University and working at several different jobs, including a Wall Street runner (he wonders if he was responsible for the crash!) and training militia at Barriefield.

Walker said that although he has seen many changes take place in the campus since he has been here, the change that affects him personally the most is the big improvement in the salary of a professor. In the early days, "the salaries were atrocious", he said and he was forced to take on other jobs just to "sustain life". These jobs included being in command of the militia training at Queen's, teaching at R.M.C. and being Examiner-in-Chief of English Composition one year.

The enlargement of the Queen's campus is another very noticeable change, Walker said. When he first came to the campus, it was very small and beautiful, and the buildings were on the east side of University avenue. The only buildings in existance were the older ones that still form the core of the campus, and the Union and Douglas Library were much smaller, he said.

Walker said that when the buildings were begun on the west side of University Avenue, they should have been done in red brick as the houses were that stood there before. The only value attached to the limestone is a sentimental one, he said, and the limestone has since been replaced by "cement Blockhouses".

In speaking of the new buildings at Queen's, Walker said that the architects have shown "a lack of imagination in things aesthetic". The buildings are practical, he said, but lack any architectural integrity.

This lack of interest in the aesthetic things of life is apparent not just in architecture but all over the campus he added.

He pointed out that an example of this aesthetic shortsight is the fact that a large mural commemorating the part of Canadian

Youth "half of our unemployed", Prague student magazine says a

An unfortunate side effect of Canada's recent economic recession is beginning to show as university enrolment figures and youth unemployment figures are being tabulated — Canadian youth have no place to go.

The labor force, in these times of high unemployment and the new rash of layoffs (due to President Nixon's import surcharge), cannot accommodate more than 50 per cent of the young workers in the job market.

And university enrolment is down all across the country. The economic squeeze has caused a severe shortage in summer jobs for students, tighter money in many families of students, and higher university admission standards caused by provincial governments which cannot afford to subsidise universities to the degree that these institutions have become accustomed.

Furthermore, university students are beginning to realise that a college degree is no longer a meal-ticket to a cushy job. As the number of college graduates rises, so rises the rate of unemployment among people younger than 25 years of age. And fewer and fewer grads are getting work in their specific fields of qualification.

Symptoms of Illness

It is becoming increasingly clear, in the midst of this economic turmoil, that the proliferation of government task forces, economic reports and brain-storm youth employment schemes are really an attack on the symptoms of youth unemployment. The disease -- a capital-intensive industrial society that is restricted by American control of most Canadian industries -- continues its cancerous course unchecked.

Now, after four frustrating years of inflation followed by massive unemployment, the government has set up an inter-departmental study group (the term "task force" has become passe because of its embarrassing connotations) to form a "brain trust" to study the economy. They will concentrate on high unemployment among youth, and its relationship to under-enrolment in post-secondary educational institutes.

Projected enrolment for post-secondary institutes in 1971 was 594,000 students. In reality, the figure was only 519,000. Projected enrolment for universities was approximately 341,000. The true figure is less than 300,000.

Where are the missing students? One thing is certain: they aren't in the labor force. Over half of the 455,000 unemployed persons in Canada today are under 25. This situation has been getting worse for the past ten years: now it is reaching crisis proportions.

Last year, the symptoms of high youth unemployment and low university enrolment were blatant. A quick look at the following selected items from the daily newspapers of October 1971 quickly dispels the myth that all is right with the national economy:

> Under-enrolment at the University of Calgary forced the Board of Governors there to implement an immediate budget freeze on the hiring of academic and support staff. The university, with enrolment almost 2,000 below the projection of 10,600, has committed itself to expenditures which could exceed its resources.

The unemployment rate for people under 25, despite the federal government's Opportunities for Youth Programme and the promised economic upswing, was higher in July (10.8 per cent) and August (9.1 per cent) of last year than in 1970.

It is general knowledge that unemployment hits people in the lower-income bracket the hardest. They are unable to compete for many jobs because they lack education. Thus, they are the most expendable and the least able to protest themselves.

Unemployment is also a serious problem among those under 25. Even when the Canadian economy is going full-tilt at near-zero unemployment, the young are beset by consistently high unemployment. Youth unemployment for the past 20 years has been an average of 100 per cent higher than the national average.

This discrepancy has been getting greater during the past decade as the ratio of youth unemployment to overall unemployment has risen steadily.

Couple this with the fact that overall unemployment has been getting worse and worse over the past decade (1970's national unemployment rate of 5.9 per cent was the highest since 1962) and the problem facing today's youthful worker becomes clear.

A quick breakdown: unemployment among males from 14 to 19 in 1970 was 15.0 per cent, (the highest since 1961); among males 20-24 it was 10.5 per cent (the highest since 1961); among females 14-19 it was 11.4 per cent (the highest ever); and among females 20-24 it was 5.1 per cent (highest ever).

The Hidden Unemployed

But all these statistics are from Statistics Canada's conservative reports. There is also a large percentage of youth who constitute a hidden or disguised unemployment group.

When the Canadian economy is on a downswing (a situation that happens regularly) and there are fewer jobs, a significant number of young people, especially females, withdraw from active participation in the labor force. Some of these people return to school, some leave to see the world, but most are classified by Statistics Canada as "retired", i.e. neither working nor seeking work.

This factor raises the true unemployment figures for youth by two or three full percentage points. For example, the unemployment rate for males aged 14 to 19 in March 1971 was listed at 17.5 per cent. In reality, the percentage was about 22.6 per cent unemployed.

So, you might ask, if the labor market is so bad, why don't they go back to school? Unfortunately, when the economy slumps, that option gets removed as well. Universities have only three sources of income: students, government and industry. If the economy is slow, government and industry tighten their belts and dish out fewer riches to universities.

And universities, with smaller subsidies, have to limit enrolment by raising admission standards, or else raise tuition fees so that students themselves have to pay more. While all this is going on, of course, the would-be student cannot find a summer job and thus has no money.

"Opportunities for Youth"

In the spring of 1971, the government had another brainstorm. It would keep the student unemployment problem in isolation and unleash a $23.3 million windfall from the Secretary of State's office under the guise of "Opportunities for Youth".

More than 27,000 kids spent the summer picking up garbage in parks, creating community newspapers and journals, doing research on community planning and pollution, and using up $23.3 million in non permanent and generally counterproductive ways. (There were exceptions; some very productive projects were carried out.

Has it worked? Of course not: youth

Time for faculty to tighten belts

Universities in Ontario appear to be entering a most difficult period: the provincial government is cutting support, and the federal government (which puts up around half of the money) is making angry noises. Fees are going up, it seems, with a massive 400 dollar increase for graduate students, and a 100-dollar bite for undergraduates.

This is happening at a time when career-oriented students are beginning to despair that their expensive, time-consuming degree will not count for much in later life. Other, more academically-minded, students are sometimes appalled at the shallow irrelevance and low standards of some courses. Members of both groups, faced with fee increases may opt out, or be forced out.

We do not claim here to have an answer to all of these problems. But we do have an answer to the fee hikes. It is simple, workable, fair to all concerned, and positive in the effect it would have on the university community.

It is this:

Let the university absorb the full weight of the fee hike, and let it do this by reducing salaries of all faculty, and those in administration whose salaries exceed 10,000 dollars annually. It should be possible, too, to effect economies in the general administration of the university.

Understand first that this is neither unreasonable, nor a joke. The facts are these:

1) The province never "ordered" a fee increase. What it did, in effect, was lower its per-student support, and invited the universities to recoup the amount through a fee raise. But they are not obliged to do so.

2) It seems to be the intention of the provincial government that the universities themselves pick-up at least part of the tab. For example, in the Toronto Star (Wed. Apr. 5) we have:

"Speaking to University of Western Ontario students, Kerr said Ontario universities do not seem to be so hard up financially that they cannot absorb some of the costs." (of the Provincial cutbacks). That, as it happens, is the understatement of the year, for,

3) The average faculty salary at the University of Waterloo is 18,000 dollars per annum. According to semi-public university document, 263 (or 44 percent) of the faculty earn in excess of this amount. We believe this document to be incomplete because there are persistent reports that some 90 faculty members (not mentioned in the document) earn in excess of 30,000 dollars.

(For comparable Queen's figures, see below.)

When you realize that faculty salaries eat up only about a third of the university's budget, you begin to see the lack of necessity for any kind of fee hike at all.

4) The part of the academic "community" that gets paid is expecting a raise this year. Except graduate students, of course. Their "raise" is of a rather different form.

5) An undergraduate arts student is, at present, worth about 1,700 dollars to the university per year. If the university were to absorb the fee increase this would mean a loss of 100 dollars on 1,700 dollars, or six percent. That is, the bite that need be taken out of faculty and administration pockets is only, on average, four percent.

Thus there is no need here for a wave of firings, for a "night of long knives". There is no need for anything but the recognition that salaries are astronomical in relation, in most cases, to the work done, or in relation to the positive results of research done to the Canadian community.

Let us be clear here about two things:

First: academic salaries had traditionally, until recent times, been quite low, partly in recognition of the fact that the scholarly, contemplative life is an exceptionally pleasant one, and partly in recognition of the fact that scholarly pursuits are frequently obscure and arcane to the lay mind. And it remains true even today that genuinely serious academics do not enter the profession for the money.

Second: It is a sign of a second-rate, and not a first-rate, university that enormous salaries are paid. The reason for this is simple: The first-rate attract by prestige. The second-rate university which aspires to first-rate status has only money with which to do this. But money is no substitute for time, cultural fertility, and serious dedication, and they usually fail.

Thus, in this way at least, lower salaries would make for a healthier environment at Waterloo. An even more important reason for adopting this strategy is the feeling that would be created of having taken a first step toward community here. Students might begin to feel that they, and scholarly pursuits, were more important in the affairs of this university than the dollops of money extracted from the public purse, and now, increasingly, from them.

So it is that we do not advocate storming Queen's Park on behalf of "more dollar per scholar". The taxpayer feels that he has had enough of ever-increasing expenditure on education, and he is right. Neither do we advocate paying these extra fees as an exercise in increasing student power (a la the Wright report.)

The Idea that greater costs assumed by the students will mean more power for them is nothing more than a stupid, cruel joke. Any display of student power in this area must involve the utter rejection of any fee increase at all.

This is, furthermore, a fight that can be won. If a substantial number of students make it clear that they do not intend to return if the hike is instituted, then the hike will be rescinded, for the simple reason that more money will be lost through their absence than would be gained through a fee hike.

There are still other reasons to believe that graduate students will leave in droves if their fees are doubled. And yet this is the generation of people we need to prevent the further takeover, by Americans and others, of the university.

Put bluntly, the question is this: Are we going to finally fight free from our present colonial position and mentality, or are we not? If we are, then thriving graduate programmes are a necessity.

Where is the money to come from? Not, in its entirety, from the government.

They have seen and heard too much about Ph. D. unemployment (caused, of course, by another piece of academic irresponsibility, the sell-out of the universities). The money is not going to come from the graduate students either. Many of them simply don't have it, and others don't care enough, in the light of their job prospects, to be bothered raising it.

The money must come from the faculty, which can easily afford it, and which bleats so loudly about excellence. They will need little reminding, we may hope, that excellence does not obtain without graduate studies and graduate students. We may hope.

We suggest that any fee increase at all be regarded as unacceptable. We suggest further that any firing in the name of budgetary shortages are unacceptable, in view of the present over-inflated salary schedule. We suggest, finally, that students and faculty alike must struggle forcibly against a system designed to promote the interests of the financially successful few against those of the wider community.

This article by Dr. George Haggar and Dr. Jerry Malzan is reprinted from the April 7 issue of The Chevron, newspaper of The University of Waterloo, at the suggestion of Doug Pritchard, president of the Graduate Student Society at Queen's.

At Queen's: salaries lower, plans uncertain

Queen's has not yet said what it will do about the $100 rise in provincially-suggested fee. A decision presumably will come from the May 12-13 meeting of the Board of Trustees.

Meanwhile, university officials were hesitant to quote an average salary figure for faculty members. They did say the floor amounts were $11,300 for assistant professors, $14,800 for associate professors, and $18,800 for full professors. Most faculty in those ranks would be earning more.

The Chevron gave this table for salaries at the University of Waterloo:

University of Waterloo 1971-72

Salary Range	Nos. of faculty
$25,000-up	51
$22,000-25,000	66
$20,000-22,000	66
$18,000-20,000	80
	263 - 44 per cent
$15,000-18,000	174
$13,000-15,000	78
$10,000-13,000	63
Under $10,000	10
	588

Queen's vice-principal (finance) Dave Bonham commented, "If that's the range at Waterloo, you can imagine that the range at Queen's is not entirely different. It's not the same, by any means, though. Waterloo has a reputation for paying very high salaries."

letter

I am writing in regard to a story on the Heffalump Craft Shop which appeared in the Queen's Journal, April 4, 1972, page 3. The story was a report of the discussion of the Heffalump which took place at a meeting of the AMS Outer Council in that week. The story was marked by several inaccuracies, both about the Heffalump and in relation to the discussion which occured at that meeting.

In the first place, I did not make a written plea to the AMS to keep the store open, as was reported in the Journal. I prepared a statement on the Heffalump for the Outer Council in which I outlined some of the alternatives which I saw open to the AMS, and I stressed that the AMS must make decisions such as these on the basis of a policy and a system of values, rather than on an ad hoc basis which might rise from the immediacy of an Outer Council meeting.

Secondly, the headline on the story credited the Heffalump with having suffered the AMS a $10,000 loss. It was pointed out in the meeting by Mr. John Blanchard, President of Elrond College Inc., that loss was an incorrect term to attribute to this sum of money. The greater portion of the $10,000 has been invested in stock for the shop, and as such is not lost. It has just changed its form as a value, for rather than hard cash, it is craft items.

Thirdly, the Journal story did not really reflect the point I stressed in the meeting that one cannot judge a business such as the Heffalump after only 10 months of operation. It takes time to establish such a commercial outlet, perhaps up to three years. It was the AMS that set up the Heffalump, and although the AMS is largely new faces this year, it is still the responsibility of the AMS that the Heffalump was set up. Whether or not the store remains open is somewhat secondary. The decision should not be made rashly in the fury of financial outrage.

I hope these points will clear up some of the inaccuracies which appeared in the Journal story.

Jane Corkin
Manager, Heffalump Craft Shop.

Whether or not the document Miss Corkin presented to the AMS was a "plea" to keep the store open, it was only the presence at the meeting of three Heffalumpers -- her, Al Broadbent and John Blanchard -- that kept it open.

Perhaps the Journal headline was misleading. The AMS (the student government) has invested $10,000 in the store, and that money is lost unless the AMS can get it back. Despite Miss Corkin's comment, the salvage value of the store -- what the AMS could get for it at this moment -- is nowhere near that figure.

Since there was no financial statement available at the AMS meeting (or elsewhere), no one can say for sure what the value of the Heffalump stock is. Miss Corkin seemed vague about it then herself. But since most of the store's business in crafts -- its original purpose -- is done on a consignment basis, there is little reason for $10,000 of student money to be tied up in crafts. Just where is it?

Of course it is hard to judge a commercial operation after only ten months. It is impossible, however, to judge it ever if there is no data, no financial material, no sales figures, nothing. The AMS, the investor in the store, was being asked two things: whether Heffalump should continue, and whether they should put more money into it. Had Miss Corkin come to the board of directors of a "real-life" investment syndicate with the information and attitude she had, she would quickly have been shown the door.

The AMS was invited to decide whether Heffalump, if it existed, should be a craft shop for student-made goods, an all-purpose store for things students want, an outlet for employing students, or something else again. Various ideas were aired; no decision was made.

Then it was invited to put more money into the business, to a total of twelve or fifteen thousand dollars. The original investment of $6000, and a total of $3500 in later loans, has still not been enough. How much more is needed? The only financial statement anyone could produce was, Miss Corkin admitted, only an approximation, within a few thousand dollars.

If the AMS has to put a total of $12,000 into its store to start it, that's one thing. If it has to put in a thousand dollars every couple of months indefinitely, to keep it running, that's something else, and much less defensible. If it does either thing without facts on which to base its decision, it is being irresponsible in the extreme. And that is what it did.

Of course, it did put a limit on Heffalump investment: $12,000. What no one mentioned is that if Miss Corkin and her staff spend more, the AMS will be liable for it.

Until the AMS and Miss Corkin show that they know what they are doing, they have nothing to pride themselves on.

Just two years ago, a lot of people thought The Revolution was starting. (What revolution? Nobody bothered to answer that one.) The stimulus was Richard Nixon's announcement that the United States troops "withdrawing" from the decade long war in Vietnam would do so by way of Cambodia -- "an incursion", he called it. The response was a massive feeling of betrayal; students and others demonstrated at universities around the world and across the United States, including, in Ohio, Kent State University. Everybody knows what happened then.

Next Thursday will be the second anniversary of the day members of the Ohio National Guard, under circumstances not yet explained, shot and killed four Kent State students, at least two of them simply bystanders to a confrontation between rock-tossing students and heavily-armed soldiers. Nine other students were wounded.

In the days that immediately followed, more than seven hundred colleges and universities in the United States, and many elsewhere, closed down for the rest of the spring term, or came close to doing so. (Queen's, of course, was already almost finished for the year. Nothing happened here.)

At Kent State, four students were dead. Two years later, it is a sad fact of history, not an urgent matter at all, that their names were Jeff Miller, Bill Schroeder, Allison Krause and Sandy Scheuer. Their parents, fianceees and friends remember, of course; nobody else has to.

Several thousand American military men have been shot, bombed, dynamited or stabbed to death in combat in southeast Asia. In the United States it is getting so that almost everybody is a parent or fiancee of friend of one of them, or knows somebody who is. A series of tens of thousands of personal tragedies is the meaning of the Vietnam war -- or any war -- in the homeland of the people who fight it.

The protests in May 1970 were about an expansion of the war, into a neighboring country, after the United States had promised that it would be contracted, wound down and within a short period brought to an end. People felt as though the nightmare war that had gone on for years and years, and whose end had been promised soon, was never going to end after all.

Two years later, here we are still. An end has been promised to the American participation in the war. (Neither South nor North Vietnam shows any wish to stop fighting. But, of course, it is their war; it isn't America's).

With the events of recent weeks, the feeling returns that this war is never going to stop. It was the North which started the recent offensive; in response, the United States resumed heavy bombings and began shifting weight as if to increase its troop commitment to southeast Asia once again. The peace talks have broken off. Peace is no closer, and it is a season for despair.

The was is not stopping. There have been no great riots about it yet, and perhaps there will not be. There has been no upsurge of radical protest; things have been much more dignified, as suits a messy, complicated, two-sided situation in a time of despair rather than of hope. The question remains as it did in 1970: will this war ever end? And the most telling sign of dull despair is the fact that no one has heard much about the Revolution lately.

Discount and bargain schemes always astound me by their deviousness. They are usually all facade and no reality, but they are so cleverly constructed as to make us think we are being treated well.

If I was looking for an analogy for how these schemes work, I would have to take the example of what major league baseball teams are doing to make up for the one week of the baseball season lost due to the player strike. The baseball players went on strike because they wanted the team owners to contribute an additional $40,000 each to the pension fund. Due to the incredible profits owners make, the players felt that this would not be to great a demand on their resources.

The owners refused for a while, but eventually settled to make the contribution. In the meantime, the players had been on strike for what would have been the first week of the season. So rather than the owners and players sharing the burden of lost gate receipts and lost salaries, the owners decided that they weren't going to lose a cent over the actions of their players, and they raised ticket prices and the prices of hot dogs and drinks. They penalized the players for having gone on strike, one week's salary, not admitting that they were a good half of the reason there was a strike.

The point is that the owners created the image of being hard put by the players demands and actions, furthered the image by having to keep the ball parks closed for a week, made themselves look good by giving in eventually, but all the time weren't hurt at all, a solution they made sure of by exercising their ability to hurt the fans and the players.

This is what generally happens behind the scenes whenever one sees someone trying to create a bargain or benevolent image. There is someone in the back room who has calculated the whole manoeuvre cleverly, and who knows that he can't lose on it.

For example, there is the Ontario legal aid scheme. The legal aid plan was instituted so that no-one would have to appear before the courts without the benefit of a lawyer. One would assume that it was aimed at the lower income groups, who cannot afford the exhorbitant fees lawyers charge.

How the plan actually works is that one lawyer in each town is responsible for assessing whether you receive legal aid. Now, lawyers are generally in the trade because they know there is good money in it. This is why there are so many large law offices, and so few "storefront" offices. The lawyer who makes the assessment as to whether someone receives legal aid is quite likely to take the point of view that if someone gets legal aid, then some lawyer is not going to be able to charge an ignorant citizen an exhorbitant fee. The government will pay the lawyer the fee, and they tend to have a more realistic idea what a lawyer is worth.

So the local lawyer will subject each applicant to a means test. If the applicant can show that he is utterly poverty stricken, that he and his family eat nothing but white bread and porridge, have a tarpaper house, walk everywhere, have not had a vacation in the past ten years, but are neat clean Canadians, then he is 90 per cent sure of getting legal aid. If however, the applicant lets slip that he took his wife to see a movie, or out for a beer, sometime in the past ten years, then he is deemed to be able to afford luxuries, therefore he must hire a lawyer.

It is quite out of the question to tell the legal aid man that a typical lawyer's fee will mean that the family cannot eat or do anything else enjoyable for the next six months. All that means to him is that the legal profession will have another case in small debts court in the next little while.

Essentially what has happened is that a plan for the people has fallen into the hands of the legal establishment, and they exercise their vested interests at will. When a group decides to get together and provide the services that the establishment group are supposed to provide, such as the Queen's law student's legal aid, they are not taken seriously. They find it difficult to get financing to carry on their program, mainly because the establishment group tells everyone that they are doing the whole job.

At any rate, I have become very wary of those who tell me that they are giving something at a discount, or that they are giving something for free. It remains a mystery to me that in a world blessed with great resources, so many still believe that you shouldn't get something for nothing.

I Never Sang For My Father

By Sandy Naiman

There is much that is dramatic in the reality of day to day life. But when transposing this reality to the stage, many times it is overshadowed by its drama. It is made bigger than life, because, I suppose, dramatists feel that the triviality of living just isn't dramatic enough to be effective on stage, that it is too small, too ordinary.

Robert Anderson, in his play, "I Never Sang For My Father," now at the Domino Theatre, with Peter Lichtenfels' direction has not fallen into this trap. Both playwright and director have been able to use the drama inherent in a situation which many of us have faced or will, to make the production one of the most moving, emotionally gripping Kingston has seen this year.

Coupled with an excellent script and perceptive direction, a consistently captivating cast of principles has explored the psychological Hell which often evolves when members of the family grow old and unknowingly incapable of caring for themselves.

Charles Pullen counterpoints with poignant narratives the sequence of scenes in which he attempts to reconcile his feelings towards his father, a man once respected and esteemed in a suburban New York community. As Gene Garrison, Mr. Pullen suppresses the frustration, the anger and the deep-seated hostility towards the father he always wanted to love but couldn't. He slips from confrontation to narration smoothly and easily, never quite losing the flavour of the preceding scene.

Ron MacPherson, as the elder Garrison, portrays very effectively the octogenarian slipping into senility, stubborn, forgetful and sarcastic. The electricity which pierces this tense atmosphere, changed with Gene's guilt and his father's castrating expectations is enhanced superbly by Carolyn Hetherington, as Margaret Garrison. Miss Hetherington captures completely and flawlessly the essence of the aged in her portrayal of Gene's understanding and loving mother. Her outstanding portrait makes what is scriptually a rather flat and uninteresting role, one that glows with subtlety and warmth. Miss Hetherington has approached her characterization as a sculptor does his stone, and has chipped and chiselled away at it until it is smooth and artistically perfect, without a trace of superficiality.

When the mother dies, at the end of the first act, the banished daughter is summoned from Chicago, and, as Alice, Nancy Helwig adds an extra spark to an already raging fire.

This is not a play of overt action but one of emotional confrontation, and as sister and brother meet, the recollections of the past and the venom of the present pour forth with hostility, with bitterness and with remorse. Both talk, not about their mother but their father, whose presence they cannot escape. The play is so accutely focused that the image of Tom Garrison, as he was once, and as he is and as he will be, is made indelible. Both playwright and player have made the portrait of a man losing his essence but fighting this loss, very explicit, and very real.

What is more intriguing is the way the son reacts to his father's expectations of him. Mr. Pullen's performance, throughout is sensitive and intuitive and in the end, when his father finally dies, his anguish is remarkably portrayed and remarkably human.

The play jumps around from house to hospital, from Rotary Club to funeral plot and this rather sophisticated element of script, in practise is handled simply by using the most basic theatrical convention, imagination. The magic of the theatre makes invisible rooms become realities. We take this premise for granted and never question it. Paul Moulton's cleverly designed set is utilized to its utmost and best illustrates the way in which simplicity can expand the imagery of a play and not detract from it.

Gary Thompson's lighting sets both tone and rhythm to the sobriety of his subject. It creates a tight, concentrated visual impact and is technically clean.

Mr. Lichtenfels has wrung his actors dry and they have given us a uniformly stunning piece of theatrical reality. The secondary characters, particularly Lee David, as the reluctant undertaker and Ray Goth, as the regretful doctor, are equally well developed. Every element of the production is part of a very carefully considered whole, nothing is out of step. The pacing, and the tone are balanced and become progressively more and more intense.

He has performed a masterful job, not only in producing en excellent piece of theatre, but also in gaining the respect of those with whom he worked. Mr. Lichtenfels ability to synthesize and present, neat, clean, tight drama, makes this production one of the most professional I have seen here and I look forward to seeing more of his work in the future.

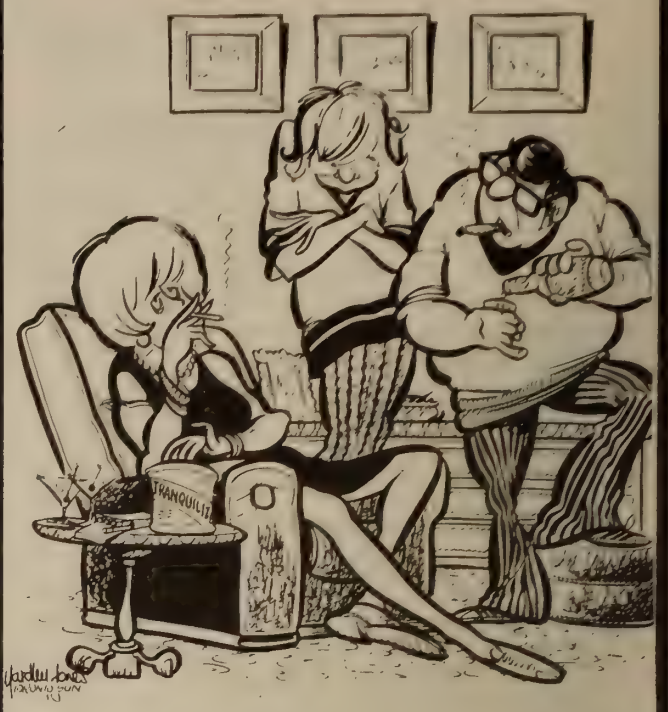
Canada: Quebec strike comes to end

QUEBEC -- Provincial legislation ended 11 days of strike by 200,000 public service workers Saturday, and across Quebec staff returned to hospitals, schools, government offices and liquor stores. But union leaders were split over the legislation; Louis Laberge, president of the Quebec Federation of Labour, said members have been asked "if they can find the courage to defy the law". An official of the Confederation of National Trade Unions, however, said members were advised to respect the law. The Montreal council of the CNTU called for a general strike May 1 in protest.

TORONTO -- No end is in sight to the strike of Toronto garbage collectors and other outside workers, and late last week mediator Arthur Maloney resigned after making no progress with negotiations. Local 43 of the Canadian Union of Public Employees wants a 10 per cent raise for each of two years; negotiators for the City of Toronto and Metro Toronto apparently have drawn the line at a 13.9 per cent total. The strike is in its third week.

OTTAWA -- Pierre Benoit, 33, became mayor of Ottawa Monday. His was the only name put forward to fill the remaining eights months of the mayoral term of Kenneth Fogarty, who has been appointed a judge. Benoit is a lawyer.



TORONTO -- The Ontario government will not hold a public inquiry into the need or the site for the international airport proposed for Pickering Township near Toronto, but will go ahead with expropriation for it, premier William Davis told the legislature last week.

TORONTO -- The Graduate Student Union at York University has announced it will apply to the Ontario Labour Relations Board certification as bargaining unit for teaching assistants and demonstrators.

TORONTO -- A legislature committee continued its hearings into charges that officials of the Workmen's Compensation Board have conflicts of interest which interfere with the work of the Board.

TORONTO -- The Ontario Confederation of University Faculty Associations says the president of the Ontario College of Art has been overstepping his jurisdiction in running the dissension-torn OCA.

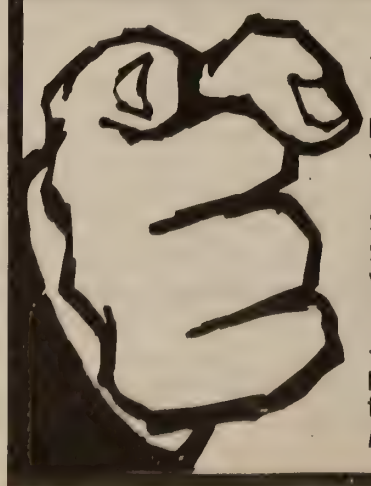
The Universe: Apollo XVI comes back

MOON -- Apollo XVI left the moon Monday for a three-day journey bringing the three American astronauts to a landing scheduled for today in the Pacific Ocean south of Hawaii. Lunar module Orion spent three days in the moon's surface, during which two astronauts conducted geological tests and travelled almost 25 miles on foot and by moon-rover.

SAIGON -- The North Vietnamese offensive continued, as civilians evacuated Kontum City in the central highlands Tuesday before Northern tanks. The provincial capital of An Loc, sixty miles north of Saigon, was attacked from four sides Sunday, but was still Southern-controlled after 17 days of siege. Southern military sources said there have been 3,000 Southern deaths and 7,000 other casualties in the recent offensive; they estimated 13,000 Communist deaths.



WASHINGTON -- Senator Edmund Muskie of Maine is meeting serious trouble in his battle for the Democratic nomination for President of the United States. Eight primary elections within two weeks, including Pennsylvania and Massachusetts earlier this week, were expected to give stronger support to Senator George McGovern of South Dakota and former Vice-President Hubert Humphrey of Minnesota. The only other major candidate is Governor George Wallace of Alabama. It seems likely no candidate will arrive at the July convention with enough support to win on the first ballot.

OBERLIN, Ohio — A motorist was fined $10 Monday for violating Orberlin's ordinance which prohibits possession of non-returnable containers. James Bell, the first-person convicted of violating the ordinance, was also fined $113 and sentenced to 30 days in jail for failure to maintain control of his car and driving while his licence was under suspension.

PARIS -- French voters Sunday approved the admission of Britain, Ireland, Norway and Denmark to the European Common Market, but 45 per cent of registered voters abstained, and the yes vote amounted to only 38 per cent of registered voters, in what was considered a slap in the face for president Georges Pompidou.

LONDON -- After 144 years, an Earl of Leicester has spoken before the House of Lords. The fifth earl, speaking against pollution, said he had not made a speech in his 22 years of holding the title, nor had three generations of ancestors. The family motto is "He is prudent who is patient."

No teaching jobs, demonstrators say; speaker agrees

Ontario premier William Davis met two hundred demonstrating students, and then a delegation of university and student leaders, when he visited Queen's last week for the official opening of McArthur Hall on the west campus.

TAX OUR BRAINS, NOT OUR POCKETS said one sign held by a graduate student, one in a demonstration organized by the Graduate Student Society to protest recent steep increases in the tuition fees to be charged grad students. "Give us a break," they chanted, joining with education students protesting the bleak prospects for employment as teachers.

The demonstration was calm, as had been urged earlier by Queen's principal Dr. John J. Deutsch, who told the university senate earlier that "I should think that the premier is more apt to be impressed by a strong argument than by a demonstration."

Deutsch was replying to education student senator Ed Devai, who pointed out that only about a fifth of education students were sure of jobs, and when orderly processes have not worked, "sometimes the stimulus has to be more vigorous".

Education student president Brian DuPlante mentioned the same employment problems during the ceremonies opening McArthur Hall last Tuesday.

"It appears ironical that this time has been chosen to officially open the doors of Duncan McArthur Hall, at a time when the doors to the schools are being closed to us," he said.

DuPlante blamed the teacher surplus on the Davis government, which increased the pupil-teacher ratio in Ontario; "there are about 4,000 fewer teaching positions available in this province as a result of present government policies."

Another speaker on that programme was Dr. Helen Hardy, daughter of the late Duncan McArthur, who was a Queen's graduate (B.A., M.A. and honorary L.L.D.), history professor and deputy minister of education for Ontario in the 1930's. Dr. Hardy and her sister Mrs. Mary Fraser presented a portrait of McArthur which was unveiled by education dean Vernon S. Ready.

A reception and banquet followed the ceremonies. Vice-principal Jim Courtright told The Journal Tuesday that a feature of the reception was the theft, by persons unknown, of $159 worth of sherry glasses.

The scarcity of teaching jobs is likely to continue, Canada's chief statistician said at a symposium the following day, also marking the McArthur opening. After discussing the employment situation in Canada generally, she suggested that by the end of the 1970's Ontario will have one thousand surplus teachers.

In the early part of the decade there will be a slight increase in secondary school enrollment, said Dr. Sylvia Ostry, as the rise of the 1960's levels off. But after that there will be a steady decline until 1980, and then "no growth".

Unless some factors change "radically", she said, that picture is inevitable.

She pointed out that enrollment in colleges of education are increasing (this year's is 3400, versus 2900 last year) and a surplus is bound to result.

Provincial education minister Thomas Wells was no more encouraging last week when he warned that students who go into teacher training should do so "with their eyes open as to their employment prospects upon graduation".

They should be prepared to go where there are jobs and to choose areas of specialization in which more teachers are needed, he said.

The government policy of integrating teachers' colleges with universities, requiring university training for applicants to teachers' colleges, and training elementary and secondary-school teachers at the same colleges will improve flexibility.

Though there are fewer jobs, Wells said, "No one should be denied access to teacher training if they want it." Accordingly, there will be no quotas, he said.

GRADS UNHAPPY AFTER MEETING DAVIS

$50 exemption to help undergrads too

Leaders of the Graduate Student Society were discouraged after they met with Ontario premier Bill Davis during his visit to Queen's last week.

"We regret that our meeting with Premier Davis failed to come to grips with the immediate financial problems facing graduate students as a result of the massive tuition fee increases for their programmes in the coming year," a GSS statement afterwards said.

It said Queen's principal Dr. John J. Deutsch, who joined in the meeting, told Davis that universities, and the government's own Committee on University Affairs, had not been consulted before undergraduate fees went from $485 to $585 and grad fees from $485 to $877.50 for a twelve-month year.

"Dr. Davis regretted this lack of consultation and agreed the resultant unfairness of the additional fee levy on graduate programmes could probably have been avoided," the GSS statement said.

(Davis received an honorary L.L.D. from Queen's in 1968).

The statement continued by saying that Davis did not answer several of their questions -- in particular, "Where are graduate students expected to find this additional required fee in the face of income ceilings and severely limited personal resources?"

It concludes with Davis' final comments to the three GSS leaders who met with him: "We know the problems. We are discussing them. We are looking at it in a positive light. I won't go beyond that."

Tuesday, GSS president Doug Pritchard commented on three recent developments which affect the financial picture for students:

PAY CEILING RAISED

The Ontario government has raised from $1800 to $2400 the "ceiling" on payments which may be made by universities to teaching assistants. Grad students at many universities depend heavily on teaching undergraduates to finance their work. Queen's has not emphasized such assistantships in the past -- and, Pritchard said, few grads at Queen's, except some in the department of computing science, are being paid the full $1800 now.

Besides, he said, there has been "no indication that the casual academic budgets have been raised by the 30 per cent" which this increase involves. As a result of these factors, Pritchard said, this raise will have little effect at Queen's.

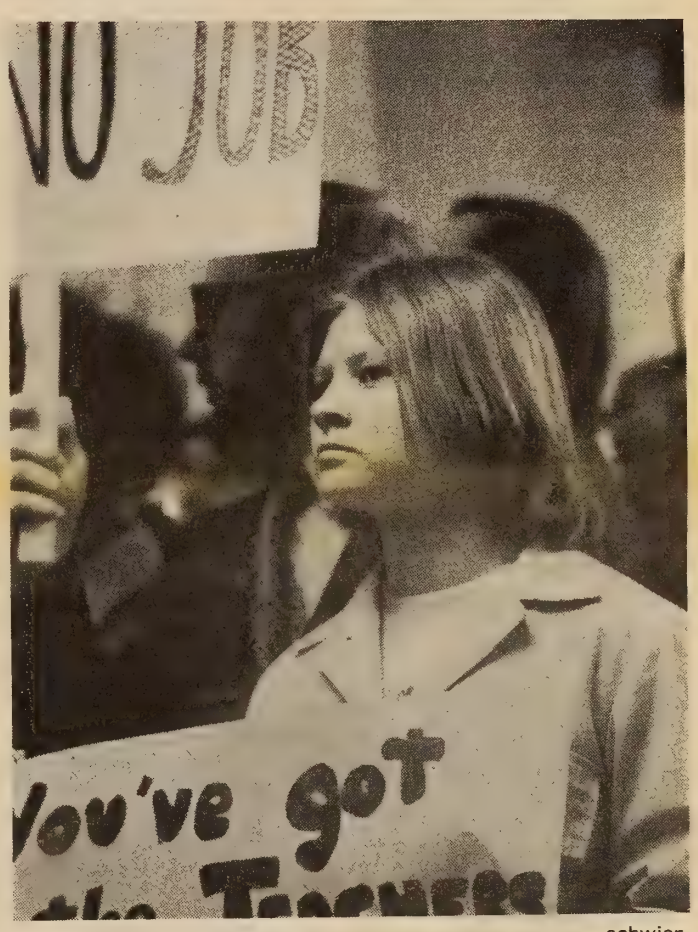
SUMMER BURSARIES ALLOWED

At the same time, the government said it would permit universities -- if they could find the money -- to pay $300 bursaries to students taking a third consecutive semester, as most grad students must do to work on their theses in the summer. Until the recent government-announced increase, there was no tuition fee for this term, but it will now be $292.50 -- a third of the full year fee of $877.50.

However, Pritchard said, this measure is to go into effect in May 1973, and unless the government changes its mind it may not help those whose third, formerly free, term is the fall term of 1972.

He added that the bursary system may be a stopgap system lasting only one year.

"I would like to commend the universities for their willingness to use operating funds to assist graduate students in this manner," George Kerr, minister of colleges and universities, told the Ontario legislature when he announced the system.



Kerr said then that the Council of Ontario Universities and the government's Committee on University Affairs had asked for the bursary system and for the rise from $1800 to $2400.

INCOME TAX DEDUCTION

The federal budget tabled Monday included a provision for a new $50 per month deduction for full-time students, reducing the taxable income of undergraduates by $400 and of grads by $600. Students who file their own tax returns will be able to claim the deduction; parents paying their children's fees can do so only if the students' earnings, if any, are included in their income when they file the return.

Pritchard said Tuesday the details of the new deduction were not clear. He pointed out that students who receive scholarships can now deduct $500 before counting the rest of the scholarship, if any, as taxable income, and speculated that a student may not be allowed to claim both deductions. If so, he said, the gain may be an illusion.

But he added that if a student -- especially a grad -- can claim both deductions he may save around $120 per year in income tax payment.

Heffalump in the balance

The future of the Heffalump boutique will be decided at a special AMS inner council meeting next Wednesday night (at 7 p.m. in the John Orr Room).

The Journal has learned that the Heffalump, the controversial craft shop owned by the AMS, has spent most of the $2000 loan authorized last month by the outer council. This, plus the fact that the lease expires June 1 on the boutique's Princess Street space, has prompted a definite decision at this time.

AMS vice-president Wally Palmer said letters would be sent to all outer council members telling them of the situation and inviting them to the meeting.

Palmer said he hoped to have more information on the store, including a financial statement, in time for the meeting. He would not speculate on what the meeting might decide to do, but did not rule out closing the store altogether. It has operated since last summer and absorbed about $12,000 of AMS money.

OFY grants announced

The Career Planning and Placement office Tuesday released a list of the Opportunities for Youth projects for 1972 which have been approved for Queen's and Kingston.

The list includes two established Queen's-related services: the law students' legal aid project in the community, and the abortion and birth control information centre which was started last fall.

But one is conspicuously missing: the Student Volunteer Bureau, which in 1971 had a $35,000 OFY grant, Canada's third largest. SVB apparently was one victim of a $100,000 cut in the grant assigned to Frontenac County, and of what some observers have called political manoeuvring.

Dave Wroe, director of the placement office, said he could not immediately provide details of all the projects. (More information about them will appear in next week's Journal.)

Besides legal aid and birth control, these were the approved projects: Process; Exit 101 Impact (a highway safety project); Environmental Productions; Adventure Playgrounds; Advocacy Planning; Playground Theatre; Parents Helpers (a high school students' baby-sitting project); Dental Clinic; Serve the People; Repair Centre; Kingston Community Theatre; Family Centre.

"There are one or two things I'm not very happy about," Wroe said Tuesday. "One was the strict quota system. The other was the strict control over salary."

Coed Morris organized

A steering committee for coed Morris Hall has been organized and will govern the building until October, The Journal was told this week by Doug Romans, longtime advocate of integrated residences.

Romans was chairman of a committee which presented plan after plan for residence integration, and finally, in February, saw Morris made a 188-bed coed residence.

The Residence Board agreed earlier this month that the committee would include four of the six elected proctors (women), four of the six floor seniors (men), a representative of the board, and the dons and warden who will live in Morris.

In October the government of the building will be reviewed, Romans said.

The Board accepted the proctor and floor senior elections which have been held, though with some grumbling, Romans said.

Galingale raffle planned

Science 73 has announced that the first prize in the Galingale Raffle will be a two-week tour in January 1973 to London, Amsterdam and Paris. Other prizes include a film movie set, a Honda 70, a clock television, and selections of merchandise.

The raffle, which will reach its climax in November, is the major money-raiser for Galingale, the 1972 Science Formal.

Raffle tickets are $1 and may be purchased from the summer address, 328 Douglas Avenue, Oakville, Ontario. They will be on sale on campus in the fall.

Trustees will retire at 72

The university's board of trustees has announced restrictions, passed at the board's February meeting, which will apply to board members in future. The maximum age for board members normally will be 72.

Trustees will not normally be allowed to hold office for more than twelve years in a row.

The board of trustees is the 36-member board which "owns" the university and is financially responsible for it.

Bookstore group reports

Queen's needs a comprehensive bookstore, and Tech Supplies should immediately start becoming one: those are the conclusions of a supplementary report issued recently by the bookstore task force set up by the senate to study the problem.

An earlier report had listed possibilities and invited comment. This report specifically calls for "a comprehensive multi-service campus bookstore" to be owned by the university and managed by a widely representative board.

It should eventually be located in the university centre when that centre is built, the task force says. At present Tech Supplies is in Clark Hall, which is scheduled to be demolished within a few years, and is owned by a subsidiary of the Engineering Society. It has financial ties with the placement service, which the task force says should be separated entirely.

"We recommend that Technical Supplies immediately begin a program of expansion toward the comprehensive campus bookstore," the report says, and to do so it should, if necessary, abolish discounts on books.

At present Tech Supplies offers a five per cent discount from the list prices of textbooks; that figure was ten per cent until May 1.

The report makes various other recommendations about the bookstore's operations, including a proposal that it operate a year-round second-hand book service and that it look into the production of packaged course materials (such as are now used in law, and slightly in some other departments).

The bookstore should expand into "crush space" during the September buying rush, the report says, and should cooperate more closely with the library in making sure that required books are always available to students in some form.

KGH starts children's unit

Kingston General Hospital will begin work this month on an intensive care unit for children. The three-bed unit will be installed in Angada Children's Hospital, attached to KGH, at a cost of $25,000.

About thirteen children each month need intensive care, according to the department of paediatrics, which KGH shares with Queen's.

KGH will be Kingston's centre for paediatrics when the projected health science complex is built.

Music scholarships set up

The university has established ten $500 scholarships for music students.

Five of them have been contributed by the Kingston Symphony Association; they will be assigned each year for at least five years. The other five are being financed by the university and are specifically for students in the Bachelor of Music programme.

Ice cream stand to open

An AMS-endorsed ice cream stand will open on Monday on the terrace between Jeffery Hall and Agnes Etherington Art Centre.

Operated by two students -- Muriel Smith and Pat Manly -- it was approved Tuesday by the AMS inner council, which is filling in for outer council during the summer.

Last year the AMS ran a more extensive ice cream and food stand on the terrace and lost $1700.

Professor, student die

A faculty member and a student both died Monday, university chaplain Dr. A. M. Laverty has told The Journal.

Dr. Beatrice H. Worsley of the department of computing and information science died in Kitchener. She was on sabbatical from Queen's this year and was at the University of Waterloo.

Final-year geology student John Zavitz died at Thessalon, Ontario.

No details about either death were available.

New leave policy

Queen's should no longer give "sabbatical leave" as such to faculty members, says a working paper prepared by a senate committee and released last week.

But the proposals, written by the committee on appointment, promotion, tenure and leave, substitute what the committee calls "regular leave", which would be available on roughly the same basis now used for sabbaticals.

After six years of service to Queen's a staff member would be eligible to apply for regular leave, a period away from the university at part salary which the faculty member would use for "projects which cannot be carried out if the time available is limited to intermittent hours, days or weeks" such as writing a book.

"Projects of this type are common to all members of the academic community," the paper says, "and regular opportunities to carry them out are necessary for the maintenance and development of staff as teachers, scholars, researchers and professionals."

A faculty member is not automatically entitled to a year's leave after six years of service, the paper says: "the balance of benefits against costs will not be favourable to each staff member every time he applies". It says benefits to the university include research and scholarship besides improvement in creative teaching when a staff member returns. Costs are both financial and indirect (a course may be taught less effectively, or suspended, while the staff member most qualified to teach it is away).

Besides this "regular leave", the committee's paper suggests a system of "negotiated leave" when a faculty member wishes to spend a period at another university, or working for government or in industry.

A staff member on negotiated leave would not normally be paid by Queen's, but as the name of the system suggests, the details of the leave would be worked out between the university and the faculty member.

As with regular leave, the balance between costs and benefits would have to be calculated, the paper says.

Alumnae hold jubilee

The Alumnae Association -- the league of women graduates from Queen's -- will celebrate its Diamond Jubilee this weekend, honouring sixty years of the organization's existence.

Parties and a general meeting are included in the weekend's events, centred in Ban Righ and Chown Halls. A luncheon at the faculty club on Saturday will feature a fashion show of dress styles covering the past sixty years.

The first woman to graduate from Queen's got her degree in 1880.

Citizens protest exemption

More than 11,000 people have signed a petition protesting Kingston's tax-exempt property situation.

Kingston has the highest proportion of tax-exempt land in any Ontario municipality -- 34.5 per cent, much of it Queen's property. (The rest includes churches, hospitals, schools, government buildings and St. Lawrence College.)

As of Tuesday, three weeks after a group of citizens began circulating the petition, they claimed 11,668 signatures, including those of Kingston's MLA, Syl Apps, and Queen's principal Dr. John J. Deutsch. Kingston has a population of 54,000.

Members of the tax-exempt property committee, headed by Mrs. Irene Mooney of Kingston, expect to go to Toronto soon to meet with premier Bill Davis and present the petition to him. They will ask the provincial government to make funds available for the university and other institutions to pay full taxes on its property. (Queen's does give grants in lieu of taxes to the city, but they are only a fraction of the roughly $1 million per year that full taxes would be.)

The petition easily surpassed the goal of ten thousand signatures, Mrs. Mooney said, and "It gave us a sense of accomplishment."

Grad dean given award

Dr. Robert L. McIntosh, dean of the graduate school at Queen's, has been named winner of the 1972 Chemical Education Award presented by the Chemical Institute of Canada, in recognition of "outstanding contributions of individuals to chemical education in Canada".

McIntosh came to Queen's in 1961 as head of the chemistry department, later becoming associate dean of arts and science and then assuming his present position. He was responsible for setting up a group in theoretical chemistry at Queen's and increasing chemical research here. In 1972-73 he will be on sabbatical leave.

He will accept his award at the CIC's conference next month, at which he will deliver the award lecture on government's effect on graduate studies, under the title "Maunderings on the Usual Themes".

Gospel of false prophets: preaching about ecology

Ernst Haeckel, a 19th century zoology professor, created the word. While promoting Darwin's theories of evolution he hammered together two Greek fragments, and "oecology" had its beginning. In recent years few words have been so ill-used as the professor's brainchild.

After Haeckel coined it in 1869, "ecology" (the initial "o" was soon dropped) lay around quietly for a time. Then botanists rummaging in the academic attic discovered it and put it back in service. Ecology then, and theoretically still, is the study of the relationships between living things and their environment and of the effect of various life forms on one another. Take any animal or plant as an example, and other animals and plants constitute an important part of its environment e.g., fox and rabbit, woodpecker and oak. Ecology is a science of the present, the immediate. In the time it takes for one to say DDT, patterns and relationships change and new ones are created. Since the subject in its entirety is beyond our present powers of comprehension, scientists in the field have sensibly avoided calling themselves ecologists.

But in the mid-1950's media men seized the tender word and began to peddle it publicly. The age of pop ecology had begun. All sorts of people -- politicians, preachers, boy scouts, revolutionaries, ad men, fashion designers, corporate executives, housewives, teachers -- went out and got themselves a little ecology.

By 1965 few publications did not feel obliged to make a passing reference to the magic word. Like an all-purpose seasoning, ecology was sprinkled on essays about poverty, racism, dope smuggling, military strategy, professional football, etc. Suddenly there were ecology T shirts, soaps, executives, fund raisers, lawyers, lobbyists. Civil disturbances in the name of ecology popped up all over the landscape like mushrooms after a warm spring rain.

A society for the prevention of cruelty to words and ideas should be established, though it is no doubt, too late to save ecology. We have trifled with it to the point that it has become an irrevocably loose and fallen word. However, while the intellectual atrocity is still fresh, there is perhaps some value in recalling how we have heartlessly overworked and mutilated this interesting and useful concept. The misuses and abuses of ecology are all but innumerable. But among the cruelest should be noted:

Ecology is a thing

Within the past year advertisements have appeared for an "ecology testing kit." The inference is that ecology is a substance like chemical compounds in air, soil or water (which is what the ecology kit really is designed for testing). In fact, ecology can no more be seen, tasted, touched, weighed or substantively identified than can a square root. Both are abstractions used to describe an abstract relationship. This may seem a niggling point, but there are a great many people who think ecology is alive and substantial somewhere out in the big woods.

Ecology is a beautiful thing.

A ranger assigned to the Grand Canyon recalls spending an idle hour asking visitors to one of the park overlooks what they particularly liked about the place. Three people explained they had come to enjoy the ecology and certainly were.

Ecology is a nutritious thing.

In Tucson, and very likely elsewhere, there is a health-food store that sells ecology bread. This is catering to the currently widespread belief that ecology is some kind of heavy vitamin. All over this fruitful land there are people munching away on barely digestible items — kelp, sun-dried bananas, sunflower seeds, freaky grains and grasses. They seem to believe that by so insulting their taste and stomachs they are behaving ecologically.

Ecology is a clean thing.

A recent issue of Scope, a mod periodical for high school students, devoted an article to Word Power. The piece was illustrated by a photograph of what at one time was known as Hermie's Dump (in the village of Monticello, state unspecified). Towering over the original hand-lettered Hermie's Dump sign was a much larger, cleaner one giving the place its new name, MONTICELLO ECOLOGICAL SITE. Without taking sides in the matter, Scope noted that this was a good example of the use of plain and fancy words, which it is.

Ecology is conservation.

Ecology is a thing, ecology bread and ecological sites perhaps can be explained, if not excused, by our weakness for pretentious language or plain commercial high spirits. However, the ecology-is-conservation notion is something altogether different. It has been pushed assiduously by pop ecologists and the Bless the Birds Beasts and This Very Green Land crowd. The chief result of the campaign, if not its intent, has been to debase the concept of ecology and sppread confusion about biological realities.

The system of relationships between living things that seems to operate in this world is dynamic. So far as anyone has been able to determine, the only stable element within it is change. New forms are forever being created and existing ones modified; extinction and death are a part of the syste There are, for example, no forms presently inhabiting earth that have been here from beginning. This must be c sidered a blessing by those of living now, since we would h had great difficulty getting toehold on a planet loaded to gunwales with the accumula biological cargo of the ages pas things seem crowded these d consider what they might b assorted tree ferns, dinosa saber-toothed tigers and worse not cleared out. MP's reluctant to express their opinions on environmental issue

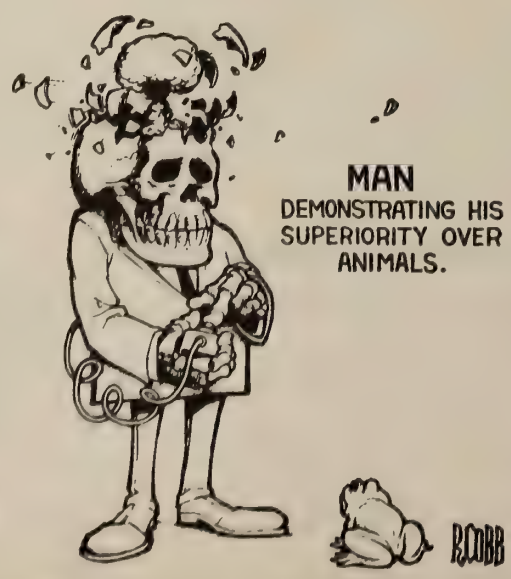
Pollution Probe in Ottawa conducted a series of interviews last summer with the federal members of Parliament who represent Ontario ridings, dealing with the various MPs' thoughts and feelings on issues relating to the environment. A full report of these interviews, as well as general background information on the MP's and on their work in the government which relates to the environment, has been released in an effort to stimulate "improved communications and understanding between the environmental groups and their MP's."

Of the 87 Ontario members, 61 were interviewed; the remaining 26 MP's with whom Pollution Probe could not obtain interviews were sent questionaires, to which only 2 replied.



Among those 24 MP's from whom no information was forthcoming was Kingston's MP, Edgar Benson. The information which Pollution Probe managed to get on Benson and on the environmental problems of the Kingston area (the latter obtained from local pollution and conservation groups) is worth noting, especially in light of the fact that a federal election will be coming up in the not-too-distant future. It is reprinted below in its entirety.

The Quinte Historical sites and Parkways Association would like to see the shore of Lake Ontario from Belleville to Kingston and the shore of the St. Lawrence River from Kingston to Gananoque set aside for conservation purposes. The Kingston Field Naturalists did not feel up to answering this question (about areas they might want preserved.) Pollution Probe Kingston stated that they would like to see some of the Thousand Islands preserved, but they didn't specify which ones. They would also like to preserve the Rideau River and Queen's University (funny- we thought it already was a preserve.)

The Quinte group was annoyed about the industrialization of the waterfront area which should be parkland and they blame Ontario Hydro and the Canada-Lafarge Cement Co. Federal prisons and private subdivisions are also a source of pollution. The Kingston Field Naturalists cited oil spillage from ships in Lake Ontario and the Seaway, the filling of marshes, the threat of heavier industry such as Hydro at Highway 33, the Cement plant at Bath, the silica quarry at Pittsburgh Township and the shipboard plant in Prince Edward County as pollution problems. Pollution Probe mentioned water pollution from Queen's University, the city itself, the Davis Tannery, private septic tanks in the Kingston area and waste disposal problems in the city itself. Air pollution comes from Alcan and from the Collins Bay Penitentiary.

In their contact with the MP, the Quinte Association thought he showed little interest: "His attitude towards the Kingston waterfront comprehensible, particu shipyards and ship st Naturalists have not a Pollution Probe has hac "because he is very u public meetings he att Annual Liberal Party m letters concerning air p Bay Penitentiary but rec objective terms, conservation tempted conservation might be considered anti-ecological since it represents an effort to meddle with or thwart natural processes. However, it seems biologically harmless since it is such a hopeless endeavor. Then, too, in human terms there is something constructive to be said for the human conceit of conservation. The crane and that sort of thing give some men pleasure. They enjoy having them around, and trying to keep them around makes many people feel righteous and moral. As such, these are useful pursuits and motives. If conservationists would simply acknowledge that whooping cranes, redwoods and wilderness vistas are their thing and that they would like to enjoy them for as long as possible, then they would be entitled to the same tolerance as nudists, vegetarians or horseplayers. However, when conservationists begin to bully and frighten people into believing their hobby is ordained by natural law and that ecological vengeance will be had on those who do not share their interest, then they become intellectual extortionists.

Ecology is a pie in the sky.

The actions of pop ecologists — the things they want to save, the changes they oppose, the laws for which they lobby — suggest that many believe there was a time when all relationships were pure, sweet and perfect. In America this ecological utopia is thought to have existed sometime between 1492 and the demise of the passenger pigeon in 1914. The exact dates can be filled in according to individual taste.

Utopias, of course, are static phenomena. They cannot be improved since they are perfect. If they are changed, they become imperfect and by definition something other than utopian. This changeless character accounts for the fact that utopias are found only within men's imaginations.

There is as much ecology now as there ever was. A National Park Service rustic picnic table may not be esthetic but it is not an ecological catastrophe and may, in fact, provide a home for deserving wood borers and sow bugs. A freeway may impair the romantic prospects of a wilderness for some, but it creates nice deer, butterfly, blackberry and poison-ivy habitat; a whole new series of relationships flourishes there. These days are no worse, or better, than the good old ones — only different. Tomorrow will also be different; if it is not, we are in real trouble. Ecology is not concerned with esthetics or antiquarianism.

Man is vile, ecologically speaking

The theme that man is a "bad 'un" has occurred regularly throughout history. It always has been a slippery thought, composed of a series of contradictory premises, unprovable value judgments and guilty emotions. Recently the notion has been adopted by pop ecologists.

The argument runs that whatever is natural is good, and the unnatural is bad. The world is composed of nature and of man, by first inference unnatural and by second inference bad. Landslides and guano deposits are natural; bulldozers and septic tanks are unnatural. This peculiar dualism has permeated much of our though.

In practice, man is not always or entirely unnatural. Thus a man can have a natural golf swing or naturally curly hair. The unnatural elements are generally regarded to be the unique attributes of our species, notably our faculties for abstraction, rationalization, contemplation and our technological talents.

In most respects, the man-is-by-nature-unnatural concept is a continuation of the man-is-vile brief. However, man can choose to restrain his unnatural nature, and when he does he lives in harmony with nature. If we do not restrain ourselves, letting all our unnaturalness hang out, we can destroy nature because we are inexplicably and unfairly stronger than it is. Of late we have been showing very little restraint and have become increasingly bad, unnatural and destructive. Unless we quickly shape up, nature will destroy us; ecological vengeance will be taken.

Set forth so baldly, the foregoing does not seem to amke sense. Yet, more cunningly dressed and camouflaged, these notions are at the philosophical heart of the ecological-environmental-conservation crusade that a great many of us have taken very seriously indeed.

Nature is a great deal more than deer, still forests, rippling seas of grass, whooping cranes and pure air. Nature is what is. Man is; the combustion engine is; nuclear fission is; and all are as natural as the next phenomena. Theology may give clues about how things should be but ecology does not. Questions of ecological good and bad are irrelevant.

Ecology is altruism.

According to information presently available, it seems likely that we play in the same fields and according to the same rules as every other living thing. A master motivation for individuals and all species seems to be to live as long as possible and to multiply as often as possible. In consequence, each life form is forever adapting, in an effort to cope with the environment, expand its range and defend against the expansionist tendencies of other creatures. If the objective is biological imperialism — total, exclusive occupancy of the planet by one kind — then nobody as yet has come close to achieving it. The prospect of such a victory seems remote. There is a kind of ultimate check, a biological Catch-22, built into the system. Every species is potentially its own worst enemy. A creature who by dint of some dazzling adaptive move opens a big lead over the pack never has held it for long. He is brought back, cut down and often eliminated entirely, usually because he has used up the resources, food and habitat upon which his specialty rests, or because of the debilitating effects (plague, starvation, genetic feebleness, psychological malfunction) of overpopulation. Nevertheless, everyone keeps plugging away at the game that is designed not to have a winner. In a sense it is this old-college-try spirit that seems to have created and sustained the dynamic system of inter-relations that we call or should call ecological.

Two of the pseudo-ecological problems that greatly exercise us currently are pollution and overpopulation. Our dirtiness and fertility are often cited as irrefutable evidence of our vileness and as we become increasingly dirty and fertile we are creating ecological havoc.

The usual rebuttal applies. Fifty billion men, for example, and whatever waste they would naturally create will not destroy the ecological system, only change it. Woodland ecology might go the way of the whooping crane, but the prospects are that sanitary land fills would provide as much ecology as anybody could possibly want. Just as no one knows what men should be, nobody knows how many or how clean they should be. If we can get away with 50 billion men and their garbage there is no ecological law that says we should not, and there are in fact many ecological pressures urging us on to test the human carrying capacity of the planet. If the earth were to be occupied by 50 billion men and their inevitable works, it seems probable that those multitudes would think, eat, work, play and be organized much differently than we do or are. A good many of us probably would not like such conditions; we are entitled to our preferences and, of course, can do what is possible to avoid this sort of future. It is a matter of self-interest, but of ecological inconsequence. Whatever the outcome, 50 or 0 billions, we can rest assured that there will still be ecology.

In all of this there is a curious anomaly. Pop ecologists talk a lot about ecology, but there is the strong feeling that they underestimate and certainly do not trust the efficiency of the ecological system. It does not seem immodest to claim that because of our technological skills, man is at present in the position of a creature who has moved quite a bit in front of the rest in the competition for dominance. Perhaps the best evidence supporting this assumption is that we are being troubled, among other things, by overpopulation and pollution (befouling our own nest). These are two processes within the ecological system that historically have worked to chop down temporary leaders. In an objective way, many of the current human problems are not evidence of the weakness and degradation of the ecological system. Rather, they are grim (from our standpoint) and constant reminders of its strength and efficiency.

Do you remember "Bill"? "Bill" Davis, that is.

"Bill" was the guy who was running for the provincial legislature last year, apparently in every riding in the province. He was the fellow who used to be William Davis, minister of education in Ontario for years, and when the provincial election came around last year he changed his name to "Bill" Davis, letting us know that he was just one of us average Ontarions, with a family and a penchant for throwing the football in the backyard.

You will recall that during that election period he spent great energy, not to mention colossal sums of money, in getting the "Bill" Davis image across to us. He was informal, earthy, smiling, easy, drafted, one of the fellows.

And you will recall that we thought that was just fine with us, so we vaulted him into the premiership of the province, surrounded by majority numbers of his partisan colleagues. The colleagues were very much an afterthought, for the man running everywhere was "Bill" Davis.

Well, "Bill" became the premier, and it wasn't long after that he changed his name back to William. I imagine that he thought that William was a name more suited to being the premier, and that it provided him with that symbolic seperation from the masses that would allow him to be a real politician.

I was only vaguely aware of the change of name until William Davis came to Kingston and Queen's last week to open our new faculty of education out at McArthur Hall. I had read in the newspapers that some change of image had taken place, but I wasn't aware of the fullness of the change. I expected to still see a bit of the old shirt-sleeves, some of that willingness to be photographed from the bad side. However, it became obvious that "Bill" had been left resting in the campaign coffers, and William had come to Kingston.

William displayed some of the slick and subtle moves of all great politicians. First, there was that tardiness for every appearance which induces a sense of expectation, indeed a sense of gratitude in a crowd. William Davis' arrival at McArthur Hall was about 15 minutes behind schedule. Crowds of graduate students and education students who were waiting to demonstrate their grievances to the premier milled silently, the peak of their performance slowly being left behind them. He followed this trend during the evening, always showing up several minutes late for each appearance, forcing the crowd to be thankful for his presence, thankful that they could get off their feet, thankful that the speeches would soon be started and therefore sooner be over.

The second great ploy engineered by William Davis was his ability to plant in most people's head the idea that his presence in Kingston was a diplomatic jaunt, that he was not here for the grimy business of politics, but for the ceremonial reason of recognizing and capping accomplishment. It is true that McArthur Hall represents accomplishment, but it is somewhat ludicrous that a man who is known to us because he has been successful in his political appeals can expect to come among us and not be dealt with on political terms. When one elects a premier of a province, one does not elect a ceremonial figure. Rather one elects a political figure who is responsive to our political pleasures and anxieties.

William Davis exhibited a third attribute of the slick politician, his ability to appear to be frank without ever being frank substantively. During his speech to the crowd assembled to open the doors of a building which had been open for a year, perhaps symbolic in itself, he successfully gave the impression of being hard hitting on both the question of the increase in graduate fees and the shortage of teaching jobs in the province. The whole thing was about as satisfying as eating a bowl of puffed wheat after being starved for a month.

The most brilliant part of the whole visit came when after-dinner speeches were being given. Kingston MLA Syl Apps was present at the head table. He was the fellow who performed the task of collecting "Bill" Davis votes in this riding during the election. Apps used to be captain of the Toronto Maple Leafs hockey team, a considerable political asset. In introducing the head table, Dean Ready, dean of the faculty of education, mentioned that it might be appropriate for Apps to announce the score of the hockey game that was being played concurrent with the playing of this political dinner.

Apps complied, in a rather embarrassed fashion. A few minutes later, when William Davis was giving his light and humorous after dinner indoctrination, he mentioned that the head table was in a hurry. One of the reasons, he said, was because Mr. Apps had to be at the annual meeting of the local conservative riding association.

"You might all accompany Syl," he recommended, "for you might be exposed to some of the truths of the times. In addition, you might hear the third period hockey score."

Mr. Apps tried, at this point, to hide under his napkin. William Davis did not seem to care. He was Political Man, scoring from all angles, recklessly, on his great ride into the minds and physique of the body politic.

On, William Davis, on. On to greater voids of human existence.

letters

Dear Editors:

In a recent edition of the Queen's Journal, I found myself referred to as a "Heffalumper". This appellation came in the text of a vitriolic reply to a letter concerning the Heffalump Craft Shop. I was identified as one of three "Heffalumpers" at an AMS Outer Council meeting.

I was rather confused by the Journal calling me a Heffalumper, for several reasons. First, nowhere can I find find any reference to a "Heffalumper", and therefore I do not know what one is. A. A. Milne refers to a character, one Heffalump, in his Winnie-the-Pooh stories, but never refers to a "Heffalumper".

Second if calling me a "Heffalumper" was intended to imply that I was a supporter of the Heffalump Craft Shop, I do not know where the Journal got that idea. At the meeting in question, I made no comment whatsoever either for or against the Heffalump Craft Shop. I must assume that the appellation was a product of the fertile imagination of some part of the Journal editorial staff.

Third, if the comment was intended to be a shot-from-the-hip political distinction, then the Journal must stand guilty of shallow analysis and dim perception. Such dubious attributes are certainly not worthy of either the news or editorial sections of a newspaper. Indeed, one would think they were the preserves of dilletante and itinerant columnists, but not at all expected to pop up in the responsible areas of journalism.

If the Journal is intent on making up names to call people, they should perhaps concentrate on accuracy both in definition and assignment of those names.

Dear Editors:

In your last issue you ran an advertisement concerning the L.C.C. International Agency, an apparent magazine distributing company. In the previous issue you ran an advertisement for that firm.

It would seem from your advertisement that I am not the only person who has had problems with this company. Indeed I was surprised that they had the audacity to continue advertising when they had not filled back orders. Or did they just consider students to be less astute than the general public? Perhaps they deal with the general public in the same manner.

I was just about to send them my second letter protesting the delays in filling my subscription, when I at long last received the magazine which I had subscribed: Atlas, a new-digest magazine.

I have the cancelled cheque which I sent with my subscription. It is dated 15 December, 1971. It was cleared through my bank on 6 January, 1972. I received my first issue of Atlas in April . . . coincident with the reappearance of their advertisement in the Journal. Needless to say, I am pleased that you are investigating the situation if for no other reason than the discontinuance of the advertising of this company in your paper. I would suggest that you check also with the appropriate magazine licencing' association.

Yours sincerely
Richard A. Marchand.

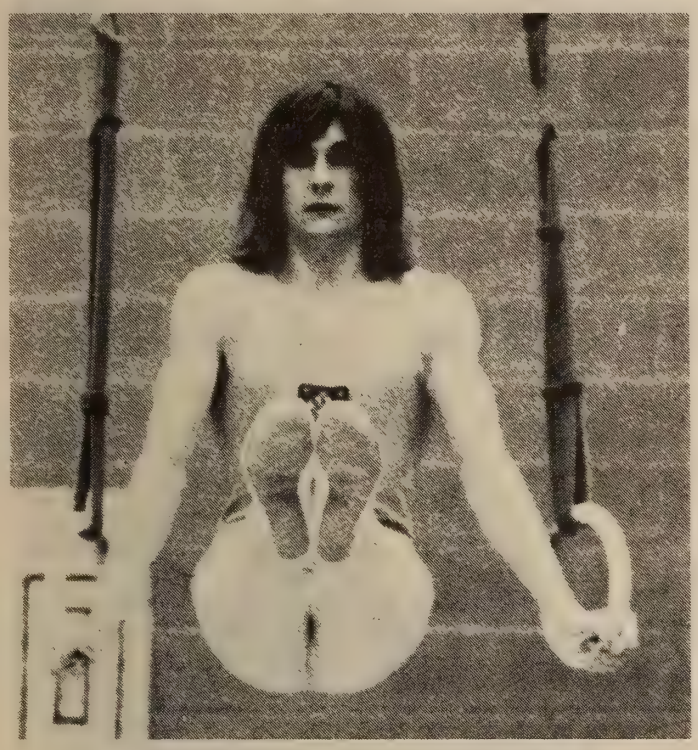
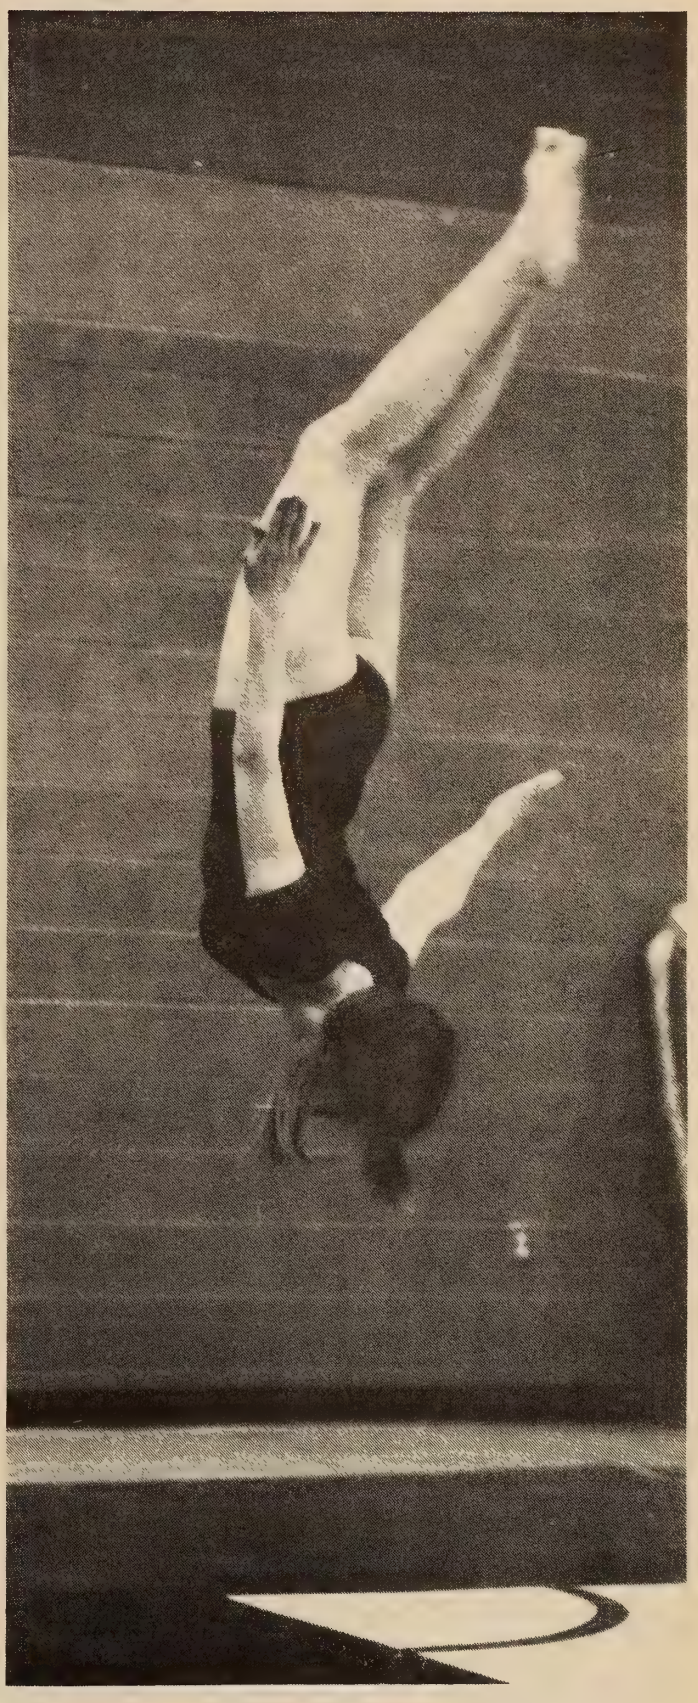
Queen's Hosts Ontario Gymnastics Champions

Gael Gymnasts Strong in Level Competition



The Bartlett Gym was the scene of a gutty performance by Maasaki Naosaki of York University in the men's Senior National gymnastics competition Saturday night. Naosaki, a 23-year-old Japanese native, strained ligaments in his left knee during his side horse routine, but managed to come back to win the parallel bars competition and take second in the high bar event. He had swept the first two events in the five-apparatus competition, with easy wins in the floor exercises and still rings, before the accident struck.

Steve Mitruk of McMaster, himself no stranger to injury, tied for second spot at the senior national level with Bill Mackie of Thunder Bay. Mitruk blamed a bad routine on the parallel bars, normally his best apparatus, for his second-place tie. Naosaki, Mitruk, Mackie, Bruce Medd of Ottawa and Tom Kinsman of York were all named to compete in the Canadian Gymnastics Championships in Calgary, May 19 to 22.



Competitors from Queen's and from the Kingston Gymnastics Club grabbed three Ontario crowns. Drew Strickland, a member of the Queen's gym team and a five-time winner of the EOSSA individual championship while a student at K.C.V.I., won the men's senior level two title despite a month-long layoff. Strickland had four firsts, in side horse, vaulting, floor exercise, and parallel bars. Teammate Jamie Archibald was a strong third in the same level, with two seconds and two thirds. Strickland's performance earned him an invitation from York coach Tom Zivac to try and qualify for the Canadian championships in Calgary.

Vivien Symington, another Queen's gymnast, handily won the women's intermediate crown, despite the fact that she forgot her floor exercise routine mid-way through it. Vivien had high marks in all five apparatus, with two firsts and two seconds.

The third local winner was Steve Monroe, another in a long line of top-flight K.C.V.I. gymnasts. Monroe easily beat out Steve Powell of Guelph to take the Junior level two competition, on the strength of four firsts and a second. Monroe has been working out with the Queen's gym team under the tutelage of Olympic coach Barry Brooker for the last two years.

Canada: Budget helps companies; foreign money policy stated

OTTAWA — Finance minister John Turner tabled his first federal budget Monday night; it included a cut in corporation taxes, lowering the top rate from 49 per cent to 40 per cent for profits from manufacturing and processing in Canada. Other corporation taxes also were cut. About 1.8 million old age pensioners will benefit from pension increases retroactive to January 1. Students will get a new $50 monthly tax deduction. After presenting the budget, Turner said his first priority was incentives for job-producing industries, followed by medium-term economic growth and inflation control. "I didn't have the money, unless I were willing to risk inflation, to solve all the problems," he said. The opposition criticized him for not cutting personal income taxes.

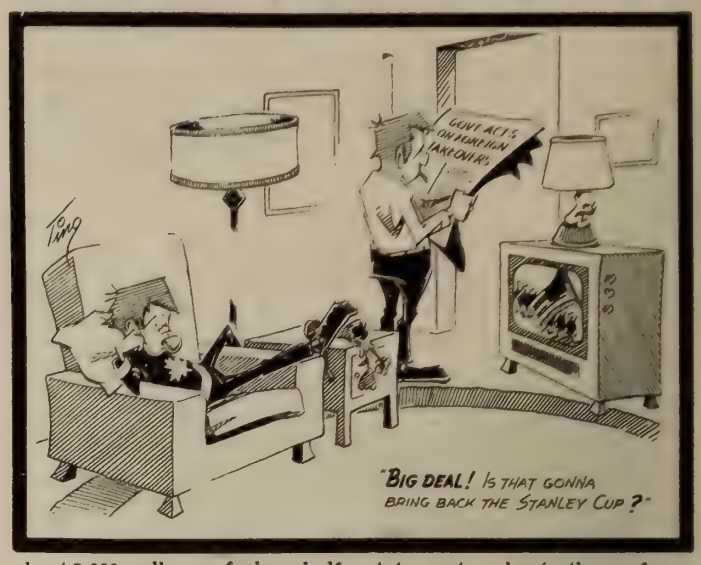
OTTAWA — The long-awaited Gray report on foreign ownership in Canada was tabled last week along with draft legislation providing for cabinet screening of future takeovers of firms worth more than $250,000 and giving the government power to block takeovers offering no significant benefits to Canada. Canadian businessmen expressed surprise that the stand was not stronger, and the Canadian Labor Congress said it was inadequate. American businessmen expressed satisfaction, however. Quebec premier Robert Bourassa said the "relatively restrained" legislation conformed with Quebec's policy of openness to foreign capital.

TORONTO — City and union negotiators Monday found a formula to settle the month-old strike of garbage collectors and other outside workers. More than 100,000 tons of stinking garbage, piled in city parks by homeowners, has created a potential health hazard, and school attendance has fallen as parents kept their children at home. Services may be resumed by the end of this week.

QUEBEC — Three labour leaders were sentenced Monday to one-year jail terms for contempt of court during the recent public service strike. Louis Laberge of the Quebec Federation of Labour, Marcel Pepin of the Confederation of National Trade Unions, and Yvon Charbonneau of the teachers union were convicted of inciting workers to violate back-to-work injunctions.

KINGSTON — A brief sit-down strike Monday at Collins Bay Penitentiary was settled when prison officials agreed with the inmates' committee on a new policy for cell searches.

TORONTO — An executive committee of the New Democratic Party has recommended that the Waffle group of the NDP, its most radical and outspoken wing, be dissolved as soon as possible because it is a threat to the party as a whole.



OTTAWA — Therapeutic abortions in Canadian hospitals tripled from 11,152 in 1970 to 30,949 in 1971; the rate of abortions per hundred live births was up from 3.0 to 8.3. The rate is 11 in England, 131.3 in New York City, and 25.7 in California.

KINGSTON — RCMP and college officials searched the rooms of twelve Royal Military College cadets Friday and seized "substances" which may be illegal drugs.

KINGSTON — The Frontenac County Board of Education has approved a sex education textbook "for young people with limited to average reading abilities" written by two local specialists.

OTTAWA — The Local Initiatives Programme has been extended from May 31 to September 30 and given an additional $30 million federal frant.

TORONTO — More than 100,000 people joined in Miles for Millions walks across Canada Saturday, raising an estimated $1.25 million for 19 emergency relief and development agencies. In Kingston the march attracted about 5,000 walkers, of whom half finished the 22.5-mile course.

YELLOWKNIFE — A lawyer representing the Indian Brotherhood of the Northwest Territories says the federal government's planned Arctic highway is a hasty move to placate the oil industry, and may violate treaty rights. Other northern leaders praised the plan, however.

TORONTO — Relations between Jews and the United Church of Canada are poor, the church said in a statement Friday, but it did not disclaim the editorial policies of The United Church Observer, which has been called anti-Semitic for its repeated statements about the refugee problem in the middle east.

TORONTO — The first acquisition of the new Canada Development Corporation will be the Connaught Medical Research Laboratories, owned by the University of Toronto. Connaught is the major producer of insulin and has drug sales of $11 million per year.

OTTAWA — The government is working on a summer plan, complementing Opportunities for Youth, to help youth from underprivileged backgrounds who are not reached by OFY, secretary of state Gerard Pelletier said.

The World: US blockades North as ground offensive continues

SAIGON — The biggest United States air and naval force ever assembled in Viet Nam began mining the entrances of Haiphong and other North Vietnamese ports Tuesday after U.S. president Richard Nixon announced Monday night that a blockade of North Viet Nam was beginning. More than 60 U.S. ships, including five aircraft carriers, were assembled off the coast to block off ports, prevent the delivery of war material through territorial water, and help cut unland communications.

The air force stepped up heavy bombing of railways and highways in the North, including the Hanoi area itself. Air strikes against the North doubled in the past week to an average of 200 strikes per day by Tuesday. The Seventh Air Force had shot down 19 Northern MiG jet by Monday night.

These countermeasures, and a proposal to land U.S. Marines in Viet Nam, came after the Northern ground offensive continued and the Communists captured the far northern cities of Hue and Quang Tri. The Third Division of the South Vietnamese army collapsed before the Northerners and ran wild, looting Hue before it was taken. Kontum in the central highlands also was taken by the Communists.

WASHINGTON — Senator George McGovern with 267½ delegates has the lead for the Democratic presidential nomination; Senator Hubert Humphrey is second with 197, and Governor George Wallace has 173. A successful nominee will need 1509 delegates. President Richard Nixon was the only Republican candidate with delegates pledged so far, as the Republicans agreed to move their August convention from San Diego to Miami Beach, Florida, where Democrats will meet earlier in the summer.

WASHINGTON — Following the death of J. Edgar Hoover after 48 years as director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, L. Patrick Gray III has been appointed acting director.

Fee raise is official -- approved by trustees Saturday

A $100 increase in undergraduate tuition fees was approved Saturday by a meeting of the Queen's board of trustees. It will go into effect in September, raising most undergraduate fees to $600 for the year (applied science and medicine generally to $725).

The increase, rumoured for some time, was confirmed Tuesday by vice-principal (finance) David Bonham. It is the result of an Ontario government decision, announced in the March budget, to decrease per-student government grants to universities by $100.

Bonham said the trustees had made no long-term decision about graduate student fees, which under the government decision should go from $242.50 for each of two semesters, with the third semester free, to $292.50 for each of the three.

Queen's will charge $292.50 for each of the first two terms, Bonham said. but will keep the third term free at least until May 1, 1973, which is when the government plans to stop subsidizing it.

Bonham said he could not predict what decision would be taken about third-term grad fees after that date.

FIRE COST AND CAUSE UNKNOWN

Damage has not yet been calculated in a fire which levelled a Queen's storage warehouse Friday afternoon.

The "old Chown warehouse" at 115 Barrack Street caught fire in mid-afternoon and flames spread rapidly through the old wooden building, which Queen's bought in 1968 when the Chown Hardware supplies, according to maintenance supervisor C. G. Provan.

Firemen play water on Friday's blaze. "I guess every department in the university had something in that warehouse," a spokesman said later. Pic by Peter Boag.

Company closed. Cause of the fire has not been determined, but some onlookers said children had been playing with firecrackers nearby earlier Friday.

It burned spectacularly for about two hours. Trucks and firemen from three Kingston fire stations were augmented with equipment and men from Kingston Township and Canadian Forces Base Kingston before the afternoon was over. Attention was concentrated on saving nearby houses, for gusty winds spread the flames rapidly and carried burning debris for blocks in the downtown area.

Some houses on Rideau Street sustained some damage. The warehouse wing of the Queen's installation was a total loss.

The duplicating centre, stationery stores, and more storage areas were separated from the warehouse by a fire wall and suffered only slight damage from smoke and water. Both were back in operation Tuesday.

Insurance adjusters will take three to four weeks to determine in detail what was lost and what its value was, according to Ken Bickerstaffe, manager of administrative services for Queen's. Water and smoke damage will be especially hard to assess, he said.

The major loss in the warehouse area was stored furniture and carpenters' He said the stored supplies included large quantities of roof, floor and ceiling tiles for building repairs; glass for windows; metal room partitions; about 2000 square feet of blackboard slate; and "about thirty doors of different sizes".

The oak furniture from the old gymnasium board room was also lost, Provan said.

Other furniture being stored by the purchasing department was destroyed, Provan said, as were old flats and decorations from past Science Formals, a number of motors and generator sets, a decompression chamber bought from the Air Force and owned by the faculty of medicine, and a dismantled elevator which was in Dunning Hall.

The receiving and loading dock of the warehouse was included in the destroyed area, he said, and a quantity of paper and other supplies from stationery stores were destroyed there.

A spokesman for the registrar's office said a large quantity of envelopes and other paper supplies was lost, along with some "dead storage" of various kinds, and some old computer cards which were an unimportant part of the records. He said absolutely no marks, examinations or student records had been damaged or destroyed.

University staff, insurance adjustors, and staff from the Ontario Fire Marshal's office are continuing to investigate the fire.

FINANCIAL REPORT SAVES HEFFALUMP

The heffalump boutique will be open as usual today and for a while to come.

The AMS Inner Council last night decided to continue the operation of the store after being presented with the first comprehensive financial statement for the shop.

The statement, prepared on short notice by MBA student Terry Macaulay, showed assets at $11,113 and a total debt of $4,029. (The AMS has invested a total of $11,500 in the store to date.)

Sales, which have been picking up over the last few months, were $17,732 for the last ten and a half months. Operating expenses totalled $20,430, of which $10,271 was spent on acquisition of stock.

A good part of the meeting was taken by Macaulay explaining his financial statement and answering questions from AMS President Greg Leblanc and members of the gallery. Macaulay said the financial position of the store was much better than he had expected.

He suggested that improvements could be made in the management of and in advertising for the store, but thought it would be unprofitable to close the store. (At a loss of about $5,000 to the AMS.)

Leblanc and his Vice-President, Wally Palmer were against keeping the store running before the meeting started and continued this attitude. Other members of Inner Council seemed to be more open minded. The gallery was mostly pro Heffalump, especially after examining the financial data.

Leblanc and Palmer attempted to steer the discussion towards the question of whether the AMS should be in commercial business at all. They based some of their opposition to keeping the Heffalump open on their opinion that AMS should not be in the commercial business. Others did not seem interested in this discussion, but rather in the specific case of Heffalump. Inner Council agreed to keep the store, but will make changes in the management structure during the next few weeks.

OFY GRANTS DOWN; 61 H

Opportunities for Youth grants from the federal government are providing jobs in Kingston for 61 Queen's students this summer.

A reduction of almost fifty percent in Frontenac County's job quota meant many disappointed OFY applicants, but 16 projects were approved for this county, ten of them involving Queen's people.

One of the ten involves a summer extension of the birth control and abortion referral centre which operates at 165 University Avenue. One centre worker, Mary Ellen Marus, told The Journal that the summer grant would pay for work with high school students and other Kingston residents and for films, speakers and discussions throughout the summer.

Workers from the centre, Miss Marus said, will "hang out at drop-in centres and church groups, where kids congregate -- a lot of the community work won't be done from 165 University."

In addition to showing a series of sex education films, Miss Marus said, workers from the centre will investigate sex education in Frontenac County schools and try to find what is needed. A report will be given to the county board of education when the survey is completed, she said.

Another aspect of the centre's work involves "building up a library of information about human sexuality," Miss Marus said. There will also be an attempt to organize a convention of workers from similar centres at universities across Ontario, she said.

She added that the referral centre at 165 University will be open from noon to 10 p.m. six days a week all summer.

The birth control centre's OFY application asked for ten staff members, but only five were granted, Miss Marus said, and the money allotted for expenses was a total of $300. She said this was inadequate and added that the centre would look for other sources of money. The five students who did get jobs would only be paid $60 to $65 per week, she added.

Drastic cuts in grants characterized OFY projects this summer. Another Queen's project titled Family Centre, is considering turning down its grant entirely because it was so extensively reduced, organizer Nancy Hoey told The Journal on Tuesday.

"We don't know if we can make a feasible go of it," she said, pointing out that the requested $1300 in operating expenses had been cut to $400. "It's sort of a drop-in instructional programme up in north Kingston," she said of the project, pointing out that it involved assistance with cooking, sewing, crafts and so on. Family Centre, if the project is carried out, will provide four full-time and six half-time jobs. Miss Hoey said.

Low salaries as well as low operating grants are a problem with the OFY-programme, according to David Wroe, director of the career planning and placement office at Queen's, whose staff coordinated many OFY applications from Queen's.

Students with technical training are unlikely to settle for OFY jobs with salaries of $75 per week or less, Wroe said, so that projects are generally limited to what "people without easily saleable skills" can do. "This cuts out a lot of your better pollution and environmental control programmes, and even some of your social work programmes." he commented.

"I would have liked to see it kept less structured so that more different types of programmes could have been approved," Wroe said, and he criticized the policy under which Canada was divided into slices and an OFY grant quota set for each small area. "The strict adherence to numbers", under which projects were generally expected to involve eight to ten jobs, also worked against creativity, Wroe suggested.

"The other item which has caused a lot of criticism has been the lateness of the responses," he said, pointing out that some students still have not been informed of the apparent rejection of their proposals. "We had great difficulty in getting the OFY people to Kingston -- we had to create our own coordinator, in the person of John Harvey, a member of my staff."

But Wroe said, "As far as OFY itself is concerned, I still feel strongly that it's a good move -- a useful experience for a lot of people."

Adventure play

By Bob Be

For the second year in a row, number of Queen's students hav received an Opportunities for Youth grant to run a different kind o playground for Kingston childre aged 8 to 12. This year the project again called Adventur Playgrounds, is being headed b Gord McDiarmid, a third-yea commerce student and director-t be of the Student Volunteer Bureau.

Of the eight proposals submitte to the federal government under th auspices of the SVB this year, Ad venture Playgrounds was the onl one accepted. Last year, by con trast, the SVB was able to provid jobs for 73 students in eigh programmes, with a total grant $75,000.

This year McDiarmid' playgrounds were only allowed staff of nine (they had originall requested twelve) and of the $16,0 they had asked for, only a little ove $9,000 was granted. That means th salaries paid to staff members wi be $70 per week. Earlier in the yea the government had indicated that would pay $90 a week to OFY sta fers, McDiarmid said.

Salaries and budgets for OF projects are left to the discretion the regional supervisors appointe by Ottawa, McDiarmid said, a apparently the lower salaries a the result of stretching the mon allotted to the Kingston area over wide an area as possible.

Adventure Playgrounds diff from the usual, garden-varie organized playground. The kids the two proposed playground site operating from late May until la August, will be given hammer

Job Bank

Job Bank, on the corner of Union and University Avenues, has placed students in 121 jobs since they opened this spring. Only about 10 per cent of these were permanent, full time jobs. However, there are many day to day jobs, including several baby-sitting and clean-up jobs.

Gary Gannage, of Job Bank, expressed the opinion that, while jobs are hard to find, they are available and "the name of the game is initiative". Job Bank people spend each morning walking around town just looking for jobs for students. People have generally been very receptive to them. It is too soon to assess the effectiveness of the various Job Bank advertisements on TV and radio, but it is expected that these will help to find jobs for some of the 550 students now registered at Job Bank who have not yet been placed in jobs.

Tax petitioners to meet province

Organizers of Kingston's tax-exempt property petition will deliver more than twelve thousand signatures to Ontario treasurer Darcy McKeough when they meet him next week to ask that the government pay taxes on the tax-exempt property, including Queen's, which makes up more than a third of all Kingston's assessment.

Mrs. Irene Mooney, one organizer of the petition, said her group was to meet McKeough May 25, and expressed gratification at the number of signatures that had been collected.

Much of the tax-exempt property in Kingston is the Queen's campus, and Mrs. Mooney said Queen's is a special sore point with city homeowners. "The only ones that benefit from Queen's is the downtown merchants, or the ones that rent, or something like that," she said.

"Taxpayers in Kingston are overburdened -- they can't pay any more. They have paid and paid and paid. People are having to sell their homes!"

She said university people as well as other residents had supported the petition: "Dr. Deutsch and a lot of the Queen's students feel the same way as we do -- that they should pay their way -- and there's a lot that feel the other way."

She pointed out that the campus amounts to 12.9 per cent of Kingston's full property assessment. (If Queen's paid property taxes, rather than the present token grant, it would mean more than two million dollars a year to the city.)

"What's Queen's done for Kingston?" Mrs. Mooney asked. "Nothing, as far as taxes are concerned. We're not talking about anything else." But she said most Kingstonians get no benefit of any kind from the university. "It's there, we know it's there, but that's as far as it goes."

She continued, "Thirty years ago Queen's wasn't so big -- it didn't bother people. In the last ten years they've just been taking and taking, expanding and expanding. If they can afford to build that $8 million McArthur College they can afford to do something about taxes."

Mrs. Mooney said she realized that money for property taxes would have to come from the Ontario government, not from the university, just as did the funds for McArthur Hall. "We're not blaming Queen's, we're blaming the government."

She summarized the complaint of Kingstonians about their taxes: "Dr. Deutsch feels the same way -- that it's just an added burden on these people."

Libraries guard against censorship

"Revolution is the only positive stance" to fight censorship, an NDP politician-turned-academic told delegates to the Ontario Library Association convention here Friday.

Walter Pitman, former NDP politician and soon to be dean of Trent University, told the OLA that librarians have an obligation to be sure that all possible topics are covered by the books in all libraries.

"Librarians must always be on guard against censorship," Pitman said, and "to give in is forsaking the profession."

Librarians are in the forefront of dealing with threats of censorship, he said, because they must decide what books are available to the public. He added that a balance of opinion can be reached only by learning the opinions of all fringe elements.

There will always be claims that books in public libraries should reflect the general attitude of the community, Pitman said, but he urged librarians to resist attempts to restrict what books libraries may have.

The real obscenity is not in pornographic books, Pitman said, but the "obscenity of reality" such as the violence of the Viet Nam war.

Delegates to the OLA convention also heard George Kerr, minister of colleges and universities for Ontario, whose department has responsibility for libraries as well. Kerr told them he would press for more money for libraries in the 1973 provincial budget.

Grads meet here about fee increase

Graduate students from across Ontario will visit Queen's this weekend for the 1972 regional convention of the Canadian Union of Graduate Students. Priority item on the agenda will be the financial changes announced in the recent Ontario budget, and since that time, as they affect grad students, according to Queen's grad president Doug Pritchard.

He said George Kerr, provincial minister of colleges and universities, had been invited, but it was not known whether he would attend the meeting.

Most sessions of the CUGS convention, which runs from Friday afternoon until Sunday afternoon, will be held at Grad House on King Street.

backpage

There's no room for backpage this issue -- a shame, because it was an interesting week. The big news was the shooting of Albama Governor George Wallace on Monday as he campaigned in the Maryland primary election. At press time he was in intensive care but expected to recover swiftyly; paralysis was still a possibility. In Canada the headlines were labour chaos in Quebec, as unions protested the jailing last week of their three top leaders on charges of inciting workers to violate back-to-work injunctions. Media were particular targets of this week's increasing agitation.

Four RMC cadets were fined for possession of marijuana; they were dealt with by the RMC commandant in summary military proceedings. A group of Universite de Montreal law graduates filed suit against Steinberg's, the big supermarket, for selling them a can of beans with an English-only label, in violation of Quebec law. The New York state legislature tried to repeal its liberal abortion law and limit abortions to cases where the life of the mother is in danger, but governor Nelson Rockefeller vetoed it. And, of course, the Viet Nam war went on hotly; the United States said Monday it had put mines in North Vietnamese rivers as well as coastal waters, in a continued attempt to paralyse communications in the North.

One other important item: Garner Ted Armstrong was relieved of his duties as speaker on the radio programme The World Tomorrow and vice-president of The Worldwide Church of God because he was "in the bonds of Satan", according to Church president Herbert W. Armstrong, his father. Garner Ted's specific offence was not specified, but reports said it was either marital infidelity or too-liberal theology.

Those are the headlines. Go read The Globe and Mail for a change, if you usually rely on Backpage (does anybody read it at all?). Incidentally, this issue is so thin because (1) we lack staff -- volunteers are welcome, no experience necessary; and (2) advertisers are sceptical of the Queen's summer market. Make sure to tell local businessmen that you're a Queen's student and that you read The Journal.

by Alan Broadbent

One of the replies to people who are fervent environmentalists, who claim that man must clean up the planet and protect various animal species from extinction, is to remind them that man is just another animal, and that as a species he will probably succumb to extinction at some point in time.

It is rather galling to some men to have it pointed out that man is not at all a necessary ingredient for the survival of planet Earth. In fact, they think that dating history from the first appearance of man is quite logical. When they talk about a nuclear holocaust, they refer to the end of the world.

This shows a terrible conceit on the part of man. It shows the extent to which he has chosen to separate himself from his environment, and the resulting disrespect for the dignity of other things that exist with us here on planet Earth.

These cosmic thoughts were articulated to me the other day by the head of a family of squirrels who share my house. The family moved in about a month or so ago, but I really never became acquainted with them until just recently. I was aware that they had taken up residence, for I could hear them scurrying about various parts of the house, but I first laid eyes on them just last week.

I chanced upon a family meeting of some of the young ones and the parents. Being one of us conceited homo sapiens, I just barged right into my closet, looking for a pair of pants that had been designated for summer wear. The squirrel family noted the intrusion into their private council with great agitation, and finally abandoned their discussion apparently very irritated.

I, of course, was enraged by the audacity of the family. After all, where in hell did they get the idea they could meet in my closet, in my house, and in my world. I sat down and began to contemplate strategies, based primarily on genocide, for the elimination of these squatters. To aid my mental processes, I turned on the television.

In the midst of my thoughts, one of my cats came into the room. I noted his presence, thinking that here was an approved domestic animal who knew his place. To my surprise, however, he initiated a conversation. (I was surprised, for he had never done this before, always waiting to respond subserviently to my comments.)

"So, you saw the squirrel family" he said.

Swallowing my indignance at his presumptuousness, I said, "Yes. Who in the world do they think they are, moving in like that and holding meetings in my closet."

"Why wouldn't they?" he said. "They have as much right to meet as anyone else."

"But all of you animals are inferior to us humans. After all we have been given sophisticated powers of reason, and therefore we have a right to dictate terms to the rest of the inhabitants of the world," I told him.

"Now that is a typical human attitude," the cat said in disgust. "You humans think you have all the answers, but let me tell you how mistaken you are. I have been sitting here for quite a few years watching you, and I think you are insane. You have failed to grasp the meaning of life. You waste your time in a mad variety of foolish activities, never pausing for a moment to see the folly of your ways."

"For example," he continued, "just the other day I caught you and the other fellow who lives here out on the front lawn throwing and chasing a plastic disc around. Or you sit at a desk and stare at pieces of paper for a long time, or you sit here and watch blue lights come out of a little box for hours. You must be crazy. There are only two important things in life; eating and sleeping. We cats know that, but you humans just can't grasp the fact."

I pondered this, knowing that cats did just eat and sleep, but somehow feeling a sense of outrage in being lectured by a cat that I was superior to. I wanted to respond that the fact of the sophisticated human brain forced humans to do more than just eat and sleep, but the cat had fallen asleep.

Just then, the head of the squirrel family came into the room. He strode confidently, and picked up the thread of the conversation the cat had left dangling.

"You see," he said, "there is in the making a great revolution of the non-human animals of the world. We are now in the guerrilla warfare stage of the struggle, a stage in which we are subtley infiltrating the habitats of humans and engaging in swift skirmishes."

"For example," he said, "just the other day you will recall a friend of yours telling you about the squirrel who entered her house and bit her on the hand. That is a guerrilla action. We have moved into this house, and in due time will take it over, making it the headquarters for the struggle in Canada. You know that we have gnawed a hole in the bathroom wall. We will continue with this tactic, knowing that very soon we will offend your bourgeois sense of property, and that you will be forced to leave to avoid the social disapproval of your friends."

Astounded by this revelation, I asked him who his allies were.

"Everything non-human has banded together for the revolution, including the waters of the earth, trees, and our most steadfast allies, rocks and stones."

He went on to describe how stones have being lying dormant for centuries, saving their energies for the proper chance to revenge that most dastardly of indignities, the building of the pyramids. As he talked, I was moved to a feeling of respect for the non-human world. In fact, I paid my admission dues to his group, and now have the privilege of attending the weekly meetings of the squirrel cell in my closet. I can be found there each Tuesday night, doubled up beneath my winter clothes, plotting for the over-throw of the human race.

Over 1500 degrees, diplomas this weekend

Queen's convocations this weekend will see degrees and diplomas awarded to 1558 students in all faculties and schools except arts and science, physical and health education, and nursing.

Artsci and phys ed convocations are next week. Because of a switch two years ago in the length of the Bachelor of Nursing Science programme, there will probably be no B.N.Sc. candidates in 1972; none were included in the degree list provided Tuesday by the registrar's office. If any are to be awarded to tardy members of last year's class, they will be included in Saturday afternoon's convocation.

Friday afternoon will see Queen's Theological College issue five Bachelor of Theology and six Bachelor of Divinity Degrees, as well as an honorary Doctorate of Divinity to the Rev. J.A. Davidson, who will address the convocation. The faculty of education will give 588 Bachelor of Education degrees during that convocation, and W. Allen Fisher will receive an honorary Ll.D.

Saturday morning the Faculty of Applied Science will award its degrees -- 279 Bachelors of Science -- as will the School of Business -- 57 Masters of Business Administration, -- 110 Bachelors of Commerce (Honours) degrees and one B. Comm. At that convocation, R. D. Lord will receive an honorary Ll.D. and will speak.

The Saturday afternoon convocation involves four faculties, plus nursing if necessary. The Faculty of Law will give 113 Bachelor of Laws degrees and two Masters of Laws.

The School of Rehabilitation Therapy will give 20 Diplomas and one Bachelor of Science in Occupational Therapy, as well as nineteen Diplomas and one Bachelor of Science in Physical Therapy.

The Faculty of Medicine will give 59 graduates the degree of Doctor of Medicine.

The School of Graduate Studies will issue 82 Doctorates of Philosophy (Ph.D.), 87 Masters of Arts, 50 Masters of Science, 53 Masters of Science in Engineering, 7 Diplomas in Medical Radiology, and eleven Diplomas in Clinical Psychology.

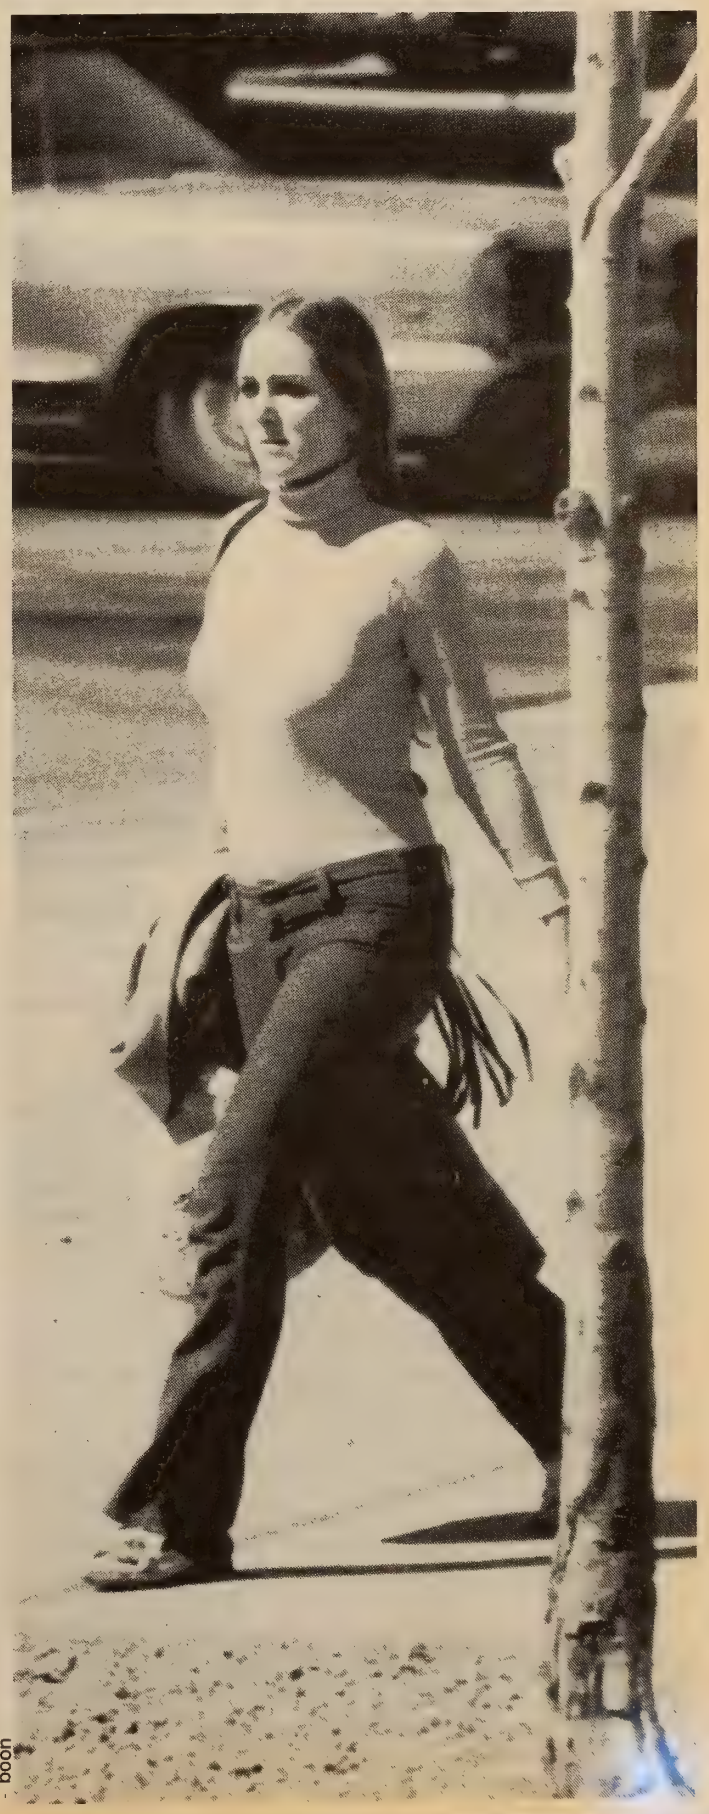
The first seven Queen's graduates to earn the degree of Master of Public Administration will also receive them at that time.

Three honorary Ll.D.'s will be given: to Tommy C. Douglas, John Wendell Macleod, and W. G. C. Howland. Douglas will speak.

At all three convocations a number of academic awards will be presented. In addition, there will be four Tricolor Awards: to Tim Garrard in grad studies and to Victor Bradley, Graham Taylor and Jon Tondeur in applied science.

The Tricolor Award is Queen's highest nonacademic, nonathletic award, given for service to the university.

Convocations are all being held in the Jock Harty Arena this year, a tradition begun last year after fire marshal's rules made Grant Hall, already cosy, far too small for the crowds which attend convocations. The number of sessions has been reduced this year, however, from eight to five.



The ceremony will follow the traditional pattern, with the academic procession led into the arena (from the gymnasium, where it will assemble) by kilted pipers. The convocation hymn, "O God Our Help In Ages Past", will be sung, and principal Dr. John J. Deutsch will speak, as will one of the honorary degree recipients.

Graduands will go to the stage (in pairs, except in the case of those receiving doctorates and perhaps a few other degrees) to be laureated by chancellor Dr. John B. Stirling and hooded by a senior member of faculty. Stirling will occupy the centre chair on the stage, flanked by Deutsch and rector Alan Broadbent (the student representative to the university's senior governing body, the board of trustees).

(The carved chairs narrowly escaped damage in the fire which destroyed much of a Queen's storage warehouse two weeks ago; they were in a part of the building which was not affected.)

This will be the twelfth year in which Stirling has presided at spring convocations; there have also been special ones, for the installations of two principals, Dr. J. Alex Corry in 1965 and Deutsch in 1968.

He is scheduled to retire June 30. However, The Journal has learned that when the university council, the body responsible for naming a successor, meets on June 2, its executive will report that it has no nomination to propose, and the council is expected to agree that Stirling should continue for the time being, at least until next year.

Faculty unionism still far distant

Faculty members at Queen's are a long way from forming a union, says the president of the faculty association, despite a decision Saturday by the Canadian Association of University Teachers to consider union affiliation.

The CAUT, meeting in Winnipeg, voted to conduct "a study of a certain kind of affiliation of the CAUT to the Canadian Labor Congress". But law professor R. W. Mackenzie, who represented Queen's at that meeting after being chosen faculty association president two weeks ago, said the step was only a very tentative one: "It's pretty harmless to undertake a study. You start with trying to understand what the ramifications would be."

And, Mackenzie said, "There was no discussion of the desirability of affiliation," only of studying the possibility.

Commenting on the idea of faculty unionism, Mackenzie said, "The idea of trade unionism is not an easy one for academics to accept."

But, he said, "In times of contracting university budgets, I think it generally can be said that faculties are interested in maintaining their income position relative to other groups in society that have about the same skills and qualifications."

"When the situation deteriorates, you have to consider alternatives that in better times you wouldn't consider."

Mackenzie said the report on collective bargaining for university faculty, written early this year by Queen's law professors Bernard Adell and Donald Carter, summarized the situation well. (That report listed the factors Mackenzie mentioned, and others, and included an observation that students might be the big losers if administration and faculty found themselves in adversary bargaining.)

"Collective bargaining is likely to get faculty into more advisory positions with university administrations simply because it is bargaining," Mackenzie said. "For the most part we've avoided that. In fact, academics have sought to become more involved in university administration."

Bargaining might be most effectively used in dealings at a province-wide level, he suggested. (Adell and Carter made the same observation.)

Mackenzie acknowledged that the Ontario Council of University Faculty Associations had talked at its recent meeting about the possibility of a faculty strike to protest the Wright Commission report, which many professors have opposed.

"It comes to me second or third-hand," he said, "but somebody asked the president of OCUFA whether any consideration had been given to a general withdrawal of services, and he said yes, it had been thought about generally, that's all."

Mackenzie added, "We're a long ways from taking any strike action. It's just one of the possibilities that had been thought of."

Adams trying to revive CUSS at U of Windsor conference

Peter Adams, former Queen's Student Senator, and now a first-year law student at University of Windsor, is spearheading a campaign to organize a national university student body to replace the Canadian Union of Students (CUS) which dissolved four years ago.

Invitations have been sent to all 64 student member institutions of the Association of Universities and Colleges in Canada to attend a three-day conference May 26-28 at the University of Windsor. Over two-thirds of the schools have replied to date and will be sending representatives.

Adams said he hoped the conference would result in the formation of a national body to represent Canada's 400,000 university students on both provincial and federal levels.

He said the two main reasons for calling the conference are to discuss federal and provincial financing at the university level and to discuss the Pitinus Report.

This is a report commissioned by the federal government on federal financing in post secondary education which will be presented to the council of ministers of education next year.

Adams said the reason he is spearheading this drive for a national student body is because he felt Canadian university students should have an opportunity to respond formally on a federal level and that Canada should have a national policy in post secondary education.

Queen's will be represented by AMS president Greg Leblanc, vice-president Wally Palmer, and External Affairs Commissioner Ken Wong.

Palmer said he doesn't think anything definite will be set-up at this weekend's meeting, but that it may lay the ground work for an association that could be formed at the fall meeting of the AUCC.

Grad students propose strike

Ontario graduate students may strike against universities this September if a satisfactory solution to their financial support and tax problems is not reached by that time.

This action was called for at a meeting of the Ontario Region of the Canadian Union of Graduate Students, held in Kingston this weekend.

They also resolved to:
- demand that a quota be placed on the acceptance of graduate students based on the money available for their support.
- that research assistanceships be considered employment.
- that graduate students form a bargaining unit (union).
- that a petition be circulated demanding that graduate school tuition be lowered to the previous figure of $485 per year.
- and, that the amount of money now provided by the province for fellowships be increased from $3 million per year to $11.5 million.

Graduate students from eight Ontario Universities took part in the conference.

Diplomas recalled

Queen's has broken into the big time with Ford, GM and Chrysler. After last year's convocations, a number of degrees had to be recalled. The reason -- not inferior products, inferior diplomas.

A number of diploma blanks were printed with the wrong signature of the dean for the Faculty of School involed. Letters were sent to the holders of the defective diplomas offering to trade them in for good ones. No one knows how many were affected.

Two OFY projects bring drama to Kingston

Queen's students are taking part this summer in two Opportunities for Youth projects involving drama in the city of Kingston; but their direction is completely different.

One group, titled Kingston Community Theatre and headed by Owen Moulton, one leader of the Queen's Drama Guild, is basically a performing group. The other, Kingston Playground Theatre for Children, is headed by English student Kathy Gould and is "principally designed to teach drama to children in Kingston."

The six students working with that OFY grant from the federal government will visit Kingston's twenty playgrounds in pairs during July and August, to teach "puppetry, mime, creative drama and drama games", Miss Gould said.

In August, general teaching and performing will change slightly, and the work will be directed "to prepare productions which will be designed by the children themselves," she said.

Those plays will be presented in a summer's-end festival if possible, she added.

Miss Gould said, "We have the full cooperation of the parks and recreation department of the city." And, she said, playground supervisors will help teach the children between visits from the Playground Theatre workers -- most of whom are drama students, Miss Gould said.

"Children really need something like this," she added. "They have so much potential!"

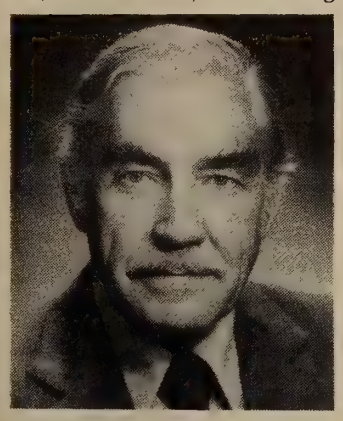
Moulton's project will also try to involve its audiences, he said; those audiences will "concentrate mostly on people in the areas to whom theatre isn't normally accessible -- the blind, the deaf, emotionally retarded children, and people in old folks' homes. We feel that these people should be brought into the community a little bit."

Accordingly, the ten students working on Community Theatre's grant will visit institutions to provide the kind of performance and interaction which seems right.

"We're working in the field of experimental theatre," Moulton said. "Basically, we're trying new techniques, trying to open new areas of theatrical communication."

He continued, "When you're performing for the deaf, you can't use sound." Similar restrictions mean the troupe must experiment, "explore new areas". "It's helping the people, and it's helping us in our areas of study." Most of the ten are drama students, Moulton said, and some were inspired by Drama 330, Experimental Theatre Practice, taught by Gary Wagner.

The troupe has been innovative right from the beginning, Moulton said: "We actually theatrically presented our brief to Ottawa. What we did was a partly verbal, but not plot-oriented, play satirizing the kind of bureaucracy we knew our brief was going to run up against. 'It's unconventional!"



But experimental techniques must be kept in check at times, he said: "When we're dealing with the old folks, it's a mistake to do anything too overtly experimental. With them it's very much participation." By contrast, he continued, retarded children may not be willing to get involved until the troupe has made a number of visits and become friends. "It's a personal thing, more than conventional theatre."

The group will be learning too, he emphasized. "We might find something exciting, and we can follow up that new avenue."

Community Theatre is writing all its own scripts, Moulton said, and McGill-Queen's University Press has expressed tentative interest in considering a group of them, along with a report on the group's experience, for publication in the fall.

Planning school gets head

The university campus planner, Eric W. Thrift, will be acting director of the school of urban and regional planning for 1972-73.

Eric W. Thrift

The present director, Dr. S. D. Lash, is leaving his position June 30, and the committee seeking a successor has not had time "to do justice to their search", a university statement, says. That committee, chaired by academic vice-principal Dr. George Harrower, will continue its search.

The university statement said that during Thrift's year as director of the school, his duties as campus planner will be "appropriately reduced to allow him to make the necessary contribution to the work of the School."

Fees to be uniform: up $100

Ontario's minister of colleges and universities, George Kerr, has instructed all universities to increase their undergraduate fees by exactly $100 for next fall. Previously, the government's policy had been that universities could charge what they liked, but government grants are going down $100 per student in September.

Kerr's action was to avoid a price war, a departmental official said, since smaller universities could be hurt if the larger ones managed to keep their fees from going up by the full amount.

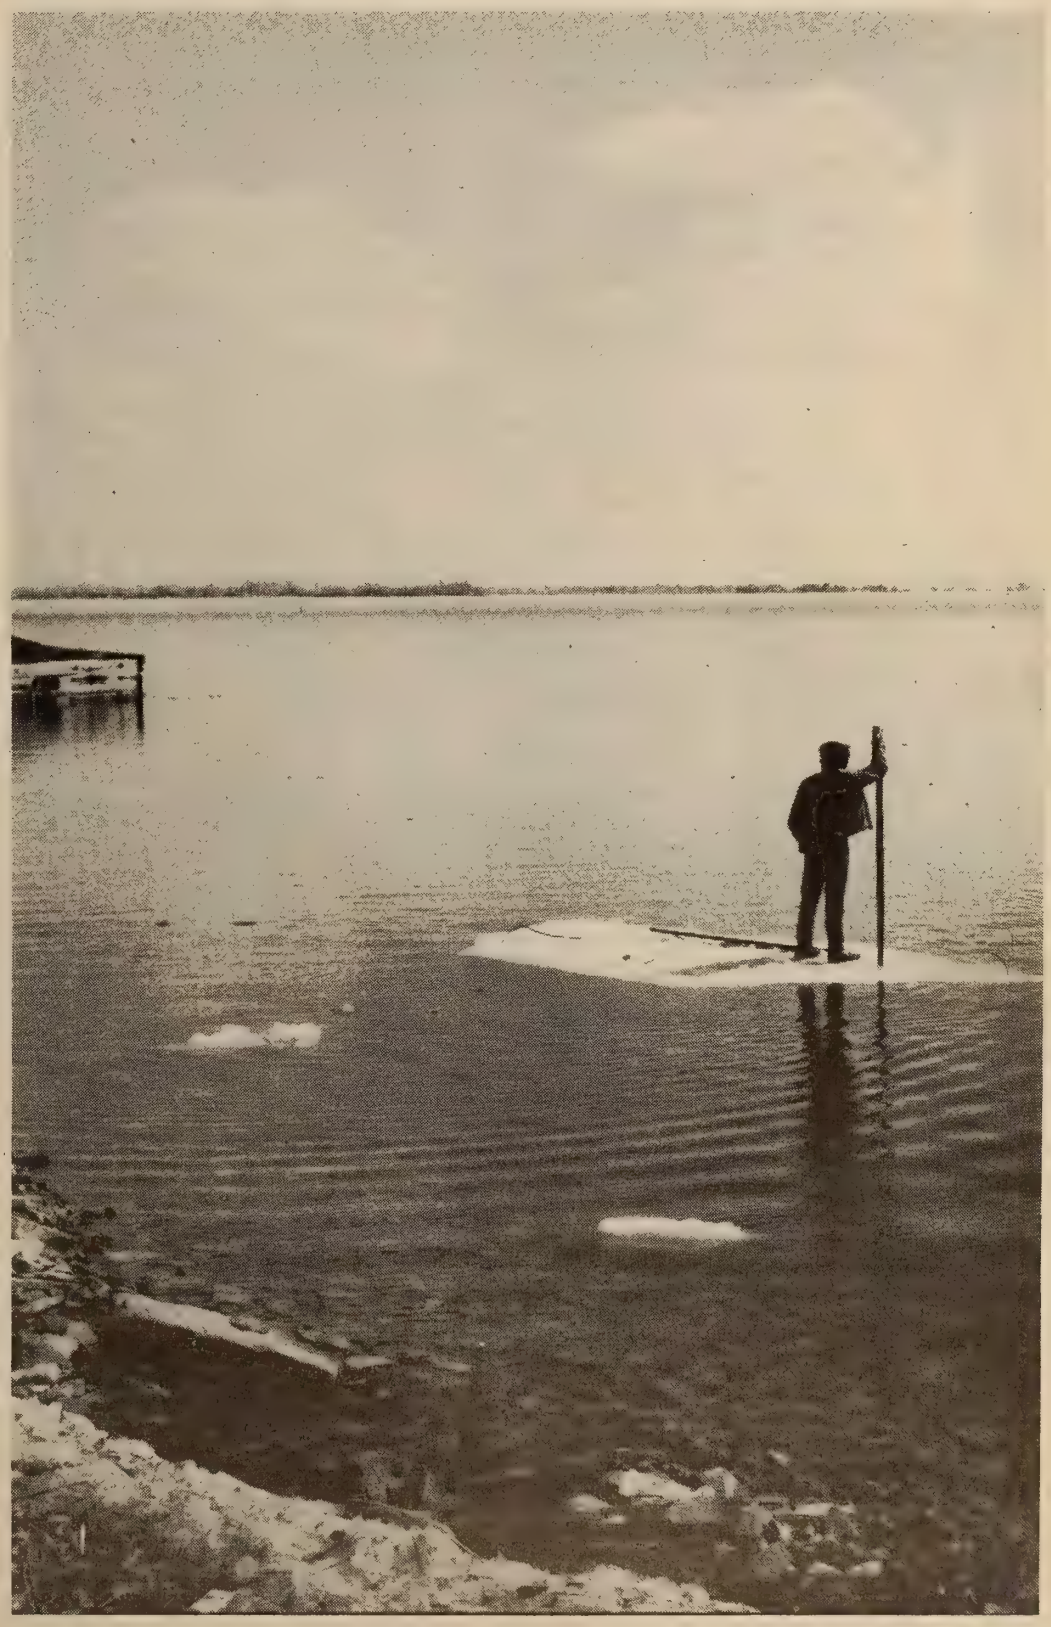
Shortly after the March 28 budget announced the change in government grants, Kerr had said universities were expected to absorb some of the cost themselves.

Universities and students across the province have protested the government's actions. One of the few student governments which has not protested to the government is the Queen's AMS; vice-president Wally Palmer told The Journal this week that "No, we didn't write a token letter." He said the AMS had been conferring with student leaders from Toronto and Ottawa to organize a stronger movement, with suggested alternatives, through the fledgling Ontario Federation of Students.

Fire chief sets damage figure

Loss from the May 12 fire which destroyed a Queen's warehouse in downtown Kingston were set at $125,000 last week by Kingston fire chief Warren Gibson. He said the building was valued at $75,000 and its contents at $50,000.

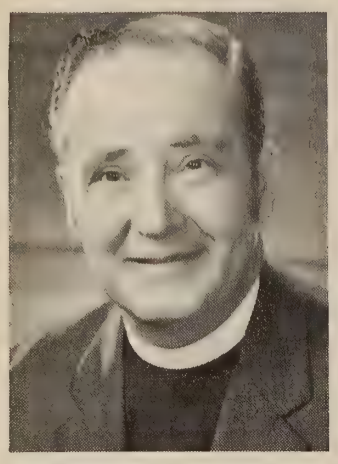
Fire marshal's investigators still have not decided what caused the fire.



A memo from the assistant to the secretary of the university, circulated Tuesday, asked departments to let him know what they had stored in the warehouse, to make sure that everything is accounted for.

Marks due within a week

All marks from winter courses will be mailed by the end of this month, the assistant registrar said Tuesday.



D. Lloyd Davies told The Journal that "Once the faculties release the marks to us, they go out the same day." Some marks for graduating students had just arrived, he said.

Marks for all students should be in and out of the registrar's office within "a week or ten days", Davies repeated.

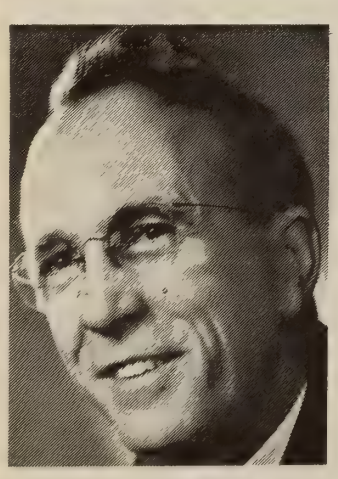
REV. J. A. DAVIDSON: Educated at the University of Saskatchewan, B.A., and St. Andrew's College, Saskatoon, Diploma and B.D. He was ordained to the ministry by the Saskatchewan Conference of the United Church of Canada in 1949 and served at Weseton, Saskatchewan for two years before becoming a regular chaplain in the Canadian Army (1952-61). He was Chaplain to the Royal Military College of Canada, 1960-61, and Minister of Sydenham Street United Church, Kingston, from 1961 to 1971. He has been Minister of the Dominion-Chalmers United Church, Ottawa since August, 1971

Mr. Davidson has contributed many articles to newspapers and magazines and is the author of a weekly column "Perspectives and Prejudices" which appears in several Canadian newspapers. He is the author of two books.

W. ALLEN FISHER: Educated at Queen's (B.A. 1930), attended the Ontario College of Education and returned to Queen's to undertake graduate work in English and History. At the Prescott secondary school he began his involvement in music with the formation of a regional orchestra composed of students, former students and others from the community.

Through his personal efforts, instrumental music was granted recognition as a school subject and Mr. Fisher was made head of the Department of Music at Barrie Collegiate Institute. For many years the Barrie Collegiate Band has been recognized as one of the outstanding bands in North America.



Through Mr. Fisher's personal interest and effort instrumental music became accepted throughout the secondary schools of Ontario as a subject on the curriculum.

RONALD D. LORD: A graduate in Metallurgical Engineering from Queen's (1938) and since 1965 has been a member of the University's Advisory Council on Engineering and has served as its chairman (1970-1971). He is presently Vice-President, Research and Development. Mining, for Rio Algom Mines.

Mr. Lord has served as Director and on committees of the Mining Association of Canada, and as Director and President (1968-69) of the Ontario Mining Association. He is a member of the council and of the executive committee of the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy and has served on the advisory board of the Haileybury School of Mines.

His contribution to the mining industry was recognized by the "Western Miner" in October, 1968 when he was named 'Mining Man of the Month'.

Elected to House of Commons in 1935 to represent Weyburn, Saskatchewan and served there until 1944 when he led the CCF in provincial election. He became Premier of Saskatchewan, a post he held until 1961, when he resigned to become federal leader of the New Democratic Party. He retired as leader in 1971.

Although the NDP never achieved electoral success at the national level under Mr. Douglas, he was an eloquent and fearless spokesman for his party in the House. During the FLQ crisis Mr. Douglas was one of the few public figures who adamantly and vocally opposed the War Measures Act on the grounds of civil liberties.

DR. JOHN WENDELL MACLEOD: Educated at McGill University (B.Sc. 1926, M.D., C.M., 1930) and F.R.C.P. (C) 1938. Mr. MacLeod combined part-time teaching with his medical practice, both in Montreal (McGill, 1935-40) and in Winnipeg (University of Manitoba, 1946-51). In 1952 Dr. MacLeod was appointed Dean of Medicine at the University of Saskatchewan, a position he held until 1961. In 1962 he was appointed Executive Director of the Association of Canadian Medical Colleges. He retired from that post in 1971.

He was made a Life Bencher in 1969.

From 1968 to 1970 he was Treasurer and Head of the Law Society of Upper Canada and has served as Vice-President of the Conference of Governing Bodies of the Legal Profession in Canada.

Estimates Statement By The Hon. George A. Kerr, Q.C.
Minister of Colleges and Universities

Mr. Chairman, I take great pleasure in presenting the 1972-73 Estimates of the Ministry of Colleges and Universities to your Committee. I think it is fair to say that the recent Government reorganization has affected my Ministry as much as any other. To indicate the scope of the changes that have taken place, my Ministry as of April 1, 1972, had 875 employees compared to only 123 when the Estimates of the former Department were presented a year ago. Members might be interested to know that in addition to its involvement with Ontario's 14 provincially assisted universities and 20 community colleges, Ryerson Polytechnical Institute, the Ontario College of Art, the Royal Ontario Museum, the Art Gallery of Ontario and the McMichael Conservation Collection, my Ministry is now responsible for apprenticeship training, educational television, public libraries, schools for registered nursing assistants, the Ontario Science Centre and the Public Archives.

There are now 127,000 students enrolled at our universities and 34,000 students at our community colleges.

Estimates for this fiscal year total a record $719,597,000, including $687,298,000 in direct support for post-secondary education.

This includes grants to universities and related institutions totalling $465,683,000 and grants to colleges of applied arts and technology totalling $130,425,000. These both represent substantial increases over the support figures for 1971-72 and indicate the determination of the Government of Ontario to maintain one of the best post-secondary educational programs in North America.

The Estimates also provide $34,858,000 for grants and awards to students, of which $31,700,000 is earmarked for our Ontario Student Awards Program. This represents an increase of about $2.8 million over what was spent on student awards last year. Members might be interested to know that OSAP criteria are currently under review and it is my hope that we can find enough flexibility within the present legislative framework to ensure that no student who has the ability to benefit from a post-secondary education will be denied that opportunity for financial reasons.

Recognizing the problems that changes at both the Federal and Provincial levels have posed for graduate students, we have adopted recommendations of the Committee on University Affairs that the earnings ceiling for teaching assistants be raised from $1,800 to $2,400 and that for the period from September 1, 1972 to August 31, 1973, universities be permitted to use operating funds for the provision of bursaries payable to graduate students registered for three consecutive academic terms, to a maximum of $300 per student.

As members are aware, the whole question of support for church-related institutions has become increasingly important because of the very serious financial difficulties that they are currently

One of the most interesting new additions to my Ministry is the Ontario Science Centre and I hope that later this year we will be able to find an opportunity for members to see some of the exhibit developments which have taken place in the last two-and-a-half years. At the moment a new environmental gallery called Spaceship Earth is in the final stages of completion. A major undertaking this year will be the restructuring of the Hall of Communication. It will see the additions of various new exhibts dealing with sound perception and word communication, plus a re-alignment of existing exhibits. The Science Centre has become one of Ontario's foremost tourist attractions and we expect some 400,000 visitors during the summer vacation period.

My Ministry will provide $3.4 million to the Province of Ontario Council for the Arts to promote cultural growth. Substantial support is given to the Canadian Opera Company, the National Ballet, the Stratford Festival, the St. Lawrence Centre Theatre Company, the Toronto Symphony and other Ontario symphony orchestras. In all, 168 arts organizations and 49 individual creative artists, writers and film-makers in 51 Ontario communities received grants from the Council.

The Archives of Ontario recently moved to new and expanded quarters. Improved storage facilities will now ensure proper preservation of its invaluable documentary holdings. We are now seeking out privately-held documentary material relating to the history of Ontario and my officials would be glad to hear from any member who has any knowledge of these early records. This year the Historical Branch will commence publication of short historical summaries on the 670 commemorative plaques erected to date. The first volume will relate to the Niagara Peninsula and the Counties of Norfolk, Haldimand and Wentworth.

In conclusion may I just say simply that this Government will continue to give the provision of a first-class post-secondary education system the very highest priority in the seventies. The great expansion of the sixties may be levelling off but if we are to provide the highly skilled work force to serve a mobile society like Ontario's, we must continue to develop new techniques and new approaches to education. The development of our community colleges in the last few years has been of some significance. The success of graduates from these colleges in obtaining interesting and worthwhile employment has been most encouraging. In the next few years I can see much greater use of educational television at the post-secondary level in Ontario. We may well move into the open university concept which has proved so successful in Great Britain and Germany. The whole field of adult and continuing education is just barely opening up. My Ministry will continue to give the leadership required to stimulate new initiatives in these areas and I look forward with anticipation to the challenges ahead.

Kingston's tax position

A group of Kingston citizens take a petition to Toronto today, asking the Ontario government for tax relief for the city. Below, two items from The Globe and Mail which give background.

Some non-monetary good effects

(A letter in The Globe and Mail, Monday, May 22, 1972).

Re The Unfair Burden Kingston Bears (May 11), you state that the city of Kingston derives no mutual benefit from having Queen's University in its midst and that the university refuses "to lay any golden eggs for the municipality". Perhaps you had better check the nest again.

In academic and non-academic staff, Queen's employs nearly 3,000 Kingstonians directly and many thousands more indirectly. Much of Kingston's construction industry and its supporting branches of electricians, plumbers, and so on depend on the building and maintenance of Queen's facilities. Students spend millions of dollars as rents, food, clothing.

The Kingston bus service would be in far worse shape than it already is without its numerous student riders. The same clientele keep Kingston's entertainment centres and restaurants prospering.

The list could go on, but it is obvious that all members of the municipality benefit very much by Queen's presence.

A town of 56,000 could in no way afford the excellent medical facilities which Kingston enjoys unless it had the sizeable medical faculty which Queen's has. A library of close to one million volumes, available to city residents and school children, would be out of the question if the university were not here. Queen's has Kingston's only Art Gallery.

Queen's actively sponsors musical concerts. Queen's provides the only spectator football games, other athletic events, and excellent facilities to which the public has some access.

Queen's students and staff lead the way each year in the United Appeal and provide more than their share of volunteers for this and similar organizations. Student attendance keeps several local churches afloat. Staff and students, through their personal writing and projects, add interest and quality to Kingston's newspaper and television . . .

It seems clear, therefore, that the municipality derives a great deal of mutual benefit from Queen's, and that if the University were suddenly to disappear, Kingston would sink very quickly into a stagnant, depressed area, devoid both of economic prospertity and cultural refinement.

Terry Cook
Kingston

The unfair burden Kingston bears

(An editorial in The Globe and Mail, Thursday, May 11, 1972).

For reasons which can probably be traced back to Ontario's traditional reverence for all things associated with education, universities in the province enjoy a very special relationship with the municipal authority in whose area they are located. The enjoyment is not mutual because a key element in the relationship is that taxes may not be extracted from the universities as they are from other property owners.

Kingston is one city (there are others) where municipal officials and taxpayers can see nothing proper about the arrangement at all. Queen's University is the cuckoo in their fiscal nest -- growing, pushing and taking but refusing to lay any golden eggs for the municipality.

The sprawl continued with the opening last week of an $8-million faculty of education complex at Queen's. Most other developments of this size would bring smiles to municipal faces, but as usual the university expansion has no tax significance.

Kingston's total assessment is in the neighborhood of $156.5-million, of which a whopping $54-million is tax exempt. This includes federal property, but the federal Government pays almost 100 per cent of the assessment as grants.

The provincial Government displays no similar willingness to pay its way in respect of its own properties which -- excluding university holdings -- amount to 2.9 per cent of total assessment.

Queen's University accounts for 12.9 per cent of total assessment in Kingston, and that works out to an assessment of about $20,188,500. Last year's mill rate of 119.28 would have yielded a tax revenue of $2,402,372 from Queen's, but what Kingston actually received was $281,715, paid by the province on the basis of $35 for each student enrolled at the university, plus the $80,000 contribution the university makes to have its garbage picked up. (All services are supplied by the city.)

It is difficult to find justification for a situation which might be compared to having a non-paying guest who occupies the choicest rooms in your house while demanding constant room service and the right to steady expansion. The University of Toronto has placed a similar burden on city taxpayers but the proportion of university assessment to total assessment is much larger in Kingston, making their situation more critical.

The provincial Government should take steps to rationalize the arrangement and, as we have contended before, the most reasonable way of doing so would be to sweep aside the concept of special deals for institutions considered to be worthy in one way or another.

It would be vastly preferable to see all institutions pay full taxes to their municipal hosts -- compensated, where this was deemed appropriate, by grants from the senior governments. We would expect the municipalities to obtain a fairer financial break in the arrangement, with the added benefit of a much clearer view of who was paying what to whom.

Today is today

but on the other hand yesterday could have been today but also tomorrow could be today no, tomorrow has not come yet and yesterday's been and gone of course, if one considers tomorrow in the light of today one could decide that tomorrow is today

Nonsense! Today is today and yesterday is yesterday and tomorrow is tomorrow alas! They are all the same so today is yesterday is tomorrow

how sad that one cannot distinguish the day therefore, if one cannot distinguish the day one cannot distinguish the week
one cannot distinguish the month
one cannot distinguish the year however the crux of the matter is today is today.

Spring carries with its arrival a variety of signs by which we can identify it.

We are accustomed, for instance, to the budding of trees, the appearance of tulips, and the growth of grass. We take full note of the devestment of the human body, a process which passes in stages as people draw the warmth of the sun ever more closely to them.

At Queen's, the late spring brings with it a special budding ritual, convocation. These annual rites signify the fertilization of cities and towns across our country with university graduates who will hopefully make our history and build our civilization. Convocation is symbolically an award for having been able to spurn the pleasures of the world by engaging in intellectual or educational activity.

Convocation is not the same for everyone. The meaning and relevance of the ceremony is different for various groups of people. For students, it is often a hollow reward, bearing little parallel to the tight stomachs, early mornings, barely-passed examinations, and coffee-stained text-books they remember as university. Many refuse to go to convocation, thinking it is unrealistic, paternalistic, and devoid of understanding of what they have been through.

I can recall that when I received my undergraduate degree, I conveniently arranged to be off camping in the Rockies on the day of convocation. My new-found cynicism had the best of me, and I told one and all that the proverbial band of wild horses couldn't drag me up on stage to receive my degree. I relied on the forces of the Postmaster General to deliver my certificate.

To some extent, I regret not having gone to convocation. I don't think it would have made a great deal of difference to me, but I realize that it would have been an event of great significance to my parents.

Parents view convocation much differently than do their students sons and daughters. They have not been through that three or four years in intimate contact with their offspring. Most often, they have seen their children sporadically, and when they have seen them they have probably not been told the full story of what it is like to be studying at Queen's in the second half of the Twentieth Century.

Thus, for parents, convocation is a wonderful time. It is a time to get into the Chrysler with the family and drive down to Kingston. With Instamatic at the ready position, the parents arrive in the Limestone City, covering the limestone beds of academe. They cruise between the Holiday Inn and the campus, wondering where all these people with long hair fit into the picture. They visit the apartment that their sons and daughters lived in during the year, and immediately wish they had raised the allowance each month so that junior could have lived in a decent place.

All parental doubts are erased for the moment when the graduates mount the stage to receive their degree from that most noble of men, Chancellor Stirling. The majesty of the moment, the thrill of seing their child being so amply recognized, stills even the Instamatic.

Faculty members generally ignore convocation. In the first place, just being a faculty member means that one has probably been subject to convocation at least twice. Further, faculty member tend to see their duties at the university as suspended during the late spring and summer months, and an appearance at convocation is certainly above and beyond the call of duty.

Administrators have mixed feelings about convocation. In the first place, it is a time of heavy work for them. In the weeks preceeding the ceremony, they have to assess who is graduating and who is not, they have to make final plans for the ceremony itself, they have to provide for special guests, and they have to answer a thousand phone calls a day from people who want to know a detail.

But for Queen's administrators, it is also a time of satisfaction, for they know that through their efforts, this university will have the best convocation possible.

There are two heroes of convocation, however, and they largely go unsung. They are Chancellor John Stirling and Principal John Deutsch. Their heroism lies in their endurance. Last year they sat through eight convocations. The Chancellor told each graduate to rise, and dubbed him on the shoulder, not to mention the duty of presiding over all the surrounding events. The Principal's feat was only slightly less taxing. He had to deliver his address to eight convocations. It is noted that neither gentleman fell asleep at any time in the ceremonies.

Canada: Quebec union splits in wake of leaders' jailing

QUEBEC — Peace returned to Quebec last week when the eight-day general strike came to an end; it had been protesting the imprisonment of Quebec's three top union leaders, who were jailed for contempt of court based on their inciting workers to violate injunctions which ordered them back to work in the earlier public service strike. On Tuesday, 33 more union leaders surrendered themselves to begin serving similar sentences.

But the Confederation of National Trade Unions, the 225,000-member body whose president Marcel Pepin is one of the imprisoned leaders, found itself splitting apart early this week. Officials representing about a third of the CNTU membership voted Monday to break away from the group, many of them saying that union leadership is acting out of radical ideology, not out of concern for the welfare of blue-collar workers. Pepin, speaking from prison, denounced "the treachery within our ranks", and a spokesman for the common front which included the CNTU said there could be a return to labour disruptions "if it begins to look like we have been betrayed" and the leaders are not freed.

"At the present rate of graduates, in ten years there'll be a surplus of smart dogs!"

OTTAWA — The LeDain commission on drug use issued its report Thursday, unanimously agreeing that Canada should be more tolerant of marijuana, but failing to agree on how the law should reflect that attitude. Three of the members, including the chairman, York University law dean Gerald LeDain, recommended abolishing all penalties for possession of marijuana but keeping reduced penalties for trafficking and cultivating marijuana.

The cannabis volume of the LeDain report said between 1.3 and 1.5 million Canadians have tried marijuana; the commissioners disagreed on how harmful the drug is. "Probably the most serious thing about cannabis is that it is being used by adolescents," the three-member majority said. It is prudent to discourage use of marijuana, especially among adolescents, they said. Accordingly, police would have the right to seize and confiscate marijuana at any time.

In a seminar the day before the report was issued, LeDain said the problem is not drug use but "lack of self-love and an inability to love others".

HAMILTON — Doctors should form trade unions "with a hard-headed willingness to disrupt society", a former president of the Manitoba Medical Association said in a speech here last week.

OTTAWA — The government decided three years ago not to tidy up loopholes in immigration laws, despite explicit recommendations from senior civil servants, The Globe and Mail says.

TORONTO — Ontario Workmen's Compensation Board employees will no longer be allowed to save up sick leave credits indefinitely and use them to retire early on full pay for months or years, labour minister Fernand Guindon said Thursday as an investigation of the WCB went on.

OTTAWA — Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau says there will be no federal election this summer.

OTTAWA — Bell Canada will raise its rates five per cent or more, starting in June; permission for the increases, which cover monthly rates and long distance calls, was granted by the Canadian Transport Commission Saturday and will give Bell an additional $47.2 million revenue per year.

OTTAWA — A bill to control election spending was introduced by the government last week, but it does not require political parties to identify individual contributors.

TORONTO — The existing Toronto international airport at Malton will be adequate until 1990 with some improvements, according to People or Planes, the lobby group opposing the proposed Pickering airport. POP said Chicago's O'Hara Airport handles as many planes now as Malton will handle in 1990.

The World: Individual enterprise threatens QE2, damages Pieta

NEW YORK — The hijack and bomb-threat clowns invented a new trick this week. A phone call Wednesday told the Cunard Steamship Line that six bombs were hidden around the 13 decks of the liner Queen Elizabeth 2, which was steaming from New York to Cherbourg, and would be detonated unless a $350,000 ransom was paid. The money was readied, but bomb disposal experts who parachuted to the ship and searched it thoroughly found nothing. A Cunard official said he thought the ship could not be sunk by the kind of explosives that could have been smuggled aboard, but that explosions near the fuel supply could cause disaster. The ship, carrying 1550 passengers and 800 crew, landed safely in Cherbourg on the weekend.

A similar call Monday, threatening an Italian ship, had a similar outcome.

Also on the lunatic fringe, a self-styled messiah wielding a 12-pound sledgehammer attacked Michelangelo's sculpture La Pieta in St. Peter's in ROME; he broke off the left arm and chipped the face. Authorities said the sculpture could be repaired but that the work might take three years.

WASHINGTON — Violent confrontation and about 200 arrests marked a radical offshoot of a peaceful anti-war protest march by 15,000 people here Sunday.

PARIS — The Queen visited Paris last week, making a good impression on the French people and helping cement Britain's entry into the European Common Market.

SAN JOSE, California — The Angela Davis murder trial may end by June 1; defence lawyers Monday began presenting what they said was "an abbreviated defence". They had earlier lost a motion claiming that the prosecution's case, concluded last week, showed clearly Miss Davis is innocent of the charges that she planned, and furnished the weapons for, the escape-ransom scheme in which court hostages were to be used to obtain the release of Soledad brother George Jackson. He, along with two other convicts and a judge, were killed when the plan misfired, August 7, 1970.

BELFAST — Bombing and shooting went on.

MOSCOW — Richard Nixon became the first U.S. president to visit the Soviet Union when he arrived there Sunday for an official visit; his reception was cool, but meetings with party leader Leonid Brezhnev quickly produced results -- a pollution pact was signed Monday and other agreements were expected, including possibly a joint US-USSR space flight, which experts said might involve an orbital linkup in June 1975.

WASHINGTON — Splits are appearing in the North Vietnamese government since U. S. president Richard Nixon ordered extensive bombing and mining two weeks ago. American mines have effectively closed ports in the North, diplomats in Hanoi say. U. S. spokesman Monday said "the stress in the (Hanoi) regime is much more intensive" than it was before the new military policy went into effect.

NEW YORK — Lucy and Linus Van Pelt have a new baby brother, United Features Syndicate reported Tuesday.

WASHINGTON — Ford Motor Company 1973 model cars cannot be certified under current air-pollution laws until they are retested, a procedure which could take months. The probable result: a delay in starting production of the fall models, and probable massive layoffs by Ford. Commented board chairman Henry Ford III, "I'd say we're in one hell of a mess."

Comment: DeaD-en-Ded -- no socialist movement in Canada

"WOT'S IN IT FOR ME?" asks Duncan MacPherson's Canadian working man.

It's a good question.

Voluntarism, pure and simple, has never paid off for working people. Over the centuries it has cost them blood, sweat and tears. Why should Canadian working people care?

Maudlin platitudes about the Canadian identity and other meaningless inanities will abound over the next several months as we are being prepared and processed for the political tournament that is about to occur.

Canada's working people do pay a price for American economic domination — branch plant shut-downs, a shortage of high-paying jobs in manufacturing, resource depletion and all the rest. But this is not the primary concern of all those who have suddenly discovered that they might be able to cash in on the general concern over Canadian cultural and economic survival.

Liberal spokesmen are now saying that branch-plant management jobs must be made available to more Canadian executives and that stocks and bonds of American branch-plants be sold to Canadian investors. Organizers for the Committee for an Independent Canada (a Liberal front [illegible] Liberal liberals) are demanding [illegible] in American branch plants be [illegible] Canadian. They are also demanding more public aid for Canadian business, and special tax concessions for Canadian business.

It is no mystery who will lose out from these measures and end up paying the cost. Nor does it take any political wizardry to figure out who will make enormous financial gains in the Liberal "fight against the U.S. takeover."

That's the way it is in Canadian politics. That's the way it has always been. The rejects are bought off by welfare; the farmers are bought off by a 2-price system; the vociferous unemployed middle-class youth are bought off by Opportunities for Youth Grants; the Liberal idealists — the Hartys, Gordons and Robstems are bought off by measure to bolster Canada's business elite, the weeping publishers are bought off by grants to keep them solvent.

Brokerage politics, flexible, adjustable. It still works and nothing changes.

Meanwhile there is the N.D.P. with its "new" leader vigorously pumping his clenched fist and demonstrating an outraged indignation — while mouthing the same nationalist drivel and thereby adding to the mystification of Canada's working people.

The multinational corporation does not scare easily. It is not scared of David Lewis — no matter how hard he pumps his fist. It's easy to see why. Neither of his successful New Democrat colleagues, Edward Schreyer or Allan Blakeney have been willing to confront a single large American company. N.D.P. governments do not take over profitable companies, no matter how badly they exploit their workers and disregard the needs of the communities in which they locate. Rather N.D.P. governments add to welfare programs, adjust taxes, raise minimum wages and salvage bankrupt companies.

(Premier Schreyer, ironically, has taken to joining the general attack on welfare recipients — too many of them are lazy and irresponsible, he says. Meanwhile, he neglects to attack the system which makes welfare profitable and inevitable. An attack that questions the validity of the economic system as a system is upsetting to uncommitted voters.)

Plant shut-downs, plant abandonment and mass lay-offs have occurred in Saskatchewan and Manitoba. Multinational corporations cannot help but notice that N.D.P. governments respond in the same way that Liberal and Conservative governments respond. They do nothing. What is more, most members of the N.D.P. do not seem terribly disturbed by this inaction.

At a time of massive unemployment, recurrent lay-offs and systematic plant shut-downs, Canadian working people remain passive and apathetic, totally unprepared to move collectively to gain control over their jobs, their livelihood and their country.

The N.D.P. and its union backers, even if they had policies that answered to these problems, teach the wrong lessons. They teach that the solution lies in changes in legislation and in more government and bureaucratic controls — rather than in people organizing themselves to take collective control over their place of work, and to provide various essential services. What social democratic parties teach is apathy, passiveness and dependence. That is why they are irrelevant in the building of a socialist society.

There is no socialist movement in Canada. Without it there can never be a socialist party. The N.D.P. (or any other third party) will be forced to cater to the uncommitted moderate voter who must be convinced that under the N.D.P. there will be change but not disruption, progress but not dislocation.

The Liberals have coopted the nationalist issue because it has been shorn of its socialist content. David Lewis sounds like an angry Trudeau and a petulent Stanfield. Maybe his driving fist and his outraged indignation will be enough to win a few more seats for the N.D.P. in the upcoming federal election. Somehow it doesn't seem to matter.

Arts and science convocations are Saturday

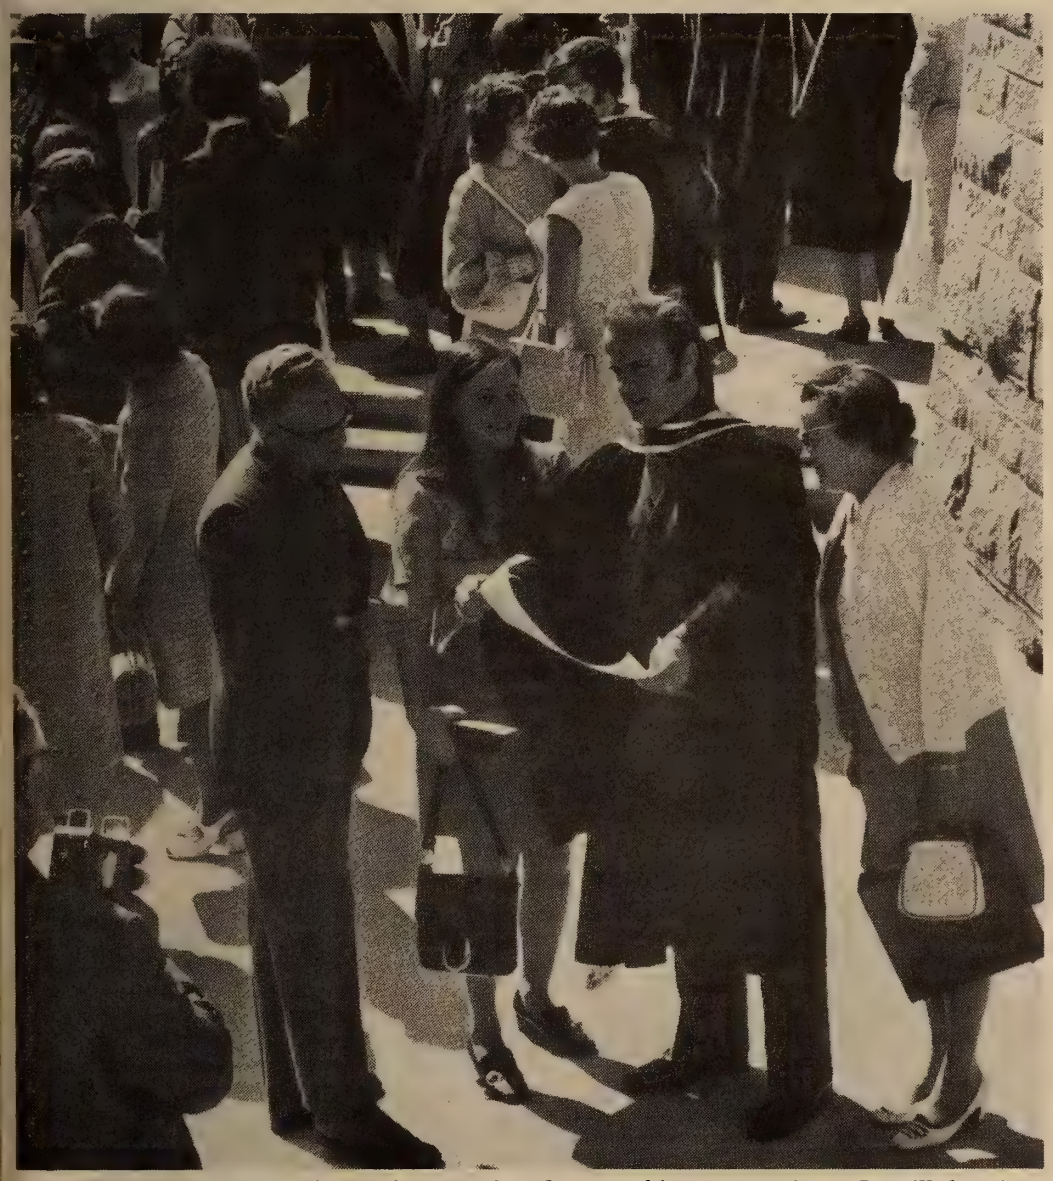
Convocations Saturday morning and afternoon will award a total of 1131 degrees under the Queen's faculty of arts and science and school of physical and health education.

Saturday morning 235 B.A. (honours) graduates will receive their diplomas, as will some of the 676 students receiving B.A.'s. As in the past, B.A.'s have been divided between two convocations. The afternoon session, besides the rest of the B.A.'s, will see the university award 91 B.Sc's (honours, subject of specialization), 40 B.Sc.'s (honours), 43 Bachelors of Physical and Health Education, and 46 B.A.'s to phys ed students.

During the morning convocation, an honorary Doctorate of Laws will be awarded to Peter Swann, director of the Royal Ontario Museum, who will address the convocation. Speaker in the afternoon, and also recipient of an honorary Ll.D., will be A.R.M. Lower, emeritus Queen's history professor and a leading Canadian historian.

At both convocations a number of academic awards will be presented. In addition, there will be three Tricolor Awards: to Paul Barron, Marv Bloos and Nancy Hoey. The Tricolor Award is Queen's highest nonacademic, nonathletic award, given for service to the university.

Convocations are all being held in the Jock Harty Arena this year, a tradition begun in 1971 after fire marshal's rules made Grant Hall, already cosy, far too small for the crowds which attend convocations. The number of sessions has been reduced this year, however, from eight to five.



The ceremony will follow the traditional pattern, with the academic procession led into the arena (from the gymnasium, where it will assemble) by kilted pipers. There will be one evident change from last year, however: mortarboards will be virtually gone. AMS hood and gown rental staff responded to complaints last week by telling female graduates that they need not wear mortarboards unless they wanted to, and most chose not to; that trend is expected to continue this week.

(Last Friday and Saturday more than 1500 students received degrees and diplomas at three convocations for all divisions of the university except arts and science and phys ed.)

The convocation hymn, "O God Our Help in Ages Past", will be sung at both convocations, and principal Dr. John J. Deutsch will speak, as will one of the honorary degree recipients. Graduands will go to the stage in pairs to be laureated by chancellor Dr. John B. Stirling and hooded by a senior member of faculty. Stirling will occupy the centre chair on the stage, flanked by Deutsch and the rector, Alan Broadbent (the student representative to the university's senior governing body, the board of trustees).

This will be the twelfth year in which Stirling has presided at spring convocations; there have also been special ones, for the installations of two principals, Dr. J. Alex Corry in 1965 and Deutsch in 1968, and for out-of-season honorary degrees.

Stirling is scheduled to retire June 30; however, it is understood that his term will be extended for at least a year. When he is not active as chancellor, Stirling is a Montreal construction executive.

This was the scene in front of the Jock Harty Arena minutes after the end of one of last week's convocations. It will be the same this Saturday. - Pic by John Solman

Government grants no taxes on Queen's property

Kingston's tax problem is "unique", but not as serious "as Kingston would have us believe", the treasurer of Ontario said Thursday when a citizens' committee presented a petition asking for government grants in lieu of taxes on exempt property.

Queen's is the sorest point with many Kingstonians, in a city where tax-exempt property, including the university, hospitals, churches, government property and schools totals 35.4 per cent of all property valuation in the city.

A 25-member delegation, led by Kingston housewife Mrs. Irene Mooney and including two aldermen, went to Toronto to present a 13,000-signature petition to treasurer Darcy McKeough. The petition asked for "immediate municipal grants in lieu of taxes for all tax-exempt provincial property in this city", and was apparently intended to include Queen's, though the university is not government-owned.

After more than an hour of discussion with the delegation, McKeough's answer was "Not for the moment." But he promised to reexamine the Kingston situation after a province-wide study is completed, by the end of 1973.

"Of course, we will want to take all of 1974 to assess the reassessment before we begin to act on it in 1975," McKeough said.

But, he said, since I've sort of committed myself now, I promise to look at the Kingston figures as soon as they become available, and maybe give some relief by as soon as 1974."

He acknowledged that the Kingston situation is unique in Ontario and possibly in Canada: the city has 484 tax-exempt properties.

However, he quoted figures to show that the city's average tax per householder, $312, is lower than the average in Oshawa ($376), London ($341), and Sault Sainte Marie ($332). "Your average is probably low because your services aren't as high as in other areas," he said.

Aldermen K. W. Matthews and T. A. Hagerman, who were with the delegation, said this is because Kingston services suffer for lack of money. The city's annual budgets for parks, streets and sewage should all be increased by 25 per cent to bring those services up to standard, the aldermen agreed.

Kingston's provincial legislator, Syl Apps, said during the meeting that he thought Kingston should receive a grant of at least half a million dollars. This would more than double the grants now paid in consideration of Queen's and St. Lawrence College property, which on the basis of $35 per student are bringing in $313,000 per year. Queen's also pays $80,000 per year for garbage collection.

However, it would be considerably less than the amount full taxes on the exempt property would bring in, that figure has been estimated at $2.4 million or more annually.

McKeough suggested that Kingston's solution might be to annex Kingston Township, in which much of the area's industry is located. "That's where you're losing all that tax money," he said. But Matthews pointed out that industry may be keeping outside the city limits to avoid Kingston's tax rate of 125.78 mills.

Looking at the five-inch sheaf of signatures attached to the citizens' petition, McKeough commented that "I don't want to belittle your petition.

"But I could go out and get eight million people to sign a petition saying their taxes are too high."

Community leaders agreed later that the city would just have to wait for government consideration; mayor E. Valorie Swain said he "wasn't really surprised".

"We are just going to keep on letting them know we are worse off than others," Mrs. Mooney said.

newsbriefs

Students run service

Three final-year engineering students are in business for themselves this summer as the owners -- and so far the only employees -- of a research and consulting service.

Claude Chabot, Janet Duncan and Murray Brox, all chemical engineering students, started Summer Scientific Services after exams ended, but they began talking about the idea in February, Chabot said. SSS is now very busy, he added, with contracts which may run past the beginning of classes in September. "It was tedious at the beginning," he pointed out, "but we are enjoying it and getting valuable experience."

SSS is occupying an office in Clark Hall, using office supplies and a typewriter supplied by the Engineering Society. The AMS gave them a $50 loan, and both Queen's and Kingston media have introduced them to the public; they are going on the television programme Kingston Calendar next week to talk about their project.

At present most of the service's jobs are engineering drawings and graphs done for Queen's professors; their first contract was a research job for applied science dean Dr. Robert K. Uffen. One outside job was for E.I. DuPont of Canada, the chemical manufacturer.

SSS hopes to expand, employing other students by the end of the summer, and to pave the way for a similar service in future summers.

The three SSS students have written a twelve-page booklet on a walking tour of Kingston, in cooperation with the city's hospitality bureau, which will be distributed at tourist information centres. It will cost 75 cents and includes a map of Kingston and information about a number of historical places of interest.

The idea for such a tour came from Quebec City and some European cities, Chabot said, and the three students thought that with Kingston's heavy influx of tourists in the summer, a walking tour might be a popular way to spend a few afternoon hours.

Lake to be prettied

Stone from under the Queen's lower campus, removed during digging for the underground parking garage, will be used as landfill along the King Street waterfront, under an agreement reached last week between Queen's and the city government.

The landfill programme will make a randomly curving waterfront with trees and grass extending several yards beyond the present edge of Lake Ontario in the area between Lower University Avenue and Collingwood Street.

Blasting for the parking garage is expected to begin this summer.

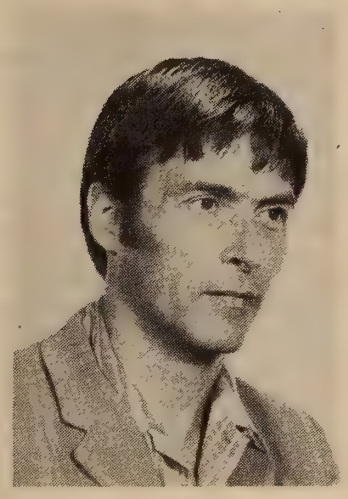
Garbage project in trouble

The garbage reclamation scheme for Kingston proposed by two Queen's engineering professors has run into trouble with the provincial government.

Ontario environment minister James Auld said last week, in a letter to Kingston mayor E. Valorie Swain, that he would not recommend a government grant covering the full cost of the project, but might consider some assistance, such as a partly forgivable loan.

Earlier, the government had suggested a smaller-scale project, but Auld said he had been told that a reduced project would not cost less in the first place.

He gave the city of Kingston three alternatives: a detailed study of how the project can be made more economical; a larger commitment from the city than the present $220,000 per year; or agreement from a third party, such as the packaging industries, to share in the project's costs for its recycling benefits.



Swain, replying to the letter, said Auld's analysis was too pessimistic, and denied his claim that the operation would lose between $100,000 and $226,000 per year.

Swain said, "Studies are a prelude to the well-recognized proclivity of all levels of government to study something to death before recommending no action."

The Kingston city council endorsed the garbage reclamation plan last year after it was developed by Dr. Jim Brown and Dr. Reg Clark of the chemical engineering department. The federal government agreed to pay research and development costs and the province of Ontario had been asked for capital to get the project started.

Appointments made, not announced

The Queen's public relations department no longer tells the media when the university makes major appointments. Three appointments made recently have been gleaned by The Journal from sources other than the press releases which the department used to issue.

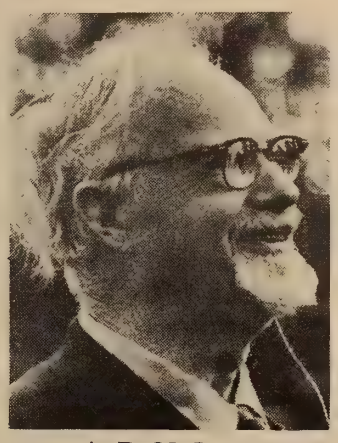
P. C. Dodwell

They include an associate dean, a department head and the acting director of a school.

An information officer in the public relations department told The Journal on Tuesday that, "There will be no more press releases until the university gives us enough staff."

But public relations director Larry Moore denied that this was his policy: "We're working on those releases and they should be out soon."

One of the three was announced in some detail in the Queen's Gazette, a weekly or biweekly campus newsletter for which Moore's department is responsible. Last week's Gazette announced the appointment of Dr. P. C. Dodwell, psychology professor at Queen's since 1958, as head of the psych department.



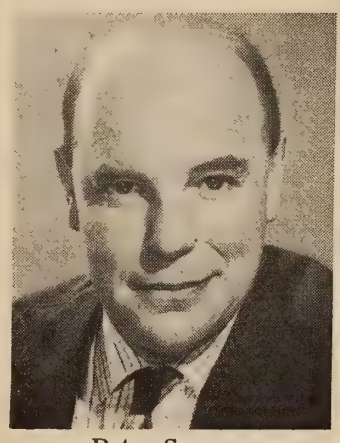
Dodwell was acting head of the department from 1964 to 1966; he is chairman of the university's statistics council and of the arts and science faculty nominating committee. An Oxford graduate and a former Guggenheim fellow, he works primarily in the area of visual perception.

A second appointment was mentioned briefly under "special appointments" in the same Gazette: J. F. Edwards of the school of physical and health education will be acting director of that school for 1972-73, during the sabbatical leave of its director, Dr. D. DeF. Macintosh.

The third appointment was unofficially disclosed to The Journal after it was announced to the faculty board of arts and science last week: Dr. Peter Platenius of the psychology department is the new associate dean (studies) of the faculty of arts and science. He replaces Dr. Albert P. Fell, who is taking a sabbatical leave next year and then returning to teaching philosophy.

Honorary degrees this weekend

DR. ARTHUR R. M. LOWER: He came to the Department of History at Queen's in 1946 and in 1952 took the James Douglas Chair in Canadian History, a post he held for seven years.



A. R. M. Lower

Dr. Lower has received wide acclaim for his books on Canadian history. He twice received the Governor-General's Medal of the Canadian Authors' Association, in 1947 for "Colony to Nation", and in 1955 for "This Most Famous Stream". He received the Tyrrell Medal of the Royal Society of Canada in 1947 for his work in Canadian history.

DR. PETER C. SWANN: Educated at Oxford University, he is an Oriental scholar and helped to reorganize the Indian Institute at Oxford as a museum of Eastern Art. He was later appointed Keeper of Eastern Art.

In 1966 Dr. Swann was appointed Director of the Royal Ontario Museum, Toronto, and during his tenure, the museum has been marked by steadily climbing attendance figures, an increased vitality, and expanded financing.

Faculty to pay fines

Faculty members and students alike will be fined if they keep Douglas Library books overdue, as the result of a policy decision made last week by the university senate.

Acting on a recommendation from the library committee, the senate resolved that "fines in Douglas Library be standardized with respect to overdue books and recalls for all users".

The senate was told that in the past "a gentleman's agreement" has existed that faculty members would not be fined no matter how long they kept their books out. Chief librarian D. A. Redmond commented that, now the policy is in force, "We believe it won't be necessary to invoke penalties except in egregious cases."

Presenting the motion, library committee chairman and English professor Dr. Charles Pullen commented, "After four months faculty members should be able to trot their books back."

There has been repeated criticism of professors who keep books out indefinitely. No proposal was made to change or standardize loan periods, which are four months for faculty, one month for grad students, and seven days for undergraduates (eleven days during the winter).

Heffalump to change name

The Heffalump Craft Shop, the downtown botique owned by the Alma Mater Society, is changing its name. To what -- your guess is as good as a new leather vest.

Store manager Jane Corkin announced yesterday that a contest will be held to find the new name. (See entry blank elsewhere in this paper.) A hand-made leather vest will be given to the winner.

She said that the decision to change the name came as a result of complaints from a Toronto law firm representing Walt Disney, who owns the rights to the use of characters from the famous children's book Winnie-The -Pooh by A. A. Milne. The law firm did not threaten action but did strongly suggest that the store change the name.

Miss Corkin said that the AMS lawyer looked into the matter, but after some negotiations it was decided to change the name rather than risk long and expensive litigation.

Addresses by honorary graduands to the co

Addresses to commerce and engineering grads

It will take some time to absorb the honour conferred on me this morning, and it is a pleasant experience to find myself back at Queen's and to be speaking to this Convocation. More years ago than I want to make a point of, I attended my first Convocation here, or in Grant Hall at least, and was conceded a degree in engineering. Queen's was already a venerable institution, but with less than a quarter of the present enrollment. I think it looked older then than it does today. That was the age of the squares. In those days, before the last war, it was an economic disaster to be anything but a square; but, in a sense, things were easier too. Opportunities were fewer; choices of a career were limited. Change was something that hadn't happened for a long time. There were no traffic or parking problems. No more than 3 or 4 students on campus had cars. Football was big, of course, and Queen's was having quite a winning streak. We used to drive ourselves crazy in those days trying to decorate the old gym for the formals. At initiation time things got a bit rough now and then. When a freshman broke the rules, such as taking out girls before the end of the first term, he was liable to be given a haircut. Do you still do that? It used to happen all the time, but hair was shorter then anyway, and recovery didn't take so long. So much for the good old days.

by R.D. Lord

Well, Dr. Deutsch, when the University does someone the honour, as in my case, of an invitation to address Convocation, I'm sure it is with the prospect that something useful can be conveyed to the graduates, an idea or a reminder that can be put to good purpose. What can be said that is relevant to what lies ahead for new careers?

If I have a thought to offer you today, it is in the area of communications - not the electronic kind; I mean the person-to-person kind. You will want to be recognized for the work you do, and your employer or firm needs recognition as being a proper segment of society. There is nothing new here, but I want to speak of it a moment because efforts to achieve recognition are so often neglected. Technical people are often so involved with the task in hand that their personal relations and their awareness of their part in the larger picture comes off second best.

My association has been with the mining industry. Here -- and I think in the case of industry generally -- not enough attention has been given to presenting itself to the public in the proper context -- a situation we are trying to correct.

About 19 years ago, our exploration crews were staking the uranium find in the Algoma district about 20 miles north of the north shore of Lake Huron. Along the north shore is an Indian reservation and the highway and railway pass east and west through it. At the time of the staking rush, the only public telephone within 20 miles was at the little railway station. What with staking party leaders calling their head offices, and everyone calling his broker, the telephone had become jammed with coins. An elderly Indian, contemplating one of the field geologists trying to make a phone call, finally spoke up. "In my grandfather's time, white man came to the north shore and built saw mills and cut down all the big trees, -- nothing left here but small trees. In my father's time, white man came back and built pulp mills and cut down all the small trees, -- nothing left on the north shore but rock. Now you fellows have come back for the rock." Well, the trees are growing again, and, if one of you were to do a benefit-cost analysis on the activities of the north shore of Lake Huron for the past 100 years, I am sure you would come up with a big plus in favour of all the wood products and the uranium; but the old Indian did not know about DCF and ROI - just that the hunting was not what it used to be. There's a lot to be said for better communication with those whose environment we are likely to affect.

A second kind of communication I would like to touch on is that between your two disciplines. Perhaps it is no co-incidence that graduates of Applied Science and the School of Business are receiving degrees together this morning. The skills you have been developing are complementary and they should work in concert. This is so obvious you might be surprised how often it fails to happen. Good engineering gets few marks if the project is not economically sound, -- if it's not financeable, -- and the most elaborate economic analysis is no better than its engineering. Association with a considerable number of projects, and even a spell in business school a few years ago, has not convinced me that we have mastered a balancing of engineering, management and business disciplines. I'm aware that university curricula are continually up-dated, but one should always keep in mind that there is the other side to the coin, -- and how else but by good person-to-person communication, and seeing yourself as part of a larger picture.

And now a third type of communication, - the one that I think is the most relevant to you as individuals. You will shortly acquire a boss somewhere, -- more than one if you should eventually go into business on your own, -- and you will want to be a net benefit to those using your services. It is possible to be a benefit and for the recipient to be unaware of it. Unfortunately no one can tell us, at least specifically, how to register with our employers. Here, if anywhere, we have to be our own man, do our own things, -- and we play the hand that's dealt us, or find another game. It is my impression that the business school graduates are often the better prepared for this. Rudyard Kipling wrote the Ritual for the Iron Ring, didn't he. He admired the work of engineers, -- "Theirs is the task that the gear engages, theirs that the switches lock", he said. Now, in this P.R. world, they need to go a step further, and tell the why and the who. Don't rely on your technical output and neglect your personal relations, your image, because both are essential to what I feel sure are your goals. And anyway, I'm parochial enough to like to see Queen's people make all the yards they are entitled to.

Your degree today is a considerable accomplishment, and it should be a base for a lifetime of learning. It has been said that an engineering education has a half-life of 10 years, and no doubt much the same can be said if you are a business graduate. Professional people are facing a more competitive world. Money is not the barrier it once was to an opportunity for an education, so there will be more of us around. But that is not necessarily bad; competition is the way better things get done. Do not be discouraged if job opportunities just now are less than your expectations. Yours are the skills of the builders, and where better than in Canada is there scope to exercise them?

There are many other skills than yours and mine, but it is the builders who change the face of the world around us and have perhaps the greatest impact on, and responsibility for, the thing now described as the "quality of life". The United Nations have initiated recently a project they call "Earth Watch", organized to monitor, assess and advise on environmental disturbances. We are more and more accountable for leaving a favourable balance, a net benefit. Social responsibility is expected of industrial activities and it behoves us to see that the impression made does justice to the effort, that we don't default in the communications area. Engineers and businessmen are often the most knowledgeable to speak on a particular topic, but fail to do so, and thereby neglect one of the social responsibilities of their professions.

In the early 1500's a European by the name of Georgius Agricola laboured for some 20 years to assemble in 12 books all the elements of the then known arts of mining and metallurgy. Much later, in a second monumental effort, these writings, known as De Re Metallica, were translated from the original Latin by Herbert Hoover, former U.S. President. Like most good authors, Agricola was also something of a philosopher. He evidently considered it necessary, at that time, to justify the practice of mining, and the use of metals, and further to support the concept that earning a living was a worthwhile endeavour. The latter is surprising since in his day the welfare state was still a long way off. Among the quotations in De Re. Metallica, -- on making a living: "Money glistens; adorned with virtue it supplies the means by which those mayest act well in whatever circumstances fate may have in store" -- and again: "Riches do not make men great without virtue, neither does virtue itself make men great without some wealth", -- and this next one I think can be applied to the problem of communication and recognition: -- "Those things we see, and perceive with our senses, are more clearly demonstrated than if learned by reasoning". So spoke Georgius Agricola 400 years ago, and how can we argue with him?

I shall close with one more quote -- this one from a Canadian writer who made his name up in the Yukon, around the turn of the century -- from one of the ballads of Robert W. Service:

> Go forth to the highest north,
> 'Til a lonely trail you find.
> Follow it far, and trust your star,
> And fortune will be kind.

May you all go far, in whatever your directions, and may Queen's be proud of you.

You've got you

Perhaps some of you who are receivi degrees in education and theology this are now saying to yourselves, "We ha for our degrees: these two old goats free". Let me try to establish a persp you on this whole exercise by quoting D Johnson: "That academical honours be conferred with exact proportion to more than human judgment or human have reason to expect."

Mr. Fisher and I thank the Senate o University for giving us our honor torates. We are both close enough to pr obsolescence that our new degrees have built-in demands or promises, and provileged simply to enjoy them and in little innocent vanity over them.

But to each of you who is receiving a degree today, a degree carrying both and promise, I say this: "You've got yo -- now what?"

You have been hounded and pounded long academic obstacle course and you here this afternoon with what Profess Lower has called "a vocational can-o professional degree. You are now formally, for professional work. (I know theologs will have little difficulty get But you pedagogs, I understand, face sticky job market: I am not com comment on that, but I do hope that yo badly hurt because there have been som planning goofs in the education field.)

What does your degree mean reall does it prove? What does it demand of y does it promise you? Does it certify th now full to the top and slopping knowledge and expertise? Are you no to stop studying?

Your degree is simply a measure performance in the academic hothouse it indicates something of your achievement in your profession. But guarantee of achievement. Your perfor school merely indicates promise: the are yet to come.

You will soon forget much of what y learn in order to get your degree. Do about that if you can at least rememb retrieve that knowledge when you ne education, after all, is mainly in what is you have forgotten most of what you ha in order to get it. Remember what Leacock said: "An education, when written out on foolscap, covers ne sheets."

A. N. Whitehead, one of the more i philosophers of this century, said this in The Aims of Education: "A mer informed man is the most useless bore earth." He continued: "Now wisdom i in which knowledge is held. It conc handling of knowledge, its selectio determination of relevant issues, ployment to add value to our imme perience."

It is possible to pass examinations a degrees, even advanced degrees, and the wisdom which makes for pers vocational fulfilment. Wisdom is not function of intelligence or cleverness. have an I.Q. so high that it quivers away in the atmosphere and be so full of k that it buckles your knees, and yet no wisdom. Widsom is what you do with telligence and your knowledge, and comes to persons of quite ordinary in and rather limited formal education.

vocations held in Jock Harty Arena last week egree — now what?

I hope that you will avail yourself of the opportunities for continuing education on your profession. But never presume on formal instruction. In the long run an ongoing enterprise in self-education -- assisted, of course, by formal instruction, both past and current -- will be far more important to you. And in this you will have to accept the discipline, the sheer dogged grinding, all the boredom and frustration, which are essential in any learning process that will count.

If you are to advance from milk to meat, you must be willing to chew gristle. And do not expect always to be spoon-fed. Now don't try to tell me that there isn't a good deal of spoon-feeding done in colleges of education and theology. That isn't necessarily a bad thing: spoon-feeding is often the best way of acquiring basic knowledge and skills. But never stop with spoon-feeding, never assume that it is in itself enough. As the English novelist, E. M. Forster, once said, "Spoon-feeding in the long run teaches nothing but the shape of the spoon."

You will, of course, learn much from the experience of others. But don't be fooled by this experience business. Be wary of the quaint assumption that mere time spent in a profession automatically confers professional wisdom. There is a significant difference between having the experience of twenty years and having only the experience of one year twenty times. (I estimate, probably quite presumptuously, that I have become nearly two years wiser for every seven years of professional experience I have had -- and that seems just about average. I am uncomfortably aware of the truth in the old quip: Experience is getting a comb after you've gone bald.)

Professional experience counts only to the degree that you learn from it and mature in it. That's a terribly platitudinous thing for me to say, but, then, platitudes often carry truth and common-sense. I like the story about little Tommy who was taken by his mother to see one of those periodical re-runs of Walt Disney's film-cartoon, Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs. Tommy and his mother had entered the theatre shortly before the scene in which the wicked witch gives Snow White the poisoned apple, and they leave when the film comes around to that scene again. As they walk up the aisle, Tommy looks back over his shoulder and sees that the witch is about to offer Snow White the apple. Tommy looks pensively at his mother and says, "If Snow White eats that apple again, she's crazy!"

Tommy has at least the beginnings of wisdom with respect to learning from experience, both one's own experience and the experience of others. But will his wisdom develop in proportion to his experience and his awareness of the experience of others? As an occasional eater of apples known from experience to be poisoned, I am haunted by a line from T. S. Eliot's Dry Salvages: "We had the experience but missed the meaning."

A key to growth in wisdom is that old-fashioned virtue, humility. I do not mean the kind of humility that grovels in self-depreciation and whines in obsequious self-criticism: I mean, rather, the humility that is in honesty about oneself, in wholesome acceptance of one's limitations while striving to go beyond them, and in recognition of one's ignorances and incompetencies. Let me pass on to you a bit of wisdom I have acquired in my experience: it has been the things that I thought I knew but didn't and the competencies I thought I had but hadn't that in my career have most effectively kept me from acquiring new knowledge and new competencies.

I finish by giving you some words from an ancient prayer: "O God of Truth: Deliver me from the cowardice that shrinks from new truth, from the laziness that is content witn half-truths, and from the arrogance that thinks it knows all truth." Amen!

The challenge of the seventies

It is a great privilege to have been honoured by one of Canada's oldest and most highly esteemed universities. Queen's holds a unique place in Canadian history with its Scottish inheritance, its high ideals of scholarship and its long tradition of excellence. This university has given to Canada a galaxy of distinguished leaders in the professions, in commerce, the public service and a wide variety of academic pursuits. Most important of all, Queen's University has lived up to the hopes of its Scottish forbears and has stood throughout the years as a centre of learning where freedom of inquiry has gone hand in hand with moral responsibility. It has been a bulwark against intolerance and any erosion of human freedom.

My fellow recipients and I are deeply grateful for the honour you have done us today and will endeavour to be worthy of it.

May I congratulate the members of the Graduating Class on the success they have achieved -- but most of all for the tenacity they have shown. It takes only curiosity to begin a course but it takes perseverance to complete it. Today you have reached a plateau in your lives. I hope this measure of success will inspire you to go on to further achievements in your chosen fields.

As you leave university you are going into a society that faces many problems. But after all, every generation faces problems because life is the process of continuous adjustment to an ever-changing environment. Nevertheless yours is the first generation in human history to face the possibility of total annihilation from nuclear bombs, environmental pollution and the population explosion. Never has any previous generation faced such awesome problems but never has any generation been better equipped for the task in terms of education, communications and scientific expertise.

You face the Challenge of the 'Seventies. This challenge arises from changes that have been brought about by a variety of factors – increasing urbanization, the menace of pollution, the alienation of the disadvantaged, the threat to Canadian Confederation, the diminution of our Canadian identity and the growing tendency to settle international disputes by resort to force. These are problems that will not go away merely because we deplore them and we will ignore them at our peril.

Fifty years ago H. G. Wells said, "History is a race between education and catastrophe". Today we know that education by itself is not enough. The nightmare of Naziism came in one of the most highly educated countries in the world. Today the race is between a sense of social responsibility and human disaster. The physical sciences have given us the potential to enable every person on this earth to live a richer and more satisfying life but the social sciences have so far failed to devise ways and means to make this possible. We have been able to put a man on the moon but have yet to learn how to make man feel at home here on earth.

Since the end of World War II the post-Keynesian school of thought has dominated our economic thinking. Policies derived from the Keynesian theory seemed capable of sustaining high levels of employment and high rates of economic growth. Much of this system rested on the assumption that competition and the "invisible hand" of Adam Smith operating within the marketplace would prevail. Where "natural" monopolies existed these could be regulated by government agencies. The primary role of government was to ensure full employment and economic growth by a proper mix of spending, taxation and monetary policies. Post-Keynesian economists assured us that economic growth could provide the resources for a series of domestic reforms and improvements such as ending poverty, expanding opportunity, solving urban problems, building houses and highways, with enough left over to provide aid to the developing countries of the world. All this could be done, we were told, without rocking the boat by redistributing income or breaking up any of the great industrial and financial centres of power.

However, events have not followed the post-Keynesian scenario. In the 1960's we began to experience the phenomenon of unemployment and inflation existing side by side. The Keynesian techniques designed to achieve full employment and economic growth have failed to resolve this dilemma. The concentration of economic power has been accelerated with national monopolies being rapidly replaced by multi-national corporations whose economic power straddles national boundaries and thwarts national policies. The gap between the rich and the poor is widening so that today some 25 per cent of Canadians and Americans are living below the poverty line. Equally serious for the cause of world peace is the fact that the gap between the "have" and "have not" nations is widening at an alarming rate.

The inadequacy of the post-Keynesian synthesis is underlined by the continuing crisis in the international monetary system, the breakdown of which is leading the world into economic warfare. It is further demonstrated by the fact that the world's richest nation, the United States, has resorted to government control of wages and prices. This is something never envisaged in post-Keynesian economics and, even if successful, can only freeze the present distribution of income as a temporary stop-gap measure.

An increasing number of economists such as J. K. Galbraith in the United States and E. J. Misham in England, are calling for a halt to worshipping at the shrine of the Gross National Product. They contend that economic growth only makes sense if it contributes to human wellbeing. They see little value in economic growth if it destroys our environment, congests our cities and denudes our countryside. These men question our priorities and point out that while advertising moulds consumer spending on more and more things that are non-essential, our society is starving the public sector with regard to our expenditures on education, research, pollution control and the eradication of poverty. The unpalatable truth is that our society has been much more concerned with efficiency than with equity, more exercised with the quantity of our goods than with the quality of our lives.

The architects of our economy must look more profoundly at the question of what really makes man tick -- alone and in groups. We must find better ways to improve the lot of human beings, and how to improve human beings themselves, so that they can be helped to behave more decently and sensibly with one another and their fellowmen the world around.

It's not enough to pursue economic growth as the Holy Grail of our time. The challenge of the 'seventies calls for social priorities based on human wellbeing and social justice. Professor Daniel R. Fusfield of Michigan University summed it up in a recent article in these words:

> "A humane economy requires more than prosperity and economic growth, more than efficient allocation of resources. It demands changes in the framework of economic institutions to achieve greater equality and freedom. It requires dispersal of the economic power and governmental authority that support the present disposition of income, wealth and power. It requires a social environment that brings a sense of community and fellowship into human relationships. It demands compatibility among man, his technology and the natural environment. And all these things must be done on a "world-wide scale. These are the goals of the future to which economists and everyone else will have to devote their energies."

That is the challenge of the 'seventies, not just for the economists, but for all of us. We are facing not merely a crisis in our economy but a crisis in our society. The economists alone cannot solve many of these problems for they involve value judgments as to the social priorities that should prevail. Life consists of making choices. What we chose is what we become both as individuals and as a society. The choices you make, individually and collectively, will decide the kind of world you and your children will inhabit.

That, in my opinion, is the challenge. It calls for imagination, ingenuity and daring. Above all, it calls for men and women with the moral courage to tackle new problems in new ways. As James Russell Lowell said:

> "New occasions teach new duties;
> Time makes ancient good uncouth;
> They must upward still, and onward,
> Who would keep abreast of truth:
> Lo, before us gleam her campfires!
> We ourselves must pilgrims be
> Launch our Mayflower and steer boldly
> Through the desperate winter sea,
> Nor attempt the future's portal
> With the past's blood-rusted key."

On Saturday, over 1000 people will be graduating in the Faculty of Arts and Science and the School of Physical and Health Education. It would be interesting to know how many of these people will be employed following graduation.

If statistics can tell us anything, we should assume that a good percentage of these people will go to graduate school, and that a good percentage of them will be unemployed. Some will be unemployed by their own design, preferring to travel or live the life of a recumbent intellectual. Some will be unemployed by other's design, being seen as too generally educated to fit into specific job categories.

I would like to take this opportunity to point out to such potential but unwillling employers the benefits of hiring an arts graduate. These benefits are varied and often subtle, but often turn out to be the vital factors in successful hiring.

First, we must assume that some of the arts graduates are of the genius calibre. One description of a genius is that he is able to perceive relationships where they are not obvious, or are hidden by complexities. Some arts graduates have this genius capability. Most arts graduates have an even more sophisticated intellectual tool, however, and this is seldom given the full weight it deserves. They are able to perceive relationships where none exist. This is an incredible talent, one that the university spends considerable effort imbuing in students, and one that is not at all recognized by employers.

Secondly, an arts student has a social quotient that far outreaches that of graduates in other faculties. It is a known fact that arts students have fewer hours of classes per week than other students. This gives them the chance to become sophisticated practitioners of the various social arts. Arts students, for example, are very good social drinkers. This can prove to be a vital asset in business. They can sit through a four hour liquid lunch, be wonderfully amiable, and leave without assistance.

Arts students also develop a skill at games and sports that others do not. At university they have time to play bridge, squash, billiards, and golf, abilities which prove vital in their future success. As an aside, I might point out that the Medical School is always happy to admit arts graduates, for it is likely that they play golf well, and that, of course, is mandatory for doctors.

This ability at games is important for employers to note, for many big deals are consummated on the golf course. Insurance salesmen often find the going easier if they can play a few sets of tennis with clients. And of course, stock market agents who can bid a good game of bridge can quickly gain the confidence of the most reticent investor.

Arts graduates have developed a mobility that other university graduates have not. Not being tied to the classroom or their books, they find it easier to move about, meeting people and doing things. This is an asset in terms of office dynamics; for the arts graduate can circulate in the office, making sure that everyone is happy, has enough coffee, and providing for the necessary organization for office parties.

In addition, very few arts graduates will ever suffer from insulin shock. Insulin shock often comes about when people drink too much coffee with sugar, and don't have enough other nutrients in the system to process the sugar. The resulting rise and fall of the system according to the sugar level produces insulin shock. Arts graduates have had so much coffee with sugar by the time they graduate that they are immune to the effects of sugar. Thus they are stable and well balanced employees.

With the things in mind, employers should seriously consider hiring arts graduates. They would insure those necessary extras that go to make a good business a great one.

(During May and June, about 40 Queen's students are in Venice, studying Venetian art, Italian music, or Italian 100 for Queen's credit. This report comes from one of them.)

Dear Queen's:

Well, here we are -- about forty strong -- in not so sunny Italy. Apparently there's a saying here in Italy that if it rains on Ascension Day, it will rain for the next forty days -- it did and it has -- four days down; thirty-six to go.

Courses started bright and early last Monday and onward and upward we go, rapidly becoming experts in Venetian music, art history and, of course, Italian. We've had a few unforeseen problems such as no tape recorder for the Italian and music courses but we're still working on them. With any kind of luck, these problems will be solved soon.

Venice (or Venezia as Professori Bastianutti would prefer) is a marvelous city full of unbelievable contrasts. The beauty of the Piazza San Marco and the Teatro la Fenice against the squalor of some of the back streets and lanes in incredible. As you probably know, there are no wheeled vehicles in Venice and the only transportation is by small wheelbarrels and by boats. The boats all have horns and when they're sounded, it seems strange not to hear squealing tires immediately following. The gondolas in the canal under our window are just like the movies complete with singer and accordion player.

Being in Venice brings all of our courses to life. The art history people gain much more by actually being here than they ever could at home just looking at pictures. The Italian students get a lot more practice than they ever could in Kingston; and we music students find that our visits to the large cathedrals and theatres make even Adrian Willaert come alive again. Everyone agrees that the lectures are excellent and tours and concerts add a perspective that we could never gain in Kingston. The courses are difficult and we're all working pretty hard but we still have some time for a little fun and general goofing around. It seems that when the people here discover that we're Canadian students they are much warmer towards us than they would be if we were American tourists. You wouldn't believe the number of tourists that are here. They almost outnumber the pigeons and wild cats. Speaking of pigeons, we're told that if a pigeon "christens" you, it's a sign of good luck -- we must be the luckiest students in the world.

We've had some pretty incredible experiences since our arrival; there was the ten of us who got stranded in the Milan airport upon arrival; the strange train ride to Venice and a rather unusual experience one evening in a park which, by the time it was over, had taught us a new Italian word -- la polizia. But we'll save the details of those stories for when we get home.

Several copies of the May 11 Journal arrived yesterday and were passed around at dinner. It's good to hear from home that all is well and we hope that Snoopy enjoys his pottery course. We're looking forward to the next Journal so we can keep track of all of you. Our best to all of Queen's from all of us.

Dr. R. K. Start
Permanent President, Meds. '28

It is a pleasure to advise you of my conversation last Saturday with Dr. D. W. Boucher about the erection of a plaque together with a class picture of Meds. '28 in the room in the Students' Memorial Union which you and your classmates completed and furnished around 1948.

The plaque of brass is mounted on a piece of wood from a walnut tree which once stood on the Campus where the Mathematics Building (Jeffrey Hall) now stands. The wording reads: "The original furnishings of this room were donated by the Class of Meds. '28". Along with the picture, it is mounted over the fireplace so that all who use the premises will be conscious of the significant and thoughtfull contribution which you and your classmates have made. I have verified that some of the original furnishings have been worn out with use over the past two decades. The other good pieces are still on hand, but with the change in use of the room are employed to advantage in several other locations, namely: The Alumni Office, the office of the Executive Assistant to the Principal for Student Affairs and the Alma Mater Society Office.

I am also happy to report that, in connection with the plans for the management of the proposed University Centre, the Board of Trustees has established a management study group of ten members from the Queen's constituency, with representatives from the Board of Trustees, Senate, Alma Mater Society, Faculty, Alumni and Administration. A report to the Board on the management organization of the facilities at the present Students' Union will be one of their responsibilities.

On behalf of all of us at Queen's, may I thank you and your classmates for your continued interest in the welfare of the Queen's student body.

Sincerely,

Nicholas and Alexandra

Brush up on your history

by Paul Gomportz

This movie attempts to reduce the whole Russian Revolution to the level of personal family tragedy and, important though the family in question may be, they are hard pressed at times to carry the weight of the action.

There are two main failings that result from this condensation. Firstly, it is difficult to assess the enormity of the problems facing Nicolas, for the audience knows about as much of the general state of the country as he does, which, as the movie shows, itsn't much. Secondly, in order to preserve the continuity of the family tragedy, the movie sacrifices any attempt to follow the political and social forces at work. Thus there is a strange inadequacy in the background material of the story. Sometimes the external forces are fully portrayed, sometimes they are hinted at, and sometimes they are simply ignored. Politicians and leaders crop up in different places and different roles with confusing regularity, and the political musical chairs becomes an incoherent scramble.

Given the movie's basic intention, it succeeds well enough for it does manage to convey a great deal of Nicholas's personal and monarchical confusion and tragedy, though the latter suffers somewhat at the hands of the former. This is perhaps the central weakness of the movie. It is too personal. The family comes well before the country, and yet the impression given is that Nicholas was genuinely aware of his position.

Janet Susman is superb as Alexandra and her performance is well sustained until the bloody end. She is an admirable complement to Michael Jayston's Nicholas, who acts his role efficiently without ever being totally convincing. The line-up of supporting actors is impressive and includes Laurence Olivier, John Mcenery, Roy Dotrice, Eric Porter, Michael Redgrave, Jack Hawkins and Jan Holm. If nothing else, the movie can become an entertaining game of spot the star.

Unfortunatly, Nicholas and Alexandra has left town.

Profs expected to give 'inaugral lectures'

Newly-appointed department heads and full professors will be expected to give a special "inaugural lecture" after they arrive, as the result of a committee recommendation approved by the university senate last week.

The committee on fine arts and public lectures presented a number of proposals for improved organization and publicity of events on campus -- including a weekly flyer to be titled "What's On at Queen's".

The senate approved its recommendations of continued cooperation with elementary and secondary schools and with regional and international cultural organizations.

A recommendation that the university study possible future participation in Kingston area cable television was approved without further details.

The committee's report said the media, including Queen's television and CFRC radio, are "underused" in many ways and that annual study of their potential should be undertaken.

Radio drama workshop offered

A second Radio-Drama Workshop is being offered through the facilities of CFRC. This Workshop will be held during the Summer School Session at Queen's University, from the 3rd of July to the 9th of August. Classes will be held Monday and Wednesday evenings. Instruction will be offered by Norma Edwards and John Burgess. There is no fee for the Workshop, but enrollment will be limited to ten people.

The purpose of the Workshop is to provide practice in the techniques of Radio acting and directing, and to encourage and promote the use of creative imagination.

The writing of radio plays will be encouraged, and participants will have ample opportunity to continue acting and producing after the Workshops are over.

Applications should be directed to Suzanne Atkinson. They may be mailed or brought to the radio Station in the basement of Carruthers Hall. Applicants will be selected on the basis of future interest, and on a first-come basis. The deadline for applications is June 14.

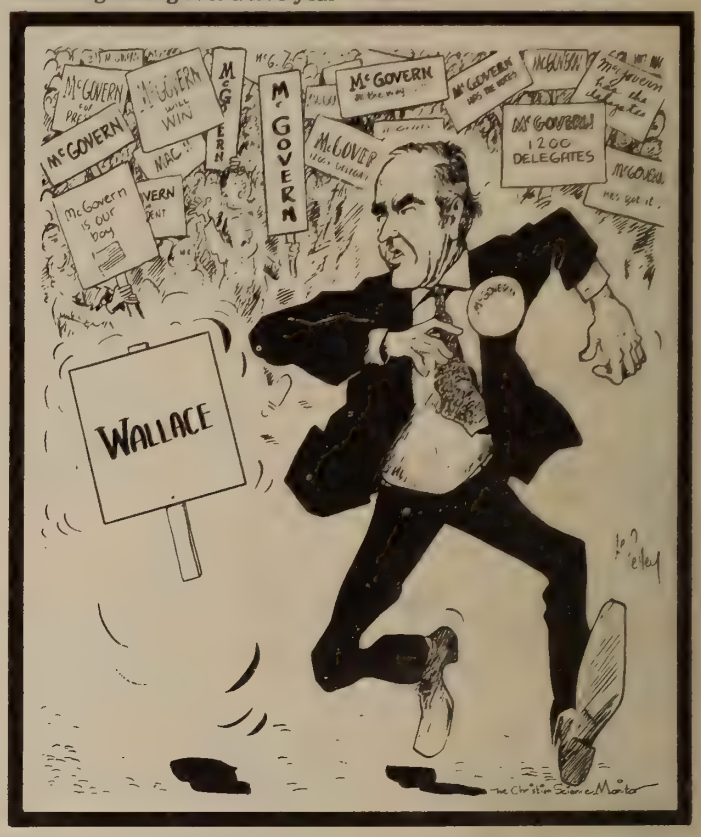
The World: Nuclear arms limitation treaty is signed

MOSCOW — U.S. president Richard Nixon and Soviet party chief Leonid Brezhnev signed a nuclear arms limitation treaty here Friday shortly before Nixon wound up his historic visit to the Soviet Union. The pact limits anti-ballistic-missile defences indefinitely and freezes for five years the number of land-based and sea-based intercontinental ballistic missiles each nation may have. The two nations reached five lesser agreements during Nixon's week in the USSR, including treaties on cultural and scientific cooperation and an agreement for a joint space flight in 1975. But there were no farther-reaching secret agreements, presidential advisor Henry Kissinger said as Nixon left Moscow, and both parties indicated that they were far apart on the Vietnam question, which was in the background of all their political talks. (The American blockade of the North went on, apparently successfully.) During his stay Nixon made a televised speech to the Russian people, telling them that the memory of the World War II alliance between Russia and the United States can serve as inspiration for a renewal of cooperation." Nixon indicated he was very satisfied with the results of his trip, and left for home via Iran and Poland.

BELFAST — The Official wing of the outlawed Irish Republican Army announced Monday that it was suspending guerrilla warfare indefinitely, but the rival Provisional wing accused the Officials of surrender and vowed to fight on; they called the announcement "a gigantic confidence trick". The Provisionals have been responsible for most of the bombing and guerrilla attacks in Northern Ireland, and a spokesman said they would go on until all political prisoners are released and the British Army leaves the Six Counties of Ulster.



LONDON — Edward Albert, Duke of Windsor, who gave up the thrones of England, Canada, India and the rest of his empire to marry the woman he loved, died Sunday in Paris, aged 77. He had been ill for some time. He reigned as Edward VIII for ten months in 1936 before abdicating, in a crisis which rocked the monarchy and titillated readers around the world, to marry an American divorcee, Mrs. Wallis Warfield Simpson. She was at his side when he died. Since the abdication, the Duke and Duchess of Windsor had been in self-imposed exile from England, in the West Indies and Europe; only in recent years was there a real reconciliation with his niece, Queen Elizabeth II. Buckingham Palace announced Sunday that he would lie in state at Windsor Castle and be buried in the cemetery at Frogmore, near Windsor, where his great-grandmother Queen Victoria also lies.

BONN — West Germany last week ratified goodwill treaties with the Soviet Union and Poland, ending a long controversy over the treaties, originally settled in 1970 by chancellor Willy Brandt.

WASHINGTON — Arthur H. Bremer, who was indicted last week by two grand juries on charges related to the shooting of Alabama governor George Wallace, also was tracking president Richard Nixon and senator Hubert Humphrey, according to Newsweek magazine. The "substantial evidence" to this effect, Newsweek says, suggests that the motivation for Bremer's alleged shooting of Wallace was less political or ideological than "an effort to gain widespread attention". Bremer reportedly was in a crowd outside Parliament in Ottawa when Nixon visited there April 14; he apparently has been at a number of other political rallies as well.

WASHINGTON — Senator George McGovern continues to lead Senator Hubert Humphrey slightly as the last major hurdle on the way to the Democratic national convention approaches: next week's California primary.

COPENHAGEN — Canada wants to ban high seas salmon fishing in the North Atlantic, and Denmark wants to protect its Baltic Sea fishing grounds by extending fishing over a five-year phaseout period. Denmark is not willing to compromise if the International Commission for East Atlantic Fisheries turns down the original Canadian position, the Danish fisheries department made clear last week.

Canada: Doukhobors loosed, Jalna ends, forest fires burn

KINGSTON — Five Doukhobor women were released from the Prison for Women on Thursday and flown to their homes in British Columbia. The five, all in a weakened condition from a self-imposed fast, were released on "unlimited leave of absence without escort" for medical reasons, said a penitentiaries service spokesman.

TORONTO — Coroners' juries will no longer be allowed to find civil or criminal responsibility, under changes in the Coroner's Act introduced Thursday in the Ontario legislature. At present such juries can accuse an individual of murder, negligence or other faults, and court charges usually follow. A "bill of rights" for witnesses at coroner's hearings is also included in the bill, which will allow jurors to make findings of fact and recommendations only.

TORONTO — The CBC Thursday cancelled The Whiteoaks of Jalna, its much-criticized serial drama, which will end after 13 television episodes. Cancellation was caused by lack of foreign sales, unfavourable reception, and the technicians' strike which was making it impossible to tape more episodes.

TORONTO — Rosemary Phillips, 22, gave back her diploma Friday when she received it at Ryerson Polytechnical Institute as one of RI's first nine degree graduates. RPI, which got degree-granting power this year, had just given its first honorary degree to Ontario premier William Davis. Miss Phillips said her degree meant "practically nothing in terms of content of the education and the ability of the individual".

OTTAWA — Canadians would be shocked if they knew the extent of Communist subversion in Canada, former defence minister Paul Hellyer said Sunday. Hellyer, now head of Action Canada, said the government is keeping the public in the dark about security matters. RCMP commissioner W. L. Higgitt said that to his knowledge "there is not extensive Communist subversion in Canada".

TORONTO — Forest fires are being fought across northern Ontario this week; during the weekend 156 fires were burning in the province, sixteen of them out of control, including a 6000-acre fire about 130 miles from Thunder Bay. The situation was improving somewhat, said a spokesman for the department of natural resources.

TORONTO — The waiting-list for Ontario Housing Corporation space in the Toronto area grew by sixty per cent from 1971 to 1972, reaching a record 20,330 families.

OTTAWA — Pinkerton's of Canada, Ltd., an American-owned firm of security guards, will patrol federal government parkland in the Ottawa area because it can handle the job better than the Canadian Corps of Commissionaires or the RCMP, solicitor-general Jean-Pierre Goyer told the Commons last week.

KINGSTON — Ottawa developer William Teron said Monday he is scrapping his plans for Marina City, a proposed $30 million waterfront development in Kingston, because the Royal Canadian Horse Artillery Brigade Association was "stubbornly" refusing to see him some of its land on terms he considered reasonable.

OTTAWA — The latest batch of Opportunities for Youth grants includes two for groups of students who will record activities of other OFY grant holders – one group which will produce television documentaries and another which produce a book. Altogether 2845 OFY grants have been approved for a total of more than $29.5 million.

TORONTO — Ontario is setting up an office to promote and coordinate the introduction of the metric system of weights and measures, the ministry of industry and tourism has announced. The federal government approved the eventual adoption of the metric system in January 1970.

BAFFIN ISLAND — Three Brock University students received Bachelor of Science degrees at a special convocation here Tuesday. They are members of a party studying sea ice conditions at Pond Inlet on the northern tip of the Island, some 2000 miles north of Brock, which is in St. Catharines, Ontario. A Brock convocation was held in St. Catharines at the same time to award 400 other degrees.

TORONTO — The province of Ontario plans no steps to regulate the sale or use of fireworks, despite one death and several injuries caused by fireworks during the Victoria Day celebrations, premier William Davis said in the legislature last week.

Queen's proposes railroad for Arctic oil; claims it's safer and cheaper than pipeline

The Canadian Institute of Guided Ground Transport at Queen's proposed today that a 1200-mile rail line be built along the Mackenzie Valley to move the Alaskan north oil to Trout River, Northwest Territories, and then by pipeline to the United States midwest.

They say that the railroad will have fewer detrimental affects on the environment or the Arctic than the currently approved (but held up in the courts) Trans-Alaska Pipeline and Pacific tanker route.

In addition, the institute claims that the inland method would provide a more positive economic impact - employment, stimulation of Northern development, and a less expensive oil transportation system.

The study is being carried by the CIGGT in conjunction with National Railways and Carnegia-Mellon University in Pittsburg. Funding came from the federal department of transport and the Institute.

The study proposes that construction could be finished within five or six years of preliminary route reconosance. They recommend to the government that further feasability studies be undertaken immediately, and that steps for beginning route design be taken as soon as possible.

They say that disruption of the environment is inevitable no matter what form of transportation is used with the Alaska crude; and that it will have to be transported some day. They pointed out that 'because of its association with an earlier day, a railroad would be less of a cultural shock (and more efficient) than a busy highway or an airport.' A buried pipeline would be the least noticeable, but is impractical.

The two basic premises of the study are that Alaska (Prudhoe Bay) oil would best be absorbed into the US energy system in the refineries in Chicago and Saint Louis rather than those on the west coast, and that estimates should be as conservative as possible, but traffic figures be similar to those of the Trans-Alaska proposal.

The Mackenzie Valley route is the best because of its favourable terrain, the high probability of oil finds in the area, the skirting of critical ecological areas, and that it is keeping with the government policy of the establishment of a Mackenzie Transportation Corridor.

The rail line has some other advantages over pipeline in that its capacity can be increased without large amounts of capital reinvestment.

The proposed system would operate 20 trains daily of 168 20,800 gallon tank cars, five diesel units, and a crew car. Optimum speed would be 60 mph.

The operational system is based on the use of current railroad technology and the purchase of off-the-shelf rolling stock and locomotives (3000 horsepower General Motors units).

Loading would be by a pressurized system which would load four streams of nine cars in ten minutes. A similar system would be used for unloading. Trains would operate as units, and be inspected for damage at a number of points along the way.

The rail line will avoid some of the problems forseen for the Trans-Alaska pipeline and tanker route. In order to flow, crude oil must be kept warm -- in the 160 - 180 degree F. area. Heat will escape into the ground no matter how well a pipeline is insulated, unless it is built well above the ground. The effects of this are not completely known, but a heavy pipeline would probably tend to sink. Since thawing is not uniform, the danger of pipeline rupture would be high.

In areas of discontinuous permafrost, along much of the pipeline route, the sensitivity to heat is even more severe. A rail line would not dissipate as much heat, and would tend not to disturb large areas of moss cover.

Permafrost is a rather delicate substance and its structural properties are still being investigated. Traditional Arctic construction methods of piling would be rather difficult, if not impossible, on a massive scale that a pipeline would require.

The behaviour of wildlife to such a structure is unknown. In Scandanavia, reindeer (semi-domenticated caribou) have been known to refuse to pass under power lines or to cross railroad tracks. Caribou, on the other hand, frequently cross the rail line to Churchill in northern Manitoba.

The Institute stresses that there will be some disruption of the environment no matter which method of transportation is used with the Alaska crude. They see the rail line as providing a minimum amount of disruption.

They are not sure what interaction the Arctic wildlife will have with a rail line (partially during construction). It is assumed by the Institute that caribou will largely ignore a railroad, although they recommend further intensive studies of wildlife interaction.

A Canadian government wildlife expert did not think that a railroad would hurt larger animals, but pointed out that caribou are known to interfere with trains on the Churchill route and occasionally moose wander along rail lines in the southern regions of the line (occasionally being hit). A far northern line

Union food prices going up

Coffee shop prices will go up when it opens again this July. The increases will be five cents on every item but pint milks and do-nuts which go up two cents; individual french fries, hamburgs, cheeseburgs, and carbonated and non carbonated drinks which remain the same and liver and onions which go down five cents.

AMS president Greg Leblanc said that he has protested the increases in coffee and tea to the union management. He said these particular price increases were "not especially fair."

Leblanc suggested to the management that the price increase on coffee be instituted for the summer but rescinded in the fall and then re-evaluated next year.

The increases are needed to generate another $40,000 of revenue to help balance the union budget. The coffee and tea increases are to help raise $15,000 of this.

Senate approves new scholarships

In September, 144 first-year students will be receiving scholarships totalling $91,250 for entrance to Queen's. That figure was included in a report which came to the university senate from its committee on scholarships and student aid, which also reported a new $100 annual scholarship for a modern languages student from North Grenville Secondary School.

At the same meeting, the senate approved an outline for the operation of the student counselling service, including an annual budget of $16,000.

It also discussed a policy paper on the freedom and responsibility of a faculty member, which pointed out that a faculty member has a year-round commitment to the university and " is expected to devote all his professional endeavours to the university". Outside professional work and "counsulting" should normally be done by prior agreement with the university, and under terms set down as the dean of each faculty thinks suitable, it suggested.

Construction starts on Lower Campus

Digging and blasting for the underground parking facility will begin within the next two weeks. The general contractor is Caribou Construction of Kingston. The construction will put the lower campus out of action until the fall of 1973.

In other minor construction, a new hardwood floor is being laid in Grant Hall, and the structural members piled on the lawn of Nicol Hall are for the reconstruction of the Nichol Hall entrance.

These funny-looking things outside of Agnes form part of a five piece Environmental Sculpture by Queen's Art History staff member Allan Dickson. They are based on the infinite mathematical concept of the moibus strip.

Queen's hosts track & field meet

Queen's Track Club, in conjunction with the University, are hosting a pre-Olympic Dual Track Meet between teams from Ontario and Quebec. The meet will be held on the new all-weather track at Richardson Stadium on the West Campus. Action will get underway this Sunday at 2:00 pm.

The competition will include a full slate of Olympic events for both men and women, with the exception of the steeplechase. Several world-class athletes, including Quebec high-jumper Claude Ferrange and Ontario's Debbie VanKiekebelt in the pentathalon, will be competing. Ontario's women's team is especially strong, with hurdler Elizabeth Dammen, and discus throwers Carol Martin and Jane Heist, in addition to Miss VanKiekebelt.

Special relays for both boys and girls from local public and secondary schools will be staged along with the interprovincial competition. Proceeds from this meet will go to aid the development of track and field in Kingston, so all track buffs would be well advised to attend.

the dormouse

by Alan Broadbent

The provincial government has been urging universities recently to make the best possible use of resources, in order to make the dollar go further.

This of course has presented major problems for universities. Here at Queen's, we have been trying to increase our output with a clever rationalization of what we have on hand. However, the problems are enormous.

For example, one of the cuts we had to make recently was in the purchase of flower bulbs. It was decided that we were spending too much on them, and we would have to do more with less The chief gardener gathered all of the bulbs around him (there were a good many empty seats, mind you), and told them they would have to do double duty. They would have to grow two stalks and flower at the top of each.

The flowers put up a tremendous fuss. They referred to the agreement of employment which says they must flower only once. They pointed to the understanding all flowers had with universities, that they could remain on flowering once until they passed out of production, and then they were to be guaranteed a warm roost in a dry cellar. Finally, they told the chief gardener that he could not possibly dictate terms to the flowers, because he was not of them and therefore could not assess their value. They threatened to take their grievance to the Canadian Association of University Flowers (CAUF).

However, the chief gardener persisted, and the flowers, who had security problems anyway (there are more flowers in the country than there are trowel holes), finally agreed to the double duty.

Another group who has worked to make better use of resources is the people who run the pubs in the Union.During the past few years the pubs have been open for two nights a week. Recently, the group who manages the pub went before the AMS council asking for permission to stay open other nights of the week, and now they run the service five nights a week, as well as during the noon hours.

The intent here is to make full use of the rooms they occupy on the second floor of the Union. They are doing awfully well at this. However, as a result, many students are falling asleep in the classroom. The relaxing qualities of a glass of beer has taken the best of students and faculty, and the efficiency rate has been lowered severely.

With the advent of the intersession classes, it is now possible for students to go to school year round. With the lengthening of the pub hours, it will be possible for students to drink most of the day and night, and catch their rest in the classroom, only minutes away from the pubs.

The potential of the government urgings is somewhat frightening. The other day, I heard several Business Administration students making the best use of the resources available to them. They were gaining some practical experience in trying to sell Dunning Hall to a group of high school students who were touring the university. After they had closed the deal, a group of law students stepped in and decreed legally that the sale was unlawful, and foreclosed. They then turned around and re-sold Dunning Hall to the unwitting Business students.

Last week, a group of arts intersession students, who had not had a break since last June, were discovered hooking up a sail to Grant Hall. They planned on sailing it over to Wolfe Island for a picnic, a badly needed rest from the rigours of the academy. Fortunately they were stopped by a group of engineering students who wanted to convert the building into a bridge.

In the future, we will have to conduct classes in the midst of students sleeping in lecture halls and in corridors. Faculty offices will double as quick meal dispensers, and the Principal will have to conduct high level meetings in a Collins Room that has been reconverted into a wind-tunnel.

When "Bill" Davis, premier of the province, visits Queen's, he will have to speak to a group of people who will be wolfing down lunches, in the centre of a hall that is having its temporary walls removed so that it can be used after his speech as a dissection hall for a thousand doctors with elastic wrenches.

This is no time for despair

Following is the text of the speech given by Dr. Peter Swann, former director of Royal Ontario Museum, on the occasion of receiving an Honourary Doctor of Laws at the Arts convocation last Saturday morning.

I am conscious that it is no mean honour when an old and distinguished university bestows an honorary degree. When this comes to a man as a result merely of having done a job, that is fascinating, of having served a place he respects and achieving whatever he may have achieved through the labours of so many other people, then I personally can only accept it with gratitude on behalf of the institution which I was fortunate to direct. The history books are unjust. It is not really the generals who win the wars. It's the soldiers - and then often in spite of the generals!

My good fortune lay in having inherited a great Canadian cultural institution built up and manned by an outstanding international staff. In spite of every difficulty they have, over the last 60 years, raised it to the forefront of the world's museums at a time when this particular kind of educational organisation is being called upon for vastly expanded services to the community.

The phenomenon of the museum in the last few years and the program which the staff and the government have made possible indicate deeper changes in our society than might appear on the surface. Museums, which were once scorned as dusty mausolea, have now become the focal points of mass interest. Urged on by social pressures they are developing into dynamic cultural centres. It is not easy to know why this is so.

Perhaps after a century of destruction culminating in the discovery of nuclear weapons mankind has realised the importance of preserving what man has achieved in his five or six thousand years of civilisation on earth.

Perhaps, having educated our population so well, we are beginning to realize that we must provide the kind of civilised opportunities which new generations expect. Or is it something to do with that very basic issue of freedom, "Freedom of Choice"? In a world of increasing uniformity do our people seek the kind of freedom of choice which a museum, like a university or a library should offer? Such a demand will come as no surprise to the universities striving to design curricula which enable a student to combine biology and modern art, physics and history, zoology and business administration.

Again, in a world of increasing specialisation, perhaps the popularity of a museum represents an ever increasing desire for good generalisation, a return to an earlier view of what constitutes an "educated" man.

Or is it possible that people are looking for standards? If we have done our job well the Museum like a university will have preserved the sum total of the world's cultural standards. Where else can they see it "in the round" so to speak - and without gimmicks - the false coin of our society?

Or am I being too sophisticated and all many people really want is an hour of peace and quiet during their battered lives? - a few moments surrounded by beauty or tranquillity or somewhere where they can learn a little about the fascinating world of nature in which they live. A natural world which is now so threatened that soon, perhaps, some of nature's great landscapes will only be preserved in replica in museums.

Faced with over a million visitors a year I can only put questions and not provide too many answers. We are concerned, among other things, with the transmission of culture - a function once performed mainly by the family. But as family ties weaken, do our young people look to places like our schools, our universities, and museums for this important function? Or are some of us seeking the satisfaction of an emotional need? A good friend of mine is in love with Nefertiti, and to spend a few moments regarding her supreme beauty colours his whole life and warms all his other relationships.

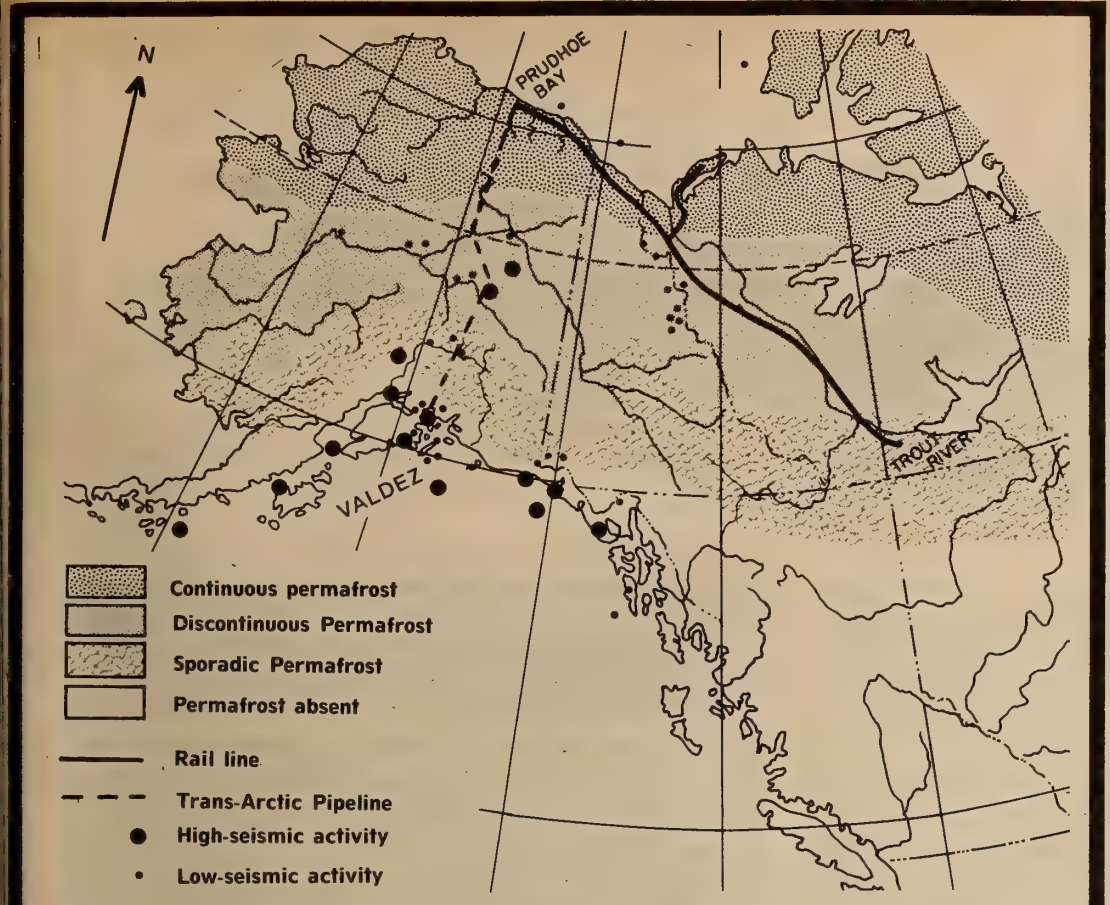
Or perhaps we should look a little deeper at the economic basis of our lives and wonder what happens as we move ever deeper into a post industrial age, as we are forced out of the phase dominated by that exclusively materialistic ethic which is costing us so very dearly. If there are indeed limits to growth, with what do we replace it? How shall we ever occupy our people?

The last century belonged to a belief in materialism - to a conviction that the increase of wealth, usually gained at the expense of less fortunate or less-developed peoples, would automatically lead to an increase in all the good things of life. We are now not quite so sure. The first part of this century belonged to the intellectual, the second part to the technocrat. I have a feeling that we may now be entering into a third period which I like to think of as an Age of Sensibility.

I would not be so presumptuous as to claim that I understand the generations younger than mine who are faced with problems more complex than mine ever faced. But consider the permissive society, drugs, interest in exotic religions, astrology, encounter groups, psychadelic experiences. Are these nothing more than a reaction from boredom or are they a logical development of humanism? My generation ran fast enough in its day. Yours will be forced to run even faster - either to keep up with it or escape from it. Not a very pleasant choice ladies and gentlemen. But negative or positive, I think your response will be dictated by the manners of the heart - and that can only be good.

I have no advice to give you. I can only say that I have found my own greatest pleasure in trying to develop my own sensibilities in a creative life, in learning to pay the price one pays for everything, in coming to terms with myself, in finding a few friends, in overcoming those fears which haunt us all and, although it sounds corny, in being of some service to one's fellow man.

I was in one respect fortunate, I learned very early in life how senseless it is to devote a lifetime exclusively to making money. Surely this century must have taught us that lesson. It is sad to find men who have not passed beyond such a primitive phase - and it is a joy to find th have, even though it may ha late in life.



Yet we need the resource our technology can produce. S we must reconcile this need needs of society. I see a great between a narrow business and that of a government aware of the needs. Coming continent which is only just e from the exhaustion brought two major world wars, Canad such a broad, fortunate land tering promise. One looks sou border and one grieves for the tragedy our neighbours have their promising world. Can learn from that - even if it r little sacrifice? Yet, I see sig States that men of coura determined to turn it round think that after much trav will. Sometimes I find us Canada so negative and somet timid. But what an opportu have to establish different st and, in doing so, to take the be so many cultures - boldly an fully - and then to add to it very real Canadian base.

I have seen so many change short six years I have bee Younger and freer minds are t their contributions to the d making process, bigger an confident thinking is coming fr elected representatives, consideration of what reall stitutes the quality of life, structive rethinking of the condition, a re-awakening democratic roots of our soci impatience with pompousnes and humbug, a desire to harn forces of discontent into pro channels. How much better spend $50 million on Local Ini or Opportunities for programmes than on a prototype inevitably destin mothballs - where the idea belo the first place! We are a w healthy country. We can aff great experiments and I thin are quietly taking place. If we do it ladies and gentlemen, it be done anywhere.

"Government interfere "They"? Who are "they"? Th "us"? I see no sign of weaknes intellectual or cultural life wh instance, a Report on Post Sec Education can arouse such troversy. But let the critici constructive - bold, more positi many of the reactions we hav Governments interfere with t the day we are born. The nam game is to ensure that our ment, our representatives sat far as is possible, our wishes, we are doing better all the time game.

And above all I remain op for I refuse to give into the alte - which is black despair. It turned round, it will be turned We have no alternative. Wh hear you say? "Don't hand t mistakes. Don't lay that one Well, I do, regretfully but feeling of confidence. Ca nationalism, if that is what w can mean a fair, preserved, c and beautiful land - an exampl world.

This is no time for despair.

would have less problems in this respect.

Much of the damage to the environment can be expected to come during the construction period. CIGGT stresses strict controls on workers and cautious construction techniques.

A railroad has an advantage during construction in that much of the material can be brought in on the line as it is built. (Railroads frequently haul ballast long distances, whereas the tendancy in building pipelines and roads is to use the most readily available material). This results in tearing up of river beds destroying spawning grounds and silting up the rivers.)

Another area of ecological concern is the damage caused by oil spills in the event of accidents. Accidents will happen whatever the transportation method -- pipelines rupture and leak, trains derail, tankers spill, leak and sink. The Institutes report freely admits that rains will derail. (The trans-Alaska people seem more sure of themselves in print, but their claims are doubted by experts.) They say that using statistics from presently operating North American railways, a derailment severe enough to damage tank cars could occur several times a year.

One ruptured car would spill about twenty thousand gallons of oil. Over land this would localize rapidly, but everything it covers will be killed, and the area will remain an 'ecological desert' for many years. A derailment over a Mackenzie river bridge would be more severe.

The 48-inch pipeline, on the other hand, carries nearly half a million gallons of crude per mile, when a break occurs, a whole section would drain out. With pipeline plans having control valves only every few miles, a break, even if detected and acted upon immediately, could spill millions of gallons of oil. The effects would be the same as that of a tank car breaking up, but spread over a much greater area.

The risk of earthquakes is less in the Mackenzie Valley than in Alaska (especially at the trans-shipping point). It is conceivable that earth motion could damage a pipeline in the middle of rugged wilderness. The rail line, in addition to being further from the quake areas, is more flexible and can stand earth motion with less threat to the environment.

The rail line does not have the problem of tankers breaking up (as is happening with an alarming frequency). Tankers proposed to take the oil from the Trans-Alaska pipeline to the Seattle area carry tens of millions of gallons. Whereas it is unlikely that a tanker would spill all its cargo, it is possible it could happen.

Even small spills can have serious consequences -- a three second spill at Cherry Point Washington this week (one of the terminuses of the tanker route) has caused serious damage to the Washington State and British Columbia shores. Members of parliament Tuesday protested this and strengthened their opposition to the Trans-Alaska system.

Actual construction of the right of way, and purchase of operational equipment is expected to be $2.43 billion, while annual operational costs (at 2 million barrels a day traffic) would be $193. 76 million.

The institute expects that the tariff would be $0.67 per barrel from Prudhoe Bay to a Trout River pipeline terminal. This is calculated figuring one-third use of line capacity for oil only. (This does not include backhaulage, resale value of the line, or benefits of gas pipeline construction from the railway). This cost would be reduced even more if oil traffic is increased, reserves or oil are higher, or if Capital Cost Allowances tax breaks are claimed in a less conservative method.

The rail line costs are seven cents a barrel higher to Edmonton than a pipeline down the same route, (although recent evidence suggests that Arctic pipelines may cost more to build than originally expected. The total cost to move oil to Chicago by the system is estimated to be $1.07, while the Trans-Alaska, tanker, and pipeline route would cost $1.30 per barrel.

Construction of the railroad would create secondary benefits for the Northern economy, perhaps as much as five thousand new jobs, a portion of which would be held by local native populations; Service and tertiary industry, another five or six thousand, while the need for construction and maintenance of the new city at Trout River would create many more thousand jobs.

The railroad could also be expected to spur mineral exploration and employment in the Mackenzie area.

Secondary national economic effects would be even greater,. If half of the materials and eighty per cent of the labour is Canadian, over fifty thousand jobs would be created or sustained during construction and fifteen thousand during operation.

Depending on financing (the institute does not make any recommendations as to who should put up the capitol) impact on the balance of payments would be high.

At the half Canadian, half US figures, Canada would have a negative change of $1.5 billion with the US on trade accounts. If half the capitol is American, Canada would experience a positive change of $1.2 billion on the capitol accounts. During operations, Canada might net $250 million per year on trade accounts with the United States.

The pressure on exchange rates may make these arrangements undesireable, but changes in financing, perhaps a higher per centage from the US, could reduce the pressure. (The Trans-Alaska route might, however, provide a more suitable balance of payments position for the US.)

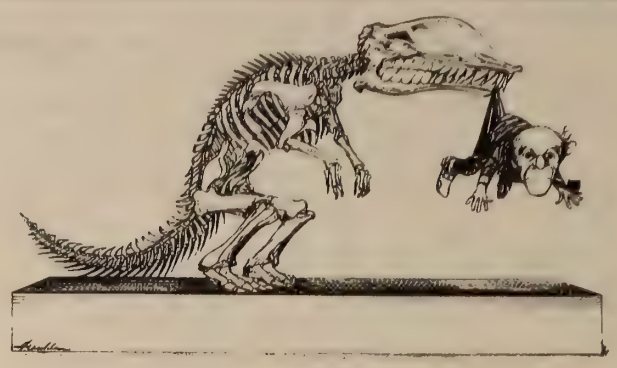
TEL AVIV - Twenty-four persons were killed and more than 70 wounded in a massacre at Tel Aviv's Lod airport last Tuesday. Three Japanese terrorists who had been hired by Palestinian guerillas pulled sub-machine guns and grenades from their luggage immediately after disembarking from an Air France flight from Rome. Israel's premier Golda Meir warned the Arab states that they would be held responsible for the attack, but although Lebanon braced for an attack of some sort, at press time none had occurred.



DETROIT — The Ford Motor Company announced that it will extend its production year for 1972 model cars and trucks and delay the start of production of 1973 models. By then Ford hopes to have limited certification of the new models which would allow them to be shipped to dealers but not sold. A Ford of Canada spokesman indicated that a similar delay would apply to Canadian production. The delays are expected to be one or two weeks.

SALISBURY, Rhodesia. A total of 468 miners were believed to have been killed in an explosion at the Wankie Colliery in Rhodesia Monday night. Rescuers, hampered by smoke and fumes were unable to enter the mine and doubted that there would be any survivors. Most of the men were black.

SAN JOSE, California — Angela Davis was aquitted on all charges of murder, kidnapping and conspiracy after a 13 week trial. The all white jury deliberated for 13 hours, but reports said that there had been no major disagreements among the jurors. Miss Davis was uncertain about her future plans, but she did say that although she had received a number of death threats she wouldn't let them interfere with her work in the "liberation struggle".

WINDSOR — The Duke of Windsor was buried in a quiet ceremony Monday attended by only 13 mourners including the Duchess, his wife and Queen Elizabeth. Earlier a private rather than a state funeral was held in St. George's chapel in Windsor castle. During the weekend tens of thousands of Britons waited in line for several hours to file past the Duke's coffin.

WASHINGTON — At the International Commission for Northwest Atlantic Fisheries meeting on Friday, Canada failed in its bid to have all fishing for Atlantic Salmon immediately banned - the catch will be phased out over the next four years. Canada was successful in proposing quotas for most other species of North Atlantic fish including herring and codfish.

LOS ANGELES — Senator George McGovern swept to a decisive victory in California's democratic primary on Tuesday. Although there are still a number of primaries including New York State left, many observers feel that McGovern has built up an unsurmountable lead in the race against Hubert Humphrey and George Wallace.

SARNIA — A Great Lakes ship sank in the St. Clair River here early Monday morning following a collision with another vessel. About 2,000 gallons of diesel fuel escaped, but the slick was cleaned up before any serious damage occurred. The sunken vessel also contained 49,000 gallons of bunker C oil but so far none of this has escaped.

BRITISH COLUMBIA — About 10,000 gallons of crude oil were spilled into the Strait of Georgia at the Cherry Point, Washington refinery of the Atlantic Richfield Co., causing a slick which has contaminated some southern BC beaches. Although the refinery is 15 miles South of the border, the prevailing currents and tides carried the oil northward to the Canadian beaches. The refinery has been the subject of concern for the last couple of years, and is one of the proposed destination points for tankers carrying oil from the proposed Alaska oil pipeline.

TORONTO — Peter Swann, director of the Royal Ontario Museum in Toronto was fired by the museum's board of Trustees last Thursday, two days before he received an honourary doctor of laws degree from Queen's. The firing culminated a long standing dispute between Swann and the trustees, characterised by his description of them at one point as being "more prehistoric than the dinosaurs". Swann says that he will fight his dismissal, and that the entire board of trustees "will have to go". During his convocation address on Saturday, (see page 2) Swann did not refer to his firing directly but all his references to his work at the museum were in the past tense.

TORONTO — A report on police action in breaking up a demonstration against Soviet Premier Kosygin at the Ontario Science Centre last October says that the decision by Toronto police to ride their horses into the crowd was "unjustified". The report by Judge I. A. Vannini says the police were justified in having the mounted officers present, but that they should not have penetrated the crowd. The report also suggests that the police could have used more officers on foot, that communication organizers were not as good as they should have been, and that excessive force was used in making some of the arrests. Judge Vannini found that with the exception of the Jewish Defense League, the Edmund Burke Society, and a "small number of unidentified youthful demonstrators", the members of the ethnic groups present wanted to demonstrate in a "peaceful, dignified manner". Robert Maksymec, president of the Ukranian-Canadian committee and a vocal critic of the police before the inquiry said his group was "agreeable to the findings".

VANCOUVER — A mob of about 2,000 attempted to crash a concert given here Saturday night by the Rolling Stones. Property damage amounted to several thousand dollars and 31 policemen were injured during the riot. Some 17,000 attended the concert, the first by the Stones since the ill-fated Altamount concert in 1970. The future of the 30 city tour by the group which includes stops in Toronto and Montreal in July was left in doubt by the demonstrations.

TORONTO — Rev. Dr. Max V. Putnam, minister of St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church in Kingston was elected moderator of the Presbyterian Church in Canada on Sunday.

KINGSTON — Inside and Outside workers of Kingston's Public Utilities Commission have voted in favour of strike action if their contract demands are not met. Also on the local labour scene, Kingston carpenters will legally be in a position to strike next Friday, but no decision of possible strike action has been taken.

Rehab summer "stipend" to be abolished

A group of Queen's students are working full-time this summer for $37.50 a week. Their pay next year, for the same work: nothing. They have no choice, for the work is part of their course. And the Ontario government has decided to stop paying for it.

They are Queen's rehab students finishing their second or third (final) year in physical or occupational therapy. After second years, physio students have twelve weeks, occupational students eight weeks, of "clinical practice". The following summer, it's sixteen weeks of internship for both groups.

Most of them take at least part of the clinical practice and internship at hospitals in Kingston. Generally they are paid a "stipend" of $37.50 per week after second year, $50 per week after third year -- a figure recommended by their professional associations and accepted by the Ontario government, which provides the money through the Ontario Hospital Services Commission. Next year, in a government economy move, the money will stop coming. The requirement that students do the clinical practice will continue.

Already the system is hard on students, according to R. P. Walmsley, head of physical therapy at Queen's. "It makes a hardship for our students," he pointed out. "They become ineligible for summer jobs. They've either got to go into debt, or have financial backing from their parents or something."

For $37.50 is enough to live on, and not much more. Says one rehab student who is living on that amount, "It's enough to pay the rent and buy food, and go drinking once a week." But rehab fees will be $663.50 in September, and that has to come from somewhere.

"It seems too bad that they can't pay us a bit more," said one student finishing her second year in physiotherapy, Lynne Thomas. "The physio aides get paid more than we do, and we must know more than they do. They have no theory knowledge."

The $37.50 stipend, Miss Thomas said, "really makes it hard. It's just barely enough to live on. Granted, you have to do the internship -- it's really important, and if we didn't do it we'd be really lacking."

She continued, "Even if they only gave us $50 a week, or $60, it would be a lot better. I don't mind being broke, but after a while it gets ridiculous."

Miss Thomas is spending the first six weeks of her clinical practice at Hotel Dieu Hospital in Kingston, working with "pre- and post-operative breathing exercises, paediatrics and maternity". She described her day: "just regular physio work. During the year you take the theory, and during the summer you put it all to work.

"It's really great -- at the Dieu we did some patient assessments and presented them to the staff. You really do learn a lot, a hell of a lot more than in a classroom."

But clinical practice is a learning experience, not a job, authorities in Toronto stressed. A spokesman for the Canadian Association of Occupational Therapists, one of the two bodies which help set the $37.50 rate, emphasized this: "It's not a payment for services."

She continued, "It's to cover the cost of living. These students are being trained; they're not providing occupational therapy services free."

Again: "This is not a summer job in any way. The staff at these hospitals often go out of their way to fit the students into the programme."

The lucky students are the ones working for government-owned hospitals. This summer occupational therapy students doing clinical practice at Kingston Psychiatric Hospital, for example, are being paid $113 per week. But for the rest, including those at Kingston General Hospital, it's $37.50. The students are working a forty-hour week, making their hourly income 94 cents per hour. The federal minimum wage for comparable jobs is $1.65. Next year's standard: zero.

"I personally am very unhappy about it," commented Dr. D. C. Symington, director of the school of rehab therapy. "I really can't tell you why the government has decided to abolish it, except they're making all kinds of moves to reduce government expenditures.

"It's my intention to protest vigorously and see if we can get it reinstated."

Queen's probably cannot afford to take over paying the students when the government stops, Symington said: "I don't know where they're going to find the money -- I don't see how they could."

In sum, he said, "I feel very upset about this, and we've got to see what we can do about it."

A spokesman for the Canadian Physiotherapy Association said that body would be making representations to the government as well. But, she said, "health costs are spiralling" and "physiotherapists are just a small, little fraction of the people the Ontario government is influencing in this way."

The CPA and the CAO T had recommended that the $37.50 rise to $43.50 next year, and the $50 to $58, she said. But those recommendations are being forgotten.

Queen's rehab students will be protesting as well, according to Rehab Therapy Society president Donna Collins. "I think a lot of kids are going to be writing," she said, and there will be collective action too: "We've been talking over a few ideas, what we might be able to do to get around it." The Alma Mater Society might be asked for help, she said.

"When you're in training you just don't expect to get as much as anybody else," Miss Collins admitted. But she said the financial hardship was real for many students. "The OT's (occupational therapy students) are lucky, because at least we have two months." Physiotherapy students have only a month between the end of their clinical practice and the beginning of classes again, and it's hard to get a job for only a month.

Miss Collins is doing clinical practice in occupational therapy at Kingston Psychiatric Hospital, "just being put into the situations we're going to be encountering when we get out" into full-time practice.

Work really is involved, she said. "Sometimes when you're interning, you're just observing. But in this case here, we're doing the job, we're taking on the responsibilities. But we don't have as big a patient load -- and we don't get paid."

As a result, she said, rehab students depend more than others on government aid, bank loans, and their parents to finance their education.

Miss Collins described her work at KPH: "You do everything from treatment to assisting people before they go out into the real world -- talking to people, discussing with them their problems, working out their frustrations." Her patients might be "suicides, depressives, schizophrenics, psychotics, everything."

A third rehab student, occupational therapy student Marte Cole, agreed when describing her clinical practice at Kingston General Hospital: "You do learn things, but there's a lot of work as well.

"We do have some lectures, but they're staff lectures that the whole staff is invited to, and they're weekly, not daily." Rather, she said, the students spend most of their time doing actual therapy.

The abolition of the summer stipend will hit rehab students hard, she said, because they will still be expected to travel to their summer jobs, pay their living expenses there -- and pay their fees when they come back to Queen's in the fall.

"That's a big crisis for us, because most of us can't afford to go through four months without any money."

Staff member is sued

Dr. R. L. Clow, a gynaecologist at Kingston's two major hospitals and a member of the medical staff at Queen's, is the defendant in a malpractice suit now before the Supreme Court of Ontario at Ottawa.

Evidence was completed Friday in the case and a decision is not expected until late in July.

The case concerns an operation which Clow performed in 1965 on Mrs. Pauline Karderas of Sorel, Quebec, at Hotel Dieu Hospital in Kingston. She and her husband brought suit against Clow and HDH after a gauze compress was allegedly found in her abdomen during subsequent surgery.

Testimony in the case indicated Mrs. Karderas' medical problem was the formation of scar tissue, but witnesses could not say what operation might have caused the tissue; she has had surgery several times. One witness said the presence of a foreign body, such as the compress, increases the chances of adhesions forming.

The court was told that sponge counts tallied before and after the operation, but that Clow himself was not present when the operation on Mrs. Karderas was completed.

It was completed by a senior resident who had assisted him earlier in the operation, Dr. A.S. Assimakopolos, Clow stated.

"In the last analysis," Clow said, a surgeon relies on nurses to keep track of sponges and other equipment.

The lawyer for Mrs. Karderas said Friday in court that surgeons in teaching hospitals like HDH should warn their patients that other doctors may be involved in operations. Failure to do so constitutes "an assault", he said. Clow's lawyer told the court that there are many precedents to show that a surgeon is not responsible for some details of an operation, such as routine counts, and he suggested that as a result Clow was not responsible if an error was made.

Clow could not be reached for comment by The Journal this week. However, Dr. J. A. Low, head of the department of obstetrics and gynaecology at Queen's, told The Journal it was unfair and possibly misleading to judge a malpractice case before a verdict is reached.

He said the Clow case was complicated, and involved an operation which occurred before he (Low) came to Kingston. Low stressed that Clow's professional reputation might be damaged even if courts eventually find that whatever went wrong was not his fault.

Library is reorganized

Queen's library departments have been reorganized in an attempt to increase efficiency, a release from the principal's office said Tuesday. Under chief librarian D. A. Redmond, there will be four major groups:

Bibliographic Operations Division, which will order and catalogue books and provide similar services.

Division of Information Services and Collections, which will operate library services that meet the public, look after book collections and help with research projects.

Branch libraries, about fifteen of them.

Faculty libraries: health sciences, education, and law.

The reorganization was largely developed through the efforts of research officer Mike Sinclair, who joined the Douglas Library staff several months ago.

Parking banned

The city has agreed to ban parking on the East side of University Ave. The university requested the ban after periodic prodding by the AMS over the last few years. The ban went into affect Monday, but most motorists don't seem to have noticed although some have received city parking tickets. (It's still cheaper than being towed away by the university.)

EMERGENCY REPORT CENTRE 547-5800

A University Emergency Report Centre has been established and commenced operating on June 5, 1972. The purpose of this centre is to provide a central point where emergency situations on campus can be reported regardless of when they occur.

An emergency is defined as an incident, accident, or otherwise which requires immediate action to prevent loss of life, personal injury, severe personal hardship, or loss or damage to University property or equipment. It is important that the emergency telephone number not be used for normal administrative purposes, otherwise its value will be nullified.

The personnel who man the Emergency Report Centre have been instructed on the action to take in response to emergency calls. It is important that they receive sufficient details of the emergency to enable them to react properly.

The centre will be manned on a continuous basis at telephone number 547-5800.

"May there never be wanting leaders in church or state"

(Following is the text of the address delivered by Dr. A.R.M. Lower, emeritus professor of history at Queen's, on the occasion of his receiving an honorary Doctorate of Laws from Queen's on June 3.)

We are deeply conscious of the honours that you are about to confer upon us. Though I myself have been associated with Queen's for a quarter of a century, I have never had the right to call myself a "Queen's man". Now you are promoting me from ex-paid hand to member of the firm. I shall carry my head higher as a consequence.

To you, Mr. Chancellor, I would like to say a personal word: we are of an age. Not many of our fellows are left. I am delighted to see you still pursuing your active, vigorous course.

Might I be permitted to add that this is an especially happy day for me in that my own son-in-law is among the graduates in Arts.

Degree-granting is an old practice, going back some eight centuries. For most of this long period, it was the scholar who was the recipient of the degree. Today, wealth and opinion have widely extended its range. A few still hold to the view that a degree should be for learning. Many, especially in North America, seem to think that it is the "right" of practically everyone. It could be maintained that degrees, like other things, are valuable in proportion to their rarity. The degree business has not yet achieved absurd lengths in Canada, though given the slop-over of sentimentality from across the line, it may get there yet. As it is, a degree still carries a certain mark of distinction and, indeed, of privilege.

There is little that the average Canadian likes less than privilege, the notion that he cannot have what others can. A common term for privilege is elitism. The elite are the chosen few. As such, they invariably put up Canadian backs.

Our attitudes towards elitism come directly out of our history. Most of our forefathers began humbly. Deep down inside lingers the consciousness of the old class society from which we escaped. The Americans put all this formally into the philosophy of equality upon which they founded their republic. We have never adopted that as an article of faith but our practical attitudes have not differed much from the Americans. Like them we hold privilege in aversion. We do not find elitism a pleasant word. Yet a moment's reflection shows that we accept many kinds of privilege. Take the Golden Gaels for example:- a highly selected group of young men of considerable privilege. (I wonder that the modern woman accepts the degrading inferiority imposed upon her by her exclusion from this select coterie.) Or take medicine:- you don't call someone in from off the street to take out your appendix - though the Wright Commission seems to be recommending a move in that direction! Think of the enormous privilege conferred by a degree in medicine.

There are many forms of elitism: military and political elitism, social elitism--a particulary hated kind. Or aesthetic: relatively few are capable of appreciating symphonic music, yet halls are provided for it to be heard in. This high degree of selection runs through all the arts, not only music.

Then there is intellectual elitism, the kind that we are honouring here. Yet the student whose abilities take him too far beyond his fellows risks his popularity. Honours courses too are perpetually under attack by those who label them "undemocratic" or otherwise show their dislike for persons of more than average capacity. Curiously enough, however, no society more readily accepts the "expert" than our own.

I submit, nevertheless, that we have gone overboard for the equalitarian society. We have tried to make of equality an ultimate principle. In some areas of educational theorizing this seems painfully obvious. Many aspects of educational direction in the United States unfortunately long ago fell into the hands of people whose intellectual and philosophical equipment was often second rate, and it became permeated by the urge of many of our American neighbours to sentimentalize upon life. We Canadians slavishly imitated American example, as we invariably do. No competition, for instance: competition regarded as wicked. As if there were no competition in life! Let the young do as they like, when they like. Excessive individualism joined to a shallow philosophy, has been a leading agent in giving us our present permissive society. It should be plain that the permissive society is a society on the verge of anarchy.

You will be thinking that the old fogey on the platform is a rock-ribbed reactionary, who would like to go back to the tyrannous past and rob us bright young people of our bright future. Yet some knowledge of the course we have come over--history, that is--enables old fogeys to see reasonably clearly that one point in time - in our case, the present - is not necessarily the apex and summation of wisdom. And don't forget two things that come hard for youth to accept: One, that we all stand on other men's shoulders and, Two, that men being men, there will not be a new heaven and a new earth tomorrow morning. Further, don't forget that an anarchic society will not work. Some order there must be.

But what is order to be based on?

Order must be based on values. What values? you immediately ask. I wish I could give you a simple answer.

We have spent most of the last thirty years or so smashing up our traditional values. Is it rude of me to ask how many of you young people have any values at all? There is still plenty of traditionalism left, but traditionalism alone is not enough. It must be backed by something alive, a belief;- a faith, if you like, though not necessarily a formal religious faith. But how many of you believe, in a vital creative way, anything at all?

The educational pseudo-philosophy which has been interjected into our society under such words as permissiveness has had a major share in destroying our values and without giving us anything of account in their place.

I therefore ask you, what do you believe in?

Next, I ask you if you are against elitism. "Of course I am", you say, "I am a democrat". Yes, of course. But just wait a moment. You are against elitism, are you? Then what are you doing sitting there, waiting to receive a degree, a distinguishing mark? What proportion of the people of Canada of your age is receiving a degree today, may I ask? Do you know what giving you a degree involves? Take it on the money basis alone:- You, or more probably your parents, pay your fees. But the rest of us, all of us here in Canada, contribute something like $2500.00 per year for each and every one of you. If you were medical students, that figure would be up around twelve or thirteen thousand per year. We don't give you all this money just because we love you. We give it to you because we think that you, picked out of many thousand others, are worth it.

Is that elitism?

I ask you, what does a university degree represent if it does not represent elitism?

And then, right on the heels of that query, comes another: What is to constitute the right of entry into this elite which you are?

There are the formal qualifications, courses and examinations. I hold to both, for you surely have been here to get some "structured" knowledge. The amount that most of you have got will not overburden you. A degree, however, goes beyond mere knowledge. Put it this way:- each one of you costs us - society - a good deal more than an expensive car. The question is, how much mileage do we, society, get out of you? Human beings are not cars. The car derives no satisfaction from being a car. The human derives his major satisfaction simply from being a human being. The graduate, in particular, goes through life on a fairly smooth road. He has, moreover, two things that literally 'money cannot buy': content in his work and, bigger than that, the inner satisfaction that comes from his own mental contents and his ability to use and expand them. Many other people, of course, have this same satisfaction, but surely a good education enhances your chances of having it. Test this by asking yourselves a simple question: who would, if he could, abandon what he has got here at Queen's, something towards a liberal education?

From what I have just said, you might think that I disapprove of the expenditures that society makes upon you and of the process by which it selects a chosen few. I do not - but on one condition; namely, that society gets its money's worth. How? That is up to you.

Not only do I think that the elitism you represent is justifiable. I go further: an elite, or various elites, society must have. "May there never be wanting leaders in church and state", runs the Anglican prayer. An excellent, an imperative aspiration! That's your justification. That's the justification for universities creating a chosen few. Whatever Queen's has managed to give you, or wake up in you, that is not your own private possession. It is yours only as you pass it on to your fellows.

Competitive track is a strange world, one of the ... remaining refuges for the ultimate individual

To enter requires a willingness to push both mind and body well beyond normal limits, into a hazy zone of self-inflicted pain. No one can force this kind of effort; you have to see the worth in it yourself. The final result is an intensely personal thing, an emotional rather than physical sensation. There is little else to say.

AMS vice-president explains fee rise policy

..(Editors' note: This letter, from AMS vice-president Wally Palmer, went out this week to members of the AMS outer council and other people on the AMS mailing list.)

There has been some criticism of the AMS response, or perhaps more correctly lack of response, to the tuition fee increases announced by the Provincial Government last March 28. We felt that a token letter to Bill Davis or George Kerr would be of no worth whatever. The alternative of active demonstration was not in the best interests of the students because of the academically cirtical time of year and the fact that demonstrations tend to strengthen the image of students as spoiled brats and then destroy what little public sympathy we may have.

In the 1972-73 budgetary estimate for the Ministry of Colleges and Universities $687,248,000.00 is set aside for the post-secondary education support program. This amount is nearly seven times the entire budget of the Ministry of the Environment and is in fact 10 percent of the total provincial budget. Thus, it is hardly surprising that we find that a Government that is faced with tight money (budgeting one-half million dollars "in the red") is looking at this sum with hungry eyes.

In addition, the current Federal-Provincial cost-sharing agreement by which the Federal Government pays 50 percent of the operating costs of all provincial post-secondary educational institutions is currently under renegotiation. Civil servants from both levels of government have been meeting for months to pave the way for the formal negotiation between the Council of Provincial Education Minister and the Federal Government which will commence in January, 1973. There is every liklihood that the Federal Government will also attempt to decrease its support, further burdening individual students.

The factors combine to present a foreboding outlook when we consider the fact that the great myth about post-secondary education as critical for producing people to fill vacant jobs has been so thouroughly destroyed that the general public questions any level of support, let alone increased support for post-secondary education. The current political mood and public feeling will easily allow and even encourage the government to increase tuition fees and decrease student aid.

Our concern arises from this realization that the recent government actions are only the beginning in a major attempt to shift the burden of payment from the public sector to the individual.

But what have we been doing about all this? At the National Students Conference in Windsor last month, Frank McIntyre from the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (O.I.S.E.) and myself started a pool of funds for research on financing post-secondary education. If we are to protect our interests, we must provide reasoned and rational alternatives which are fully researched and developed, and it is for this purpose that we created the fund. We informally discussed the issue with other universities and to date have raised almost $1,000.00. Out of the Windsor Conference a National Finance Committee was established which is to direct the research and other activities over the summer.

This past weekend there was an Ontario Federation of Students conference in Guelph at which further planning and discussion took place with regards to the financing policy which we will follow. Again the need for increased research was recognized and efforts and finances will be combined with those of the national committee to better assure the attainment of a solid alternative.

Finally a conference on financing is being organized at O.I.S.E. in Toronto for July 14-16 at which, hopefully, a final position will be determined.

Greg and I feel that, given the inflationary nature of our economy, it is reasonable that tuition fees be increased. However we are opposed to arbitrary, across the board increases which are not part of an overall policy which includes a comprehensive loan plan to insure accessibility to higher education for all. We also believe that tuition fees should be more reflective of the actual costs of educating students in the different disciplines and the returns realized by the students on graduation.

The recent $100.00 increase in tuition fees, while regrettable is an accomplished fact. Our objective now must be to influence any future changes in the funding structure of universities and student aid program so that our interests are protected. This will be one of our major priorities in the coming year.

Yours sincerely,
Wally

TO: A.M.S. Inner Council
FROM: Victoria Kemsley

As A.M.S. is the funding agent of T.A.K. it is only fair that you receive a brief report of T.A.K.'s progress to date.

To date, T.A.K. is booming forward at the rate both my partner and I predicted in February. It was our feeling at that time that T.A.K. needed two or even three full time, paid, (damn those fee increases anyway) members to work in the summer. Our work has been described multi times to you so I need not go into it again. We applied to the appropriate resources for funds. Scott and I agreed that if worse came to worse we would take jobs here anyway and work on this in our spare time. We weren't too thrilled with that plan, as we thought that the job would not be done as efficiently, thoroughly, productively, or as quickly and it would mean a full schedule in the summer. As the "appropriate resources" didn't produce, we arrive as we are now. I work at two jobs, for a total of fifty hours-week. Scott works 11 p.m. - 7 a.m. six day-week. Needless to say, neither one of us have time on our hands.

It is difficult for us to maintain our enthusiasm. We run into the office every once in awhile. All we have done is written a letter, organized our files and agreed on the summer schedule. Our enthusiasm is dampened by the fact that we share an office (room) with the inner council, pub personnel and assorted extras. We have one drawer in a file cabinet. We have neither our own phone or address to send out. It is difficult to convince people that we are a legitimate group without them. They don't believe that we exist. (but why should they? The people in the office don't even know we're here). And dammit, I had to twist Greg's arm for a set of keys - that we need because we can never get in during office hours.

We appreciate this is the best you could do and were trying to save A.M.S. money.

What all the above was about is that although our appearances here seem infrequent, we are doing our best. We appreciate the A.M.S. sanction of our project (distant as it may be). We have to scrap for everything we get on all levels, with all sorts of people. It would be nice if we could rely on the A.M.S. for some kind of support.

I feel relations between the A.M.S. and T.A.K. are not what they could be. Because our relations have always been strictly on a "we want money - we want to give you less" level, we don't understand the other's motives. Therefore both Scott and I would like to extend an open invitation to phone or drop in anytime. We'd be glad to hear from you.

-So until you catch one of us in the office - or we organize our volunteers I remain

Yours very truly,
Victoria Kemsley

Shaw had his problems

by Sandy Naiman

George Bernard Shaw's weakness as a dramatist is his wit, for in Misalliance, one of this year's Shaw Festival productions, which previewed last weekend at the Grand Theatre, he could not supply a plot intricate enough to support his intricasies of thought.

Shaw appropriately prefaces his play with a short note in which he refers to it as a debate, and a long one too, and this wordiness, verbosity and his long stretches of uninterrupted dialogue on the topics of the generation gap, marriage and society are lamely strung together with a series of rather non theatrical plot manipulations which give the actor very little scope for entertaining the audience.

In the area of entertainment, however, the Shaw Festival players have done an admirable job of drawing out every particle of farcical, even burlesque activity and the audience is kept not just merely amused, but in places, close to hysteria.

The principle characters are generally all very well portrayed, particularly Ronald Drake, as the warm hearted patriarch of the wealthy middle class Tarleton family and Wenna Shaw as his semi liberated daughter, Hypatia. Both are energetic and charming on stage. Curiously enough, the smaller roles stole the show, Heath Lamberts, as The Man, was delightful as he voiced the sentiments of the forgotten "little" man, the clerk in British society, as he swigged Sloe Gin and got more and more intoxicated. Angela Wood's portrayal of the man-woman, Lina Szczepanowska, who literally flys in from the sky to turn the Tarleton household topsy turvy, if overplayed and even annoying at times, is no less powerful on a stage, prettified by Maurice Strike's elaborate Victorian design.

All the actors are incredibly disciplined in being able to overcome the shortcomings of Shaw's script, his interminably long speeches, his rather outdated ideologies, which seem tame in the light of the publicity Women's Liberation receives. The stage is a constant arena of movement and beauty, abetted by Hilary Corbett's costumes and a series of freezes at the end and the beginning of each act.

The entire production vibrates with vivacity and activity, and Tom Kneebone's rather overdone but farcical portrayal of Bentley Summerhays, the spoiled boy-man, prone to temper tantrums and verbal insult, best epitomizes this energy. Noel Howlett, as his father, Lord Summerhays, although inaudible at times, lent an aura of dignity and integrity to his role, as the December lover of Hypatia, and James Valentine, as her mercenary fiance is, in his own, bitter-sweet way, charming as well.

And finally, Betty Leighton, as Mrs. Tarleton, the ever proper matriarch, is warm and compassionate.

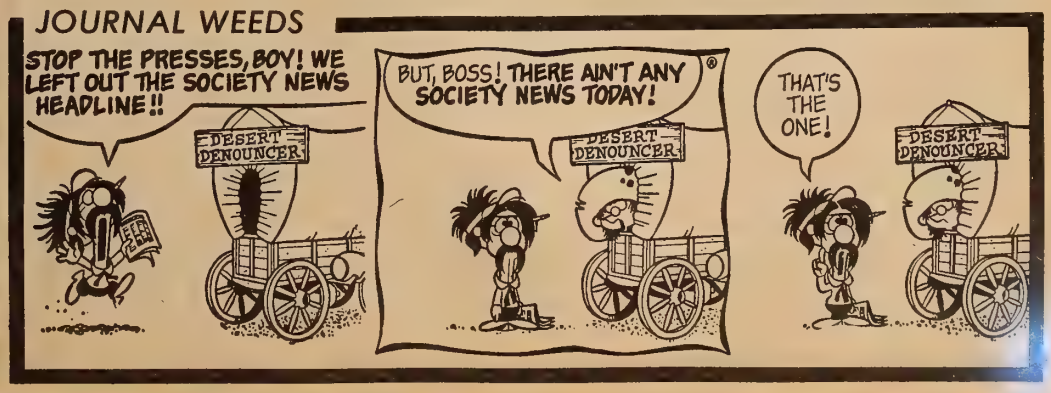
Unfortunately the play is the faulty aspect of the production. Shaw's podium, the stage, is not always suited to his satire. In the case of Misalliance, a closet would be a more appropriate location for his rather benign social philosophies, for therein they can be mulled and thought over, without theatrical interruption. What in 1909 was revolutionary and extreme, today is passe and tepid. Perhaps, then, Shavian philosophy of this ilk should be put back on the library shelves, and out of reach of producers and directors. That is not to say, however, that all Shaw's plays deserve the same demise. Some, which do not bespeak, so didactically, his philosophies should remain stage pieces, for at his best, which Misalliance is not, he is a good dramatist AND satirist AND wit.

These reservations did not infect the opening night audience of the Grand. The gala atmosphere and the beauty of what moved before them, both intrigued and delighted a close to capacity crowd.

Furthermore, the professionalism and polish of the Shaw Festival, is a treat for Kingston, and indeed any city. The company is trained, precisely to play Shavian material and in so doing, is able to meet out the best that any script has to offer.

DOWNCHILD

Toronto bar audiences are a weird lot. They don't encourage good musicians; they don't even want to hear them. The average bar audience wants a band they can ignore or listen to between hockey periods. I've even heard a musician himself ask a hockey score while he was playing a set. How far into your music can you get.



So, in an otherwise dreary scene, it was a refreshing change to hear the Down Child Blues Band. They were exactly what I wanted to hear -- balls, not a bubble machine. Not heavy, their easy-going manner sets up a casual rapport with the audience, making a large tavern seem smaller and more down to home.

Don Walsh, leader of the band, plays an inventive lyrical guitar that builds and spreads. From within Rick Walsh's massive frame comes a solid gutsy voice adding power to the band; and Jim Milne puts out a good heavy bottom with his bass. Dave Woodward's sax is both energetic and easy on the mind and drummer Chuck Wall is solid and tight.

Down Child plays numbers from all the old blues masters creating a familiar atmosphere. They do a nice boogie by John Lee Hooker and songs like 'Got my Mojo Working,' by Muddy Waters and 'Black Knight is Falling'. Down Child will be playing at the Queen's Pub tonite and tomorrow from eight to midnight.

Canada: Cold weather hits, endangers western Ontario crops

LONDON, Ontario -- Record low temperatures hit across Ontario during the weekend, but struck Oxford County most seriously; up to 100 per cent of the tobacco crop in some areas was destroyed by frost. Other crops including tomatoes, beans, peas, cucumbers and melons were somewhat affected. Early this week farmers were still evaluating the extent of the damage to Ontario's $131-million annual tobacco industry and looking for replacement plants or other ways to use the fields this year.

KINGSTON -- There are ten applicants to bring cable television and FM radio to Kingston. The Canadian Radio and Television Commission will hold hearings on the question here next week

KINGSTON -- At the urging of mayor E. Valorie Swain, developer William Teron will meet with the Royal Canadian Horse Artillery Brigade Association in an attempt to revive his waterfront development, which has been endangered by lack of agreement on the conditions of purchase for some RCHA land.

TORONTO -- The Ontario Hydroelectric Council has not met since October 15, 1954, premier William Davis has told the Legislature. He said it appears the council "really wasn't serving any useful purpose" though it has never been abolished.

OTTAWA -- The House of Commons is a "mental hospital operated by its own inmates", former prime minister John Diefenbaker said on the weekend, complaining about procedural wrangles which halted business late last week. He called last Thursday "a disgrace in every sense of the word" and added that procedural changes have emasculated the House. Diefenbaker has served in the Commons since 1940, longer than any other MP.

TRENTON -- A member of the Canadian Forces précision flying team, The Snowbirds, plunged to his death before 15,000 spectators here Saturday after the wing of his plane clipped that of a teammate during a display of jet manoeuvres.

STRATFORD -- The Stratford Shakespearean Festival opened last week; King Lear was reviewed favourably and As You Like It unevenly. The Globe and Mail said Lorenzaccio was a great challenge and a great achievement by artistic director Jean Gascon.

REGINA -- Saskatchewan will have a new and unique system of community colleges, the education minister announced last week.

NIAGARA FALLS -- Sponsors who welsh on their Miles for Millions pledges may be sued, the area March chairman said Thursday. He said he would sue "one teen-ager and one adult" chosen at random from those who pledged $10 or more for the charity march and then did not pay it.

KITCHENER -- Violence continued at the Dare Foods Ltd. cookie and candy plant here; strikers threw stones and bottles, broke windows, tossed Molotov cocktails and scuffled with police. There were six arrests. Shipments by strike-breaking Canadian Driver Pools Ltd. were suspended in mid-week when the violence grew worse.

The World: More hijackings

WEIDEN, West Germany -- An airline pilot was shot to death at the controls of his Czechoslovak airliner Friday when he refused two hijackers' orders to fly them to Germany. The copilot brought the plane down safely. Two men who ran from the plane when it touched down were arrested and charged as the ringleaders, but police said about ten of the fifteen passengers on the plane were involved in the hijacking, the first in which a death has ever occurred.

Meanwhile, in London, international airline pilots voted to refuse to fly to nations which harbour hijackers. And they warned that if the United Nations does not take effective measures against air piracy before June 19 there will be a worldwide stoppage of air service. The United States Air Line Pilots Association had already voted an instant boycott of nations which harbour air criminals. Both federations asked for cooperation from workers who service aircraft around the world.

RAPID CITY, South Dakota -- Burial began Monday for about 200 people killed by floods Friday and Saturday when Rapid Creek erupted through the city. Authorities continued to search for the dead. At least 400 people were still missing Tuesday and 3000 were homeless; parts of South Dakota had been declared a disaster area.

WASHINGTON -- Senator Edmund Muskie has admitted that Senator George McGovern probably will win the presidential nomination of the Democratic Party, but has so far refused to withdraw his candidacy and support McGovern. Muskie's delegate support would virtually assure McGovern of nomination at next month's convention in Miami Beach.

WASHINGTON -- General John D Lavelle was transferred and demoted this spring after three months of bombing attacks on military targets in North Viet Nam which he ordered without higher authority and reported as protective reaction strikes. As head of the Seventh Air Force, Lavelle ordered the raids beginning in early January, official sources said. Stepped-up bombing began in April at the orders of U.S. president Richard Nixon.

STOCKHOLM -- The United Nations environment conference continued this week, and Canadian delegates led in producing a compromise solution to an argument about compensation for countries which suffer trade losses as a result of environmental standards.

TRANG BANG, South Viet Nam -- An Allied plane mistakenly dropped flaming napalm on South Vietnamese troops and civilians here Thursday. "This is terrible, the worst I've ever seen," said Sergeant Nguyen Van Hai.

WASHINGTON -- The United States Senate has confirmed the nominations of Richard G. Kleindienst, conservative Arizona lawyer, as attorney-general, and George P. Shultz as secretary of the treasury, succeeding John Connally, a Democrat but once thought to be the number two man in the administration. Shultz's confirmation was unanimous; the vote on Kleindienst was 64-19 amid political bickering.

WANKIE, Rhodesia -- A coal mine exploded last week trapping and apparently killing 417 miners, most of them black.

BEIRUT -- The world's first testicle transplant was carried out here successfully recently; the recipient has since become sexually active, said the urologist who performed the operation.

letter

Dear Editors:

I am interested in finding students who will take people from the Bawden rehabilitation wing of the Kingston General Hospital for short walks in the early evening.

Students who have been hospital inmates realize the frustration of looking out a ward window at a green and breezy world, and being physically unable to manoeuvre themselves or their wheelchairs across the hills and valleys of the front lawn -- of being unable to cope with stairs and curbs and King Street traffic alone! For the long-term patient this feeling isn't frustration so much as despair. For the patient without access to the window, it takes about twenty-four hours of hospital life to forget that anything other than illness and anxiety exist.

Fresh air, sunshine, and someone who shows an interest in you are good medicine. Do you remember how great it felt to re-enter the world after spending a day in the fourth stack?

I have in mind a program of a few people taking patients out from 6 to 7:30 p.m. on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday nights. People who agree that this is a good idea can get in touch with me through the Hospital Volunteer Bureau, 547-3353.

Agnes loses director

Ralph Allen, director of the Agnes Etherington Art Centre at Queen's through its period of greatest growth, will give up that position this summer, The Journal has learned.

Allen will take a post as resident artist at Queen's. Official announcement of the change has been delayed pending agreement from all the concerned parties about the exact terms of the appointment, including his relation with the art centre, the faculty of arts and science, and the department of art history.

He has done some campus art work, particularly design for publications, before the arrival of graphic design director Peter Dorn, who came to Queen's last fall.

A committee is undertaking preliminary consideration of the problem of finding a successor to Allen as director of Agnes.

Buffeteria, but no big pub

FIRST UNIVERSITY CENTRE PLANS GIVEN

A draft report dated May 25 gives the first concrete idea of what the new university centre is likely to contain, if a representative committee gets its way and doesn't change its mind before the building is started two or three years from now.

The highlights: a bookstore, food services including a "buffeteria" and pub, outside terraces, a bank, a drugstore, billiards and table tennis, offices including the Alumni Association, and lots of lounges, informal areas, and "crush space".

Left out, on the other hand: the health service, the counselling service and other inhabitants of 165 University, the housing service, the padre (he "does not wish to re-locate"), a big area for pub dances, and the development-information-public-relations complex of offices.

The site of the building is defined; to nobody's surprise, it is the block west of the Union and north of Dunning Hall, running up to Earl Street and west to Alfred. But there is no discussion of when building might start or end.

Other matters, discussed at length in earlier planning reports, are ignored as well: parking is one, and another is the housing tower which, it was suggested earlier, could be attached to the centre. But these omissions reflect the direction of the committee which wrote the present report -- the university centre users' committee, chaired by Dr. R.D. Norman of the math department.

Leading student representative on the body, and one of the sparkplugs in planning the new university centre, is Sue Dowler of Artsci 74.

Tension continues, though it is reflected only slightly in the report, over the advantages of building a major university centre building when the future enrollment and orientation of the university is uncertain. Some participants have strongly favoured decentralization, which the draft report does mention as "essential" in terms of "sub-centres" around campus. Others have simply suggested that the university wait and see. But the planning committee's report, now presented for comment from the university community, concentrates on one major building and the facilities it might contain.

Under "Services", the report lists an information desk, a ticket office (to be coordinated with the division of concerts), the bookstore, the career planning and placement service, an office for clergymen (other than the university chaplain), and the AMS printing, typing and duplicating services.

Food services are also discussed -- the "main food service" with a capacity of 700 to 800 people in "a number of interconnecting rooms" capable of housing the pub, Bitter Grounds coffee house,, a coffee shop and so on; meeting rooms with food service; the "buffeteria" during rush periods; outside terraces suitable for use as sidewalk cafes; and something the present Union lacks, vending machines as appropriate.

The Student Health Service and the housing service will do better to stay where they are, the report says, and the 165 University complex of student affairs offices "is very happy" with its present home. "Relocation in the University Centre did not meet with much enthusiasm."

Commercial services in the centre should include a bank ("high priority") and a drugstore, the report declares. Other recommendations are for a dry cleaning service and laundromat, a barber shop -- possibly replacing the Campus Barber Shop on Alfred Street, which will be displaced when the building goes up -- and a sports shop. One "not recommended for inclusion" is a boutique and gift shop -- because, the report says, it would conflict with the full operation of a comprehensive bookstore and drugstore as suggested earlier.

Recreational facilities, the report says, should include billiards (twelve tables), table tennis, and games area of 1000 square feet "to be integrated with lounge areas" for quiet games. Expense rules out a bowling alley, the report continues, and curling is also expensive, although "it might be desirable to investigate the possibility of purchasing the Kingston Curling Club premises on Clergy Street". A sauna bath, which has been suggested, would be more suitable in the phys ed centre when it is next renovated, the report says.

Lounge areas are discussed at some length: "The concept of small, open lounges along corridors is strongly favoured. These areas would be natural conversation spots." Music listening rooms, reading rooms, a small television lounge and other specialized lounges are listed as possibilities.

Finally, the report discusses organizations: clubs need mailboxes, filing space and occasional meeting rooms, it says, but the major groups needing permanent office are the AMS (student government) and its adjuncts, including The Queen's Journal; the faculty association; the international centre, which presently has "poorly designed" and inaccessible space; and the alumni association.

(The Journal has learned that some committee members dissent strongly from the idea of putting the Alumni Association's offices in the centre, since most of their operation is a filing and mailroom business far removed from student-faculty activity. However, the $1 million alumni investment in the building apparently is a strong argument.)

A brief paragraph dismisses the need of the public relations department or the vice-principal (development and information) to be in a university centre.

At the end of the report, re-emphasis is placed on sub-centres, notably the recreational areas of the arts-social sciences complex, and possibly a redesigned Ontario Hall for fine arts departments.

It also emphasizes that much of the square footage involved in the project -- hence, some of the facilities listed -- may be in the present Students' Memorial Union after suitable renovations, not in a new building across the street. And, as a final note, "we wish to see some thought given to locating other functions (for which an informal setting is useful) in houses on the proposed site."

DOMINION DAY (pause)

There will be no issue of The Journal next week; you might say it's our way of observing Doninion Day, but actually we're marking the pause between Intersession and Summer School. Next issue of The Journal will be Thursday, July 6.

Since Dominion Day is a Saturday, Queen's will be observing it by closing university offices Friday, June 30. The phsy ed centre will close Friday; the library, both Friday and Saturday, June 30 and July 1. Federal and provincial government offices, banks, and many businesses will take the holiday Monday, July 3.

Summer school classes start Monday, July 3.

Conventioners say it with flowers

"If all people in the world were gardeners, there would be no wars," said a speaker at a convention last week which made it seem that all people on the Queen's campus, at any rate, were gardeners. The Ontario Horticultural Association held its annual convention here, headquartered in Victoria Hall.

The speaker who made that comment was association president Philip F. Dodds, who commended Ontario horticultural groups for their efforts to "make the world a bit better and more beautiful".

He shared the podium, during the three-day meeting, with North Grey area conservation manager Malcolm Kirk, who told the delegates rural roadsides are almost the only naturally landscaped areas left for Ontarions to see. He called for a change in the provincial ruling that roads must be 22 feet wide -- meaning that up to 100 feet of land must sometimes be cleared, he claimed. Kirk said that many roads which are scenic and not heavily used do not need to be particularly straight or flat.

Many people are "esthetically illiterate", Kirk said, and must be educated about nature by concerned groups such as the OHA. He spoke out against billboards, litter and junkyards as causes of rural decay. Though some action has been taken by the government and by Ontario Hydro, real action will only come from public pressure, Kirk said.

OHA delegates visited the Queen's greenhouses and biology department herbarium in Earl Hall during their visit; the convention also included a concert at Grant Hall and a banquet in Leonard Hall cafeteria. A flower show set up in Victoria Hall for the first day of the conference included pottery displays and examples of the use of floral arrangements in millinery, art and many other contexts.

Geology, local government get new heads

Queen's has announced a new department head -- for geology -- and a new director for the institute of local government.

Director of the institute, effective July 1, will be T.J. Plunkett of Montreal, a nationally-known municipal consultant, former city manager, and research director for the Canadian Federation of Municipalities.

Plunkett has organized and participated in a number of government urban studies; he is author of Urban Canada and Its Government and of a number of articles about municipal government.

In the announcement of Plunkett's appointment, a university spokesman quoted principal Dr. John J. Deutsch as saying that the institute of local government has been redefined with a four-fold emphasis, "as a centre of research, education and publication with respect to urban local government". Its programmes are to include continuing education for people invloved in local government; research and publication "with emphasis on an interdisciplinary approach"; instruction in relevant departments of the university; and counselling students interested in going into urban government.

The institute, founded at Queen's in 1944, has been headed since 1970 by Dr. Stewart Fyfe, who remains on the Queen's staff and is also chairman of the planning board for the city of Kingston. Fyfe was one mover behind the establishment in 1969 of the school or urban and regional planning at Queen's.

The other appointment announced last week was of Dr. Raymond A. Price to be head of the department of geological sciences; the appointment is retroactive to last month. Price has been at Queen's since 1968, and was previously a researcher for the Geological Survey of Canada. He has published some 40 papers, reports and geological maps, and his current research interests are in geotectonics and rock deformation.

He is involved in many professional associations and committees, and is associate editor of the Canadian Journal of Earth Sciences. Price is also a Fellow of the Royal Society of Canada.

Announced together with those two major appointments was the reappointment of C.H.R. Campling as head of the department of electrical engineering. He has been a professor at Queen's since 1955 and department head since 1967.

MPP proposes to outlaw essay sales

A Conservative MPP last week introduced in the Ontario legislature a bill that would require professional suppliers of student term papers to keep records of what they sell and make those records open to professors and the public.

The bill, introduced by Gordon Walker, would require suppliers of unpublished reference material, which would include prepared essays, to register their names with the government, to keep copies of the material they sell, and to keep records of the names of schools of student buyers. This information would be open to professors. Fines up to $25,000 would back up the requirements.

Under the bill a student could be fined $2000 for giving false information to the supplier -- as well as facing the threat of academic discipline if his university judged that he was cheating.

A spokesman for the Council of Ontario Universities, which has suggested similar measures, said suppliers who did not comply with the law would lose most of their business because they could not advertise openly.

Several firms have been doing so during the past academic year, including Pirate Papers, which has offered essays to Queen's students at rates running up to $50 for a 5,000-word major paper.

A committee of the faculty of arts and science at Queen's considered the question of essay sale earlier in the spring, but no action has been taken yet.

Trustee chairman

J. Douglas Gibson, O.B.E., of Toronto, has been reelected chairman of the board of trustees of Queen's. This makes him -- in theory -- the most powerful man in managing the university.

The board of trustees, which "owns" Queen's, is responsible for its buildings and finances, and must approve all appointments, but generally takes the advice of the senate (faculty and students) and administrators headed by principal Dr. John J. Deutsch.

Gibson, who has been a trustee since 1964, begins his fourth year as chairman.

Reelected vice-chairmen of the board were R.W. Southam and R.D. Armstrong.

Nurses end hospital term

Queen's nursing students wind up their third term this week with memories of hospital wards, post-partum care of new mothers and new babies, and -- in five cases -- of community health care in Moose Factory, Ontario.

The trip to Moose Factory, an island community on James Bay, made up half the third-term experience for a group of nurses at the end of their third year in the Bachelor of Nursing Science programme. After third year, the girls spend seven weeks in nursing practice; they do the same after second year, but this year conditions were less exotic.

Five of the students, accompanied by a member of the school of nursing staff, flew to Moose Factory ("by helicopter, because the ice was just breaking up") and spent four weeks doing medical-surgical work at the general hospital there, as well as helping with community health. Community health is a major emphasis of the first two years of the nursing programme at Queen's; exposure to hospital conditions comes later.

In fact, the students now ending their second year may be doing in-hospital work for the first time, according to nursing dean Miss Jean Hill. For such a student, "It's the first time she really gets to practice in the hospital for consecutive days and for a concentrated time."

In the early years of the four-year B.N.Sc. programme, Miss Hill said, "they're getting acquainted with what the healthy individual is like. Now they're ready for some hospital contacts with sick people."

Accordingly, second-year students spend their mornings at one of Kingston's three medical teaching hospitals and much of their afternoons in classes. Said Judy McCarthy, one such student, "We're just taking basic nursing, and then we go in and do what we've learned, the next morning."

Even with weekly tests and daily classes, the summer third term is more interesting than the winter sessions, Miss McCarthy suggested: "I'm really enjoying it! I like it better than the public health aspect of it -- I feel like I'm actually doing nursing."

Most Queen's nursing graduates will not be ward nurses when they graduate -- or not for long. They will be administrators or nursing teachers, rather: "Next year we take a course in teaching, and it's leading to teaching and administration." Additionally, "They're trying to plug public health quite a bit."

Miss McCarthy, who has spent part of her time nursing in the rehabilitation centre at Kingston General Hospital and is now nursing in a medical ward there, said the students have the same kind of load a nurse would have: "We're each assigned patients -- we have about two each -- and we just go through the regular care."

None of the students get paid, even a token amount, because their term is "a learning experience, pure and simple", Miss Hill said. "Incidentally they are of service to people, but it is essential to them.

"It's bad business when you start getting paid for your own essential learning."

Miss McCarthy, however, suggested that the services provided are substantial: "We could have written our RNA exams after two weeks in the hospital!" (Registered Nursing Assistant status, which comes after a ten-month community college or hospital course, does lead to a paid job.)

"I think we should get something, but it's not too likely," Miss McCarthy concluded.

The lucky nursing students this summer certainly were the ones who went to Moose Factory, she agreed. Half the summer term for third-year students is devoted to medical-surgical nursing, which could easily be taken there.

More such programmes in the Canadian north would be a good thing, Miss Hill stressed. "We ought to look at the Canadian north as the equivalent of CUSO experience."

Even those who did not go north, however, spent half the summer term on medical-surgical work, mostly at Kingston General Hospital. "After the third year you've only had a dab of practice," Miss Hill said. But that changes rapidly.

"We've been working straight shifts," said Rotha Groom, one third-year nursing student, "and taking the same responsibility as the other people on the floor." In addition there are regular classes, she added. "Mostly on the medical-surgical we worked evenings, which was kind of a bummer." Many of the students had weekend shifts as well, Miss Groom added.

The other half of the third-year summer term is maternity and follow-up care, related to the emphasis on maternity care involved in the spring term of the nursing programme's third year. Most students were assigned an expectant mother and worked closely with her through pregnancy, delivery and post-partum care.

"We're still doing follow-through," Miss Groom said. "And we have these ante-partum and post-partum teaching classes.

When the third-year students return in the fall, they will face a year concentrating on paediatrics, psychiatry, and more medical-surgical nursing. More immediately, they face two-month jobs -- mostly in hospitals -- in which to raise the money to live on and pay fees for another year at Queen's.

Queen's asks for share of cable TV

Queen's, in cooperation with the other educational institutions of the Kingston area, wants to have control of an educational channel in the cable television system Kingston will soon be getting.

The Canadian Radio and Television Commission meets here this week to decide on ten applications for the Kingston area franchise. All applicants have promised to include educational programming of some kind.

"Our group feels that any educational channel should be a serious educational channel" said Queen's English professor Dr. George Whalley at a news conference last week representing Queen's, St. Lawrence College, the two boards of education for Frontenac County, and local hospitals and correctional institutions.

"It is important, for instance, that things go on when scheduled and in the proper sequence. We feel our judgment and production facilities are limitless and a company would be ill-advised not to use them."

The group, calling itself Kingston Educational Television, said it would ask the CRTC for several provisions when the cable franchise is granted:

A channel exclusively for educational programming.

A second channel for community programmes "of public and cultural interest".

A third channel, with restricted access, for internal use and staff training. (Dr. George Southall, director of instructional communications in medicine at Queen's, said cable television could play a large role in continuing medical education if it were available.)

Distribution cable drops to educational institutions in the area, including the colleges, the schools, and the hospitals and penal institutions; plus a special system connecting the school boards with Queen's and St. Lawrence.

A press release from KET said the group's members had different possible uses for the purely educational channel, including daytime transmission to Frontenac County schools, much of it provided by the Ontario Educational Communication Authority (including Toronto's Channel 19); extension work from St. Lawrence College; and lunch-hour programming from the Queen's faculty of education for updating teachers' qualifications.

Many other possibilities exist, KET emphasized.

Ross Johnston, media consultant for the Ontario ministry of education, said none of the KET requests were beyond what a responsible cable company would normally provide.

"Actually, OECA programmes are available that would run through the day and evening," Johnston said.

EMERGENCY REPORT CENTRE 547-5800

A University Emergency Report Centre has been established and commenced operating on June 5, 1972. The purpose of this centre is to provide a central point where emergency situations on campus can be reported regardless of when they occur.

An emergency is defined as an incident, accident, or otherwise which requires immediate action to prevent loss of life, personal injury, severe personal hardship, or loss or damage to University property or equipment. It is important that the emergency telephone number not be used for normal administrative purposes, otherwise its value will be nullified.

The personnel who man the Emergency Report Centre have been instructed on the action to take in response to emergency calls. It is important that they receive sufficient details of the emergency to enable them to react properly.

The centre will be manned on a continuous basis at telephone number 547-5800.

Model Queen's UN discusses Rhodesia

Dr. Charles C. Pentland of the department of political studies is acting as secretary-general of the United Nations this week, as delegates discuss the Rhodesia problem of southern Africa -- in Dunning Hall and Grant Hall. The major security council debate was yesterday.

The delegates, however, are high school students from eastern Ontario; about 75 are visiting Queen's for the annual United Nations seminar here. Co-sponsored by the university and the federal government, the conventions, which include lectures and films as well as model sessions, are to spread awareness of how the UN deals with international issues.

Rhodesia was selected as the central topic this year because it has been a major UN issue in recent months. Speakers this week have included a Rhodesian, Kenneth Mufuka, discussing life there; a leading Canadian diplomat; a representative of the UN secretariat; and members of the Queen's staff concerned with African issues.

The students were divided into groups representing a number of UN countries; each group studied its country's position and prepared to defend that position at security council sessions.

The seminar ends today.

The map attached (adapted from The Christian Science Monitor) points out in itself much of the Rhodesian problem. A white-ruled country entirely surrounded by black and hostile nations, Rhodesia is isolated by economic sanctions from most countries around the world, though surreptitious violations of those rules have produced furious protests in the UN and elsewhere. Only South Africa, itself torn by apartheid and beseiged by outside criticism, is friendly toward Rhodesia.

Attitudes in surrounding Zambia, Botswana and elsewhere are bitter; "jackbooted neocolonialist Smith" is one of the milder terms used to describe Rhodesian prime minister Ian Smith, who unilaterally broke off from British rule five years ago. A British commission recently returned to London to report that proposed terms of settlement were overwhelmingly unacceptable to the blacks of Rhodesia, who make up about ninety per cent of its population but have almost no share in its government.

Negotiations, denunciations, and a leaky economic boycott continue.

AMS president reports on fee protests

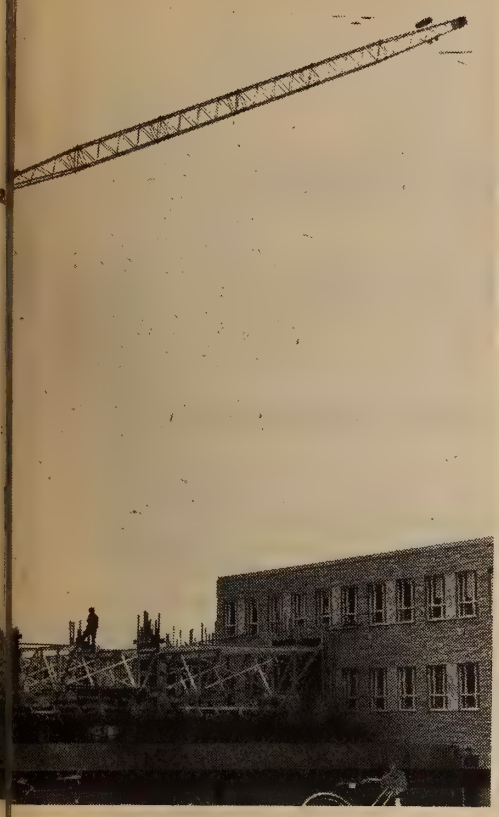
(Following is a letter from AMS president Greg LeBlanc to outer council members and others on the AMS mailing list, describing recent political activities. It is dated June 15.)

Hi Outer Council,

Last Weekend we attended a conference in Guelph of the Ontario Federation of Students and a major topic was the $100. tuition fee increase. There was a lot of talking and shouting, particularly on the part of Ottawa U., about a fee strike in September, about "bandwagon solidarity action" and "our responsibility to co ordinate all the actions against the cutbacks for maximum impact." "Let's show them we're a force to be reckoned with."

So what's the Queen's position? My own feeling is that one would have to be pretty naive to expect that any sort of fee strike is going to get the $100 back. In fact I think some readjustment in tuition fees was due and bound to come. What I don't like about the government's decision is that it seems too arbitrary. In my opinion the whole tuition fee schedule is made up irresponsibly and irrationally ie. if a year in Arts & Science is worth $600 to the student, then a year in Medicine should be worth one heck of a lot more than $725.00. But then, I realize, you get into the whole problem of financing and who benefits and who should pay. Another big problem.

All the member institutions of O.F.S. are to present their respective positions by mid-July. They'll probably decide to organize a boycott on payment of fees - the boycott to take the form of payment of half-fees only in September and that second term fees be withheld in January; and to hold discussions on various campuses on the issue and the tactics to be used. The idea is to adopt a province-wide strategy.



If it's a province-wide strategy to get the $100 back, there's no chance. If it's a province wide strategy to responsibly put forth to the government our position on the whole question of education moneys, then we'd be doing something.

Let me know what you think.

Greg,
A.M.S. President.

Dear Editors:

The newsbrief in the Journal for June 15, regarding the library reorganization, admirably summarizes the announcement of changes to be effective July 1.

The last sentence of the brief, claiming that "the reorganization was largely developed through the efforts" of one individual named, was completely unjustified by the announcement from the Principal's Office. The Journal apparently made no effort to get additional or correct information.

The reorganization, which has been in planning stages for nearly six months, has been a major effort involving the entire senior library staff, numbering some eighteen persons. The Principal's announcement correctly stated that the senior library staff were responsible. Senior University administrative officers, the entire professional staff of the libraries, and group meetings of the entire staff of library departments were also involved.

It should be specifically disclaimed that Mr. Sinclair, the library research officer; was involved to any greater extent in this undertaking than any of the other library administrative staff. The reorganization project was a cooperative effort. The final plans were developed and agreed to by the senior staff group as a whole. The implementation of the reorganization will depend on the hard work of many people.

D. A. Redmond, Chief Librarian.

by Alan Broadbent

Climatically speaking, the summer is a very close time in Kingston. This fact was brought home to me last Monday. Near the end of the day, I felt as if I was wearing a two inch coat of grease.

This is a very odd feeling to have this early in the summer, for it is not usually until the end of the summer, when one has been for a dip in Lake Ontario, that this feeling of being coated is noticeable. And it is a most difficult sensation of which to rid one's self, for it involves taking a shower in warm water, cold water not having the same dissolving powers. Warm water on a hot and humid day is somewhat redundent.

I inquired into this phenomen with my slimy colleagues, and after sifting the evidence and opinions came to the conclusion that closeness is a biological trick of nature designed to maintain an equilibrium in the environment. Without this mechanism, man would prevail drastically over the other animals of the forest and the fishes of the seas.

Take the fishes of the seas, for example. Last weekend, I went fishing up in the Thousand Islands. My friends and I departed from Kingston in the cool of the morning with expectations of returning to our houses with both large and small mouth bass, perch, pike, and other taste delights. Our enthusiasm and energy were boundless.

We stopped the car at a likely fishing spot, with rocky ledges, some weed growth close to shore, and the odd rock which provided suitable shadows for the comfort conscious fish. While putting our rods together, attaching appropriate lures, and making our way to the river side, we stood under the hot sun. The perspiration started to flow, but very slowly.

By the time we reached good fishing spots on the shore, we had become sluggish. The first layer of coating had formed. If we had been moving faster, the perspiration would have run down our bodies in invigorating fashion. But we knew that if we moved quickly, we wouldn't be good fishermen, for everyone knows that they move slowly and that fishing is an exercise in relaxation and patience.

When I had selected my spot, I suddenly spotted one of the largest bass I have ever seen. He must have been two feet long, maybe three, or four even. My plan was to quickly cast out my line and land the lure right in front of him, making him react immediately to this offer of free treats.

However, my sluggishly coated body would not respond to my greedy mind, and by the time the fly landed, the bass had disappeared. This happened many times during the day, and as a result, I missed catching the biggest bass, perch, and pike in the sporting history of the universe.

As I thought on this, in the cool of the evening, I was forced to admit that this was all part of the grand design of nature. Man could quite easily land lures in front of various beasts, and consequently eliminate most of them, but this would mean that man would eventually rule the planet himself, with not even snakes to intimidate him. That would be the signal for man to seriously set about destroying himself through warfare.

This point was again stressed to me by nature the following day. The back lawn of my house looked very shaggy. From the cool confines of my kitchen, I noticed the rather undisciplined growth out back, and decided to take the lawn mower for a spin. Full of vigour, I ventured out to the garden, pulled out the rather old hand-mower, and set about my task.

After the first strip by the rose bush, I started to feel clammy. By the time I reached the back trees, I knew that I was going to suffer heat prostration momentarily. Knowing discretion to be the better part of heat prostration, I returned to the kitchen, poured a glass of beer, and admired the path to the back trees I had cut.

At the same time, I thought of the gift I had made to nature, the gift of life and growth. I had resisted mowing down the young blades of grass in their infancy, and had left them to bigger and better days.

Then, of course, there is the case of my neighbour, who for years has had a gravel and dirt driveway. Each summer, grass and weeds make their appearance all over the driveway, some of the latter growing to three or four feet high. He has to go out and clip them regularly, to make sure that he can find the car each morning.

This year, he decided to blacktop the driveway, primarily so that the weeds couldn't grow. He rented the equipment, prepared everything, but as soon as he got into the heat of the day, he changed his mind. The combination of the sun and the molten tar induced severe closeness, and he knew that the task was impossible.

As I looked out on the weeds happily swaying in the damp summer breeze, I knew that nature had again prevailed. Man had once again returned to his humble place among the creatures and objects of the world. And nature had preserved the effectiveness of her most powerful tool, closeness.

300 years

Old enough for nudity?

by Al Stephen

In the near future, Kingston residents may be treated to the pleasures of viewing nude dancers in their own city. A couple of enterprising gentlemen established such a club in Ottawa last December, and decided to attempt the same in Kingston. The location - the Bodeeshop - at 35 Rideau Street next to the downtown Canadian Tire Store.

The girls choose their own recorded music, and over the course of three or four songs, dance their way out of all their clothes, flashing and black lights effectively highlight the girls' dance and their points of interest. No obscene gestures are permitted, but erotic motions are hard for the girls to avoid, especially when they get 'involved' in their work.

At present, the Chief of Police has not yet granted his approval for the Bodeeshop to open officially. A special performance took place Monday for George Webb and members of the local media, to demonstrate the cleanness of the show. Local residents are pressuring Alderman George Webb to close it down before it gets open, because it isn't needed, and only 'perverts' go to that sort of thing.

The proprietors encountered similar resistance in Ottawa prior to their opening, but 'waited it out'. They hope to do the same here, so that Kingston residents, men and women - normal people - can enjoy an evening of nude dancing with beautiful girls - at the price of a movie admission.

They now have to convince the aldermen of that ward, the police chief, the fire and building inspectors, and the residents of nearby streets that they are fulfilling a worth-while need.

I believe such entertainment ought to be available to the general public. In Ottawa, the show I visited was attended by a variety of people - men and women - all well behaved normal people - definitely not perverts. Personally I find nothing disgusting about a beautiful female body - clothed or nude, and I can't think of many people who would. I don't understand how residents of Rideau Street and that ward can justifiably say such an enterprise will corrupt their way of life when many of the city bootleggers, prostitutes, and after-hour drinking establishments exist in that ward and on that street to corrupt those who wish to be 'led astray'. People flock to the various Kingston establishments to applaud the obscene jokes of a certain performer and to watch the often ugly and distateful topless dancers. What is so wrong with an opportunity to watch beautiful female bodies in motion to music, with no drinking or rowdiness, under police supervised conditions?

Canada: Ontario sets restrictions on foreign - owned companies

TORONTO -- The Ontario government Thursday introduced tough legislation requiring that a majority of the directors of every Ontario corporation be Canadians resident in Canada. The law, which when passed will give corporations until October 1, 1973, to comply, is, according to premier William Davis, "in line with what I believe to be the essentials of sound foreign-investment policy". Davis earlier had criticized the federal government for weakness in this area. The provision does have a loophole, provincial treasurer Darcy McKeough admitted later: many major corporations are incorporated federally or in other provinces and therefore will not be affected by the law. Both Davis and McKeough said this lack of jurisdiction points up the need for strong federal legislation. Federal revenue minister Herb Gray said he found the Ontario law "interesting". It was one of more than 60 sections in an act amending corporation law; another will require company directors to spell out their personal interests in transactions carried out by the company.

TORONTO -- A meeting of the Ontario executive of the New Democratic Party scheduled for Sunday was abruptly cancelled so moderates could continue their search for a compromise with the party's radical Waffle wing.

TORONTO -- Metro Toronto may refuse to take part in a $127 million Ontario government plan to build sewer and water facilities in the Pickering area unless the province approves construction of the Spadina and Scarborough Expressways, metro chairman Albert Campbell said on Friday. The project would involve extension and expansion of Metro's present water works.

Ontario premier William Davis cancelled the Spadina expressway, running south from Highway 401 into the heart of the city, last year; the Scarborough Expressway remains in doubt, though it would run northeast from the end of the Gardener Expressway if completed. Citizens' groups lobbied successfully for cancellation of the Spadina; other lobbies are now demanding its revival.

MONTREAL -- The general council of the Canadian Medical Association took a firm stand Thursday against marijuana and hashish. They are harmful and the public should be advised against using them, the CMA decided. Although the CMA's committee had not yet completed its study of the federal LeDain report, released in May, which urged legalization of marijuana possession, CMA chairman Dr. R.M. Lane said the council agreed with the LeDain view that marijuana use is unwise.

OTTAWA -- Immigration minister Bryce Mackasey was seriously angry when television reporters interviewed him about the case of Alicia Wiercioch, who committed suicide in Toronto last week when told she faced deportation to Poland. Mackasey apologized to the House of Commons for earlier statements, which he said had misled the public because of misinformation his staff had provided. Later he severely criticized "reactionary officials" in his department "who fail to understand that their role is to carry out that policy".

QUEBEC -- Delgates to the convention of the Confederation of National Trade Unions have voted, 894 to 239, to embark on greater political action throughout Quebec. The resolution passed avoided mentioning premier Robert Bourassa's Liberal government, which CNTU president Marcel Pepin earlier said must be "crushed".

KINGSTON -- Alderman George Webb says the residents of St. Lawrence Ward are outraged by the opening of The Bodeeshop, a nude dancing establishment, at Rideau and Ordnance streets in Kingston. The night spot opened this week after temporary difficulties with building and fire-safety permits.

The World: Planes stop as pilots protest hijacking epidemic

UNITED NATIONS -- The United Nations was asked Thursday to take action against airplane hijacking, but when the security council declined to discuss the matter at once, airline pilots launched a worldwide 24-hour strike to emphasize their point.

The strike grounded most air traffic around the world all day Monday. Air Canada and CP Air suspended all their flights during the period, as did Air France, Sabena, KLM, and many other lines. British airlines offered limited service as pilots used individual discretion on whether to strike or fly. Court orders kept most American pilots on the job; the head of the Trans World Airlines pilots said his group had been "beaten into the air" by the circuit court of appeals. The United States supreme court refused to lift a temporary injunction barring the strike; some pilots did defy it, however.

More than one million passengers per day normally travel by plane around the world; Air Canada and CP Air alone said they would lose $1 million from the one-day stoppage. International airports at Montreal and Toronto, as well as Tel Aviv, Oslo, Wellington and many other cities were deserted. A British European Airways spokesman summarized the world situation: "complete chaos".

The strike, in support of demands for tougher laws against hijacking, had the tacit support of the Canadian government, though in Washington American government spokesmen said the administration could not sympathize with it. Groups representing airline employees worldwide continued to meet with UN secretary-general Kurt Waldheim seeking international action against air piracy.

STOCKHOLM -- The UN environment conference finished on the weekend by hammering out an agreement which the conference chairman, Canada's Maurice Strong, said was "more than he expected". Strong is expected to be named head of a new UN agency, also approved at the conference, to put the agreement into effect and monitor pollution around the world. The central principle in the agreement is that a nation is responsible for actions which pollute its neighbours, and should pay compensation. Other anti-pollution measures were included; all now go to the UN General Assembly for ratification.

LONDON -- Last-minute government intervention, preventing the arrest of three union leaders, headed off a potentially disastrous national dock strike Friday.

WASHINGTON -- Doctors removed the bullet from the spine of Alabama governor George Wallace on Sunday. He was shot and partially paralysed May 15.

WASHINGTON -- The federal Labor Department has been given, by court order, sweeping powers over the great United Mine Workers union and will supervise new elections across the United States for union officials. Arrangements were to be made with the Canadian government for similar supervision of UMW locals in this country. UMW president Tony Boyle, is under indictment on a variety of charges, and suspicion has hung over the UMW since the murder of Joseph Yablonski shortly after Boyle defeated him in the last UMW election. A union spokesman said the court order gave the government such sweeping powers he was afraid to comment.

BOSTON -- Nine firemen died during a fire at the century-old Hotel Vendome here Saturday. The building was being remodelled and was unoccupied at the time of the fire; the fire was almost under control when a section collapsed, trapping the men.

APALACHICOLA, Florida -- Hurricane Agnes has killed twelve people so far and continued moving north Monday.

STAINES, England -- Experts Monday began investigating a BEA Trident jet crash which killed 118 persons Sunday shortly after it took off from London.

MEMPHIS -- An irate businessman demanding an audience with Tennessee governor Winfield Dunn took a tax collector hostage Thursday over a disagreement about his $167 bill for back taxes; he later released three other tax agents after forcing them to strip naked. The confrontation was resolved when Dunn agreed to talk to the man.

LOS ANGELES -- The death sentence of Sirhan Sirhan, murderer of Robert F. Kennedy, was reduced to life imprisonment last week in keeping with the ruling earlier this year which abolished capital punishment in California. Sirhan's conviction was upheld.

PANMUNJOM -- Red Cross representatives of North and South Korea have agreed on the agenda for talks which may some day bring about peaceful contact between the two halves of split Korea. Major items will be reunion of dispersed families and tracing lost individuals.

NEW YORK -- Clifford Irving, who faked an autobiography of multimillionaire Howard Hughes and kept the world guessing, Friday was sentenced to 2½ years in prison and a $10,000 fine for conspiracy and grand larceny. His wife was sentenced to two months in jail, and a collaborator to six months. Irving will begin serving his sentence August 28, after his wife is released, so he can care for their children in the meantime.

Welcome

Queen's welcomes this week 1800 students taking arts and science courses through the department of extension, and about 1400 more taking courses in the faculty of education. Besides these summer school students, the campus is hosting about 1000 delegates to the convention of the Students International Meditation Society, and 200 high school principals on a special course.

Summer school students are members of the Queen's Summer School Association, which will sponsor events from time to time; QSSA can be reached through the department of extension, 547-3283, or through its president, Jeff Young, 544-8799.

The Alma Mater Society, the student government of Queen's, will continue its operations through the summer as well; winter-registered students are still AMS members. The Queen's Journal, published by the AMS, will be published weekly on Thursdays during summer school.

Union prices up; financing examined

Ten-cent coffee in Kingston died Monday when the Students' Memorial Union and the McArthur Hall coffee shop raised their prices on a variety of items, including tea and coffee.

Liver and onions went down a nickel.

The price increases resulted from a need to generate revenue to cover rising costs, according to geography professor Gerald McGrath, who is warden of the Union. But he said they were kept to a minimum and confined to items which are subject to inflation.

The Union food service operates at a deficit, and payments on the internal mortgage covering its building costs are five years behind, despite the $10 fee annually paid by intramural students into the Union's operating fund.

Attempts will be made this summer to arrange a proportional fee to be paid by summer session students in future to help cover Union costs. In principle, winter and summer students should pay the same, the university administration has agreed.

A proposal made by Greg LeBlanc, president of the Alma Mater Society (the Queen's student government), that prices rise for the summer and go down again in September was rejected by McGrath and Queen's vice-principal (finance) David Bonham.

"It was not the proper solution," McGrath stated. "It would be unfair" to the graduate students and undergraduates who are on campus all year. In addition, the price rise would have to come at some point.

Food service costs totaling $484,555, form the largest part of the Union budget. Administrative and maintenance costs, based on square footage, are $10,782 for the International Centre; $8,233 for the Alumni office; and $49,353 for student services (Pub, AMS, Common rooms.) In addition, $1,200 is allocated to the Union Programme Committee for student activities.

Revenue (for other than the food services) comes from two sources.--$89,600 from student fees; and $10,185 from the university as a contribution on behalf of the Alumni Office and the International Centre.

The budget proposal shows an anticipated surplus of $17,827 to be presumablly used to retire the loan.

McGrath said the financial impact is now being felt on the food services and the graduate residence from the revenue decrease since the Bell Canada Regional Engineering School stopped renting a floor in the graduate residence. They were charged an "all inclusive fee", but he would not say how much.

AMS Vice-President Wally Palmer said the university's fee policy is 'inconsistent', and that he will be making submissions to the Vice-Principal Finance regarding non-academic fees for both Summer School and Intersession.

Students at the experimental intersession in May and June were not charged a non-academic fee, but a payment of 35 cents each was made by the university to the athletics budget on their behalf. Students paid the same fee per course as summer students -- $115 per course.

Palmer emphasized that he was not trying to get the money now given by the university to the Queen's Summer School Association to run its programmes. He said that he was mainly interested in bringing payments for services such as the Union, Health Service, and Athletics into line with what winter students pay.

Winter non-academic fees total $58.50, of which $6 is for the health service, $10 for the union, $20 for athletics. The balance is allocated between the Journal, Tricolor (the yearbook), concerts, the Ams, and a $5 fee raising capital for a new Union.

SUN OFF

Through its contacts with the federal Bureau of Miracles, The Journal has arranged for an eclipse of the sun to be staged late next Monday afternoon. It will reach its peak about 4:30 p.m. with approximately 80 per cent of the sun blocked out.

A group of Queen's graduate astronomy students will travel to the Gaspe Peninsule, where total eclipse will be visible; pictures taken by that group will be shown in The Journal July 20.

Summer School of English enjoy sun before classes start.

Oil trains response slow

Did you ever see cabbages coming out of a pipeline, asks Cecil Law, Director of the Canadian Institute of Guided Ground Transport (CIGGT) at Queen's. He was referring to the Trans-Alaska Pipeline System (TOPS) being pushed by a US Oil Consortium.

They want to build a pipeline to carry Arctic oil to the Pacific, and then by supertanker, to the US West Coast. Professor Law, on the other hand, thinks a railroad should be built down the Mackenzie Valley to a pipeline outlet near Hay River, (Q.J. June 8 '72). In a feasibility study released last month, the Institute shows that a $2.4 billion, unit-train system would be a less expensive, and less environmentally detremental method of moving that oil.

But has anyone been listening? Law says the response has been slow, but they are receiving inquiries now, even from oil companies. Whatever the response, the Institute, with some federal support, is now doing a detailed planning and impact study of the railroad.

There has been no mention of the railroad alternative in any recent discussion of the Trans-Alaska pipeline project. Neither the Canadian nor US governments or the oil companies have publicly mentioned the proposal, details of which have been available officially for a month, and unofficially for much longer.

Law says that the rail proposal is not outdated just because of the US decision to permit construction of the Trans-Alaska pipeline. The permit faces stiff court action, and construction could not start until 1973 at the earliest, perhaps later.

The oil companies are pushing for immediate action on the pipeline, presumably because they are losing money daily on their investment, even as well-head prices for oil increase. There is also the question of the writing off of approximatly one billion dollars already invested in the pipeline.

The Globe and Mail suggests that the need by the Atlantic Richfield Company for crude oil on the US West Cost, coupled with the fact that its chief executive officer, Robert Anderson, a Republican National Committeeman, is advising the administration on environmental matters, is putting pressure on the US government to get the pipeline through.

There are also the factors of Alaskan employment and the rejuvination of the US shipping industry involved in the American decision.

Testifying before a US Congressional Economic Committee, two weeks ago, Secretary of the Interior Roger Morton said the Canadian alternatives (no mention of rail) are unacceptable because of time delays in moving the oil (costing the US millions of dollars). He also questioned the ability of the Canadian money market to raise the needed capital.

The President of Atlantic Richfield Co., (owner of a number of the Arctic wells), echoed Morton's statements and added, he believed the "real purpose of some of the Canadian interests who oppose the line is to obtain an oil pipeline for Canadian oil financed by the US companies."

The CIGGT says the cost of delay argument is false. They calculate (using the data of the US oil companies) that delay would generate a net savings to the US. A spokesman for the Institute told the Journal that the oil companies are assigning a zero value to the oil which is extracted near the end of the field's life. "Clearly, this is ridiculous", he continued, adding that the possession of large oil reserves would be of more value to the US in the ground. By taking the oil out immediately, this advantage is lost. Their full findings on the question of delay will be released later in the summer.

Another facet of the CIGGT proposal is flexibility. Although its estimates were for a traffic flow of two million barrels a day, the same as a 48 inch pipeline, capacity could be easily expanded to three times that amount, and backhaul is possible.

In two studies released in March by the US Interior Department (a month before Morton announced his intention to issue the TAPS permit), all evidence points towards the overland route through Canada being better from an environmental point of view. The reports said that the TAPS proposal could be instituted faster, and emphasized the need for oil now, for vague 'National Security reasons'. No mention of relative costs was made.

The Canadian government is opposed to the Trans-Alaska pipeline, but has not seemed to have made substantial moves to suggest alternatives or to voice its opinion.

Many US environmentalists and politicians have voiced public support for a Canadian Pipeline route, and in April, Energy Minister Donald Macdonald suggested that with the court action against the TAPS, a Canadian line could be completed sooner. One Canadian government official said that the US oil companies could decide to go with a Canadian route as "the quickest way if they see endless stalling around."

In fact, last September, Morton himself suggested that "the most viable alternative is a pipeline most of which would be on Canadian land." He also said he expected to see the construction of a Canadian gas pipeline in the near future.

Many officials and environmentalists questioned the need for two separate pipelines to the Arctic, expecially since Canadian Arctic oil would probably not go through the Trans-Alaska system. Macdonald once discussed in the Commons his intention of proposing a joint effort with the United States government in the construction of a Mackenzie Valley pipeline.

The TAPS proposal has been around for a number of years, but delayed by a variety of lawsuits and US political pressure to study alternatives. Morton is quoted as saying that further scrutiny of the TAPS proposal was needed, and favoured looking at Canadian alternatives. He described the question as essentially economic as everyone accepts the environmental questions. The New York Times reports him saying that "any decision we make is not going to be made on the economic profit-and-loss of the industry involved," but will be based on "national need." Earlier UPI reports him as saying that the decisions would be based on the need for oil rather than the necessity of protecting the environment.

Children's author rejects Canadian publishers

"Only if you're Canadian - and patriotic would you forward your material to a Canadian publisher, Roald Dahl, author of children's books told a conference of librarians at Queen's last weekend.

Dahl, whose home is the United Kingdom maintains that the most skillful editing is available in the United States.

"Be patriotic, if you wish. . . but when you write, you write for money and recognition and that comes through dealings with New York publishers," he said.

Dahl prefers to write children's books rather than adult books. "You get far greater response from the kids than you do from the adults, he said, "And they're not afraid to express how they feel about your stories."

His books which have been translated into 30 languages include the Gremlins, James and the Giant Peach, Charlie and the Chocolate Factory, and the Magic Finger.

Dahl maintained that writers of children's book's "have a better chance of making it if they are graduates of the adult field first."

"Unfortunately, we've got too many authors of children's books who couldn't make the grade," he said.

Also attending the four day conference was Ann Blades, 21, of Vancouver whose book Mary of Mile 18 was judged book of the year by the Canadian Library Association.

The four day conference, entitled The Librarian and the Taxpayer - an Exercise in Efficiency was sponsored by the faculty of education at Queen's.

Astronomers in B.C. make important discoveries

Three Canadian Astronomers have found clues to the origin of cosmic X-rays first revealed by the American UHURU research satellite.

Dr. Carman Costain of National Research Council's Dominion Radio Astrophysical Observatory and Drs. Alan Bridle and Paul Feldman of Queen's University at Kingston analysed recordings of radio waves from the region of the constellation Ursa Minor (the Little Dipper) known to emit X-rays and discovered that the X-ray emission is accompanied by a bright source of short wave radio static.

In the current issue of the Astrophysical Journal the three astronomers argue that, unlike most known celestial X-ray emitters, the Ursa Minor source is not a star in our Milky Way galaxy but is an immense region over 600 million light years away. These X-rays have an emission rate more than a hundred billion times the light output of the Sun.

Geog. to offer Phd's

On May 25 the Queen's Senate approved implementation of a doctoral program in Geography to commence in September 1972.

Principal J.J. Deutsch indicated that the program had not been approved by the Government but Queen's would proceed anyway. Since the program has already been favourably received, the Senate agreed to implement it rather than wait for a province wide assessment of Geography which would delay the program at least one more year.

Emergency centre ineffective

After a month of operation the campus Emergency Centre is working well, says the man in charge of it. "So far as I know, there have been really no hangups."

But it may have performed less than efficiently during two crises in late June, admitted security director R. I. Luker: the power blackout caused by the fringes of Hurricane Agnes, and three days later a localized blackout caused when a Kingston youngster accidentally touched a high-voltage power line at the power substation near Division and Clergy Streets.

The second mishap was on a Sunday evening and few people were on campus to notice the loss of power, which lasted more than an hour. Attention was attracted when three fire trucks screamed toward Jeffery Hall and firemen extinguished a minor blaze caused by an overheating burner intended to generate auxiliary power for the building. Damage in the fire was minor.

Queen's maintenance staff appeared on the scene only after the fire trucks had left and the crowd dispersed.

The earlier blackout, caused by high winds on the perimeter of Agnes which threw trees and branches across power and phone lines, lasted about an hour on a Thursday evening. It caught many people in academic buildings and particularly in Douglas Library, and temporarily baffled students scheduled to write intersession final exams in the pitch-black underground lecture halls of Jeffrey Hall.

Several people were caught in automatic elevators during that power failure, including drama professor Rod Robertson, who was on his way into the Douglas Library stacks when the lights and power failed. He stayed in the elevator, assured by library staffer Graham Keyhoe's shouts that help was on its way, until the power returned.

Then Robertson left the elevator at its first stop and ran upstairs to the library's lobby.

"You're the first white woman I've seen in more than an hour!" he cried, seizing a giggling library clerk.

Elevator repairmen from the university's maintenance department did have Robertson in mind, but had a similar case in Dupuis Hall to deal with first.

Discussing the maintenance staff's performance, director Luker commented that "There are a few wrinkles that I want to get ironed out." The chief wrinkle, he said, is a "lack of reaction capability": especially at night, when maintenance staff mostly are not on campus, it may take the emergency centre staff some time to find the right repairman and get him to the crisis.

Though one repairman is on call at home at any time, Luker said, "We really have no way to respond to a thing like that" (a need for many repairman at once). If an elevator needs fixing, "We have to call a tradesman who is probably at home on a weekend"; the man on duty may by a plumber or carpenter instead.

The situation cannot really be improved "without spending a lot of money", Luker said. He did urge staff and students to remember that the emergency centre exists and is the fastest way to get help in a maintenance emergency on campus.

Its phone number is 547-5800, 24 hours a day.

But the number should only be used to report emergency conditions. During the Thursday blackout, efficiency of the centre was hampered by many phone calls from people enquiring when the power would go on again -- something to which the harassed staff could only answer, "Ask Ontario Hydro."

the NBC show Meet The Press, said that the administration was not completely satisfied with the pipeline proposal, but it was the best alternative. No mention was ever made of the CIGGT rail alternative, although the March Interior Department Study made reference to an earlier study on a Trans-Alaska railroad made by Carnegie-Mellon University.

After the Institute's preliminary report got out in February, Transport Minister Don Jamison said that the rail concept would remain a dream until a customer was found for the railroad. Feelings in government circles at that time was that the US oil companies would favour a Mackenzie pipeline before a railroad, but that this might change if the Canadian government insisted that Canadian Arctic oil move by rail.

A TAPS spokesman said that a railroad for the Arctic oil had been considered briefly, but was rejected because it was "too mind-boggling".

The original TAPS proposal was to cost $900 million. The company immediatly purchased $300 million worth of pipe which is now rusting in Alaska. In 1970, a senior vice-president of the Phillips Petroleum Company estimated that the costs of the pipeline would skyrocket because of poor, hastily-made plans, and that the oil would not reach the US until 1975 (assuming that construction started then). Current estimates of the costs of TAPS are $4.5 billion, including tankers.

Much of the TAPS investment in now useless equipment, was made on the strength of verbal assurances (in 1970) that permits to build the pipeline would be made that summer.

The pipeline-railroad controversy is further complicated by the planning which is going into a Mackenzie Valley gas pipeline. Three groups are interested in the project, but none have considered building the pipeline from a railroad right-of-way. The Institute expects that this would lower construction costs considerably.

There is also the Trudeau statement that work would start this summer on a highway up the Mackenzie Valley. He said that the route would be selected for use by pipelines. His pipeline and highway ideas will cost about ten billion dollars.

Grads may unionize

Graduate students at Queen's may be asked to vote during 1972-73 on whether to form a certified labour union.

At a meeting June 24 of the Canadian Union of Graduate Students, representatives of nine Ontario universities discussed the possibility of forming a province-wide union for graduate students, The Journal has been told by Graduate Student Society president Doug Pritchard.

Such a union is being pushed by graduate leaders from the University of Toronto, York University and McMaster University, he said, and all three of those graduate societies are committed to forming unions if they can legally do so.

A certification vote under Ontario Labour law can be held when 35 per cent of the group's members have signed union cards. Pritchard said York University achieved a 25 per cent score in one day this spring, "without trying", and that Toronto and McMaster are likely to follow their lead. Certification votes probably will come this fall.

But the idea delegates discussed the most, and the one Pritchard brought back to the GSS here for discussion, was a privince-wide union with locals on all the campuses. (The University of Toronto, with about half the province's graduate students, would be much the largest and strongest local, he pointed out.)

When the union idea was brought forward at Queen's the reacton from most GSS executive members was blank surprise, Pritchard said. He would not predict what the GSS might decide to do, but pointed out that even if sentiment is against participation in a union, it would be wise for Queen's to be involved in writing its constitution. This would mean that if Queen's were forced to join the union later "we'd have a constitution we could live with", Pritchard said.

The Canadian Association of University Teachers has been considering union organization also, he pointed out.

The strongest expression of graduate student union organization so far was a strike conducted at McMaster this spring in which grads won some concessions from the university administration after refusing to carry out their teaching duties.

Long-time grad student dissatisfaction at the conditions and pay of teaching assistants has crystallized into strong resentment of how grads are treated as a result of this spring's tuition fee increase, the new policy that scholarships are fully taxable, and other government restrictions.

Housing needed

The "Experiment in International Living" is looking for families in Kingston to house teachers from Germany who will be visiting from July 31 to August 19.

The Experiment, making its first contact with Kingston, was founded in 1932; it is an independent organization with operations in more than 45 countries on six continents. The programmes are based on the idea that one best learns to understand another people and their culture by living among them; accordingly, the Experiment programme arranges two-way programmes in which Canadians go to other lands and foreigners visit Canada.

The relationship with students defines what a teacher is

(The following article, from John McMurtry's column "The Iconoclast", is reprinted from Monday Morning, a teachers' magazine, for January 1972.)

THE TERM 'TEACHER' MEANS different things to different people. Hence in something of a quandary (until I figure out the person's language game) as to what the speaker is talking about. A rich and diverse range of possible instantiations leaps to my mind: from Jesus of Nazareth to Miss Ironrule, from Mr. Chips to 'Behaviour Modifier'. The confusion is so deep and thoroughgoing indeed that I often feel tempted to draw up a schedule of concepts of teacher and present it to whoever's using the word with an invitation to put a tick opposite the notion he or she has in mind.

In the spirit of this temptation, I'd like to try now identifying what I think are the three major concepts of a teacher. I will be talking in terms not only of teacher but of student too: that is in terms of the relationship which the concept of teacher implies. The three concepts of teacher (or, to be more exact, the teacher-student relationship) which I have in mind are:

(1) Master-Servant
(2) Professional-Client
(3) I-Thou.

MASTER-SERVANT IS THE teacher-student concept which obtains in fact in our traditional educational institutions. The teacher is master and the student is servant. The former thus dictates worktasks, enforces standards, makes deadlines, controls speech, sets the rules of behaviour, judges performance, writes references and (this is the linchpin of the mechanism of control) owns the power to exclude the ward from the work place and its means of life.

The student, or the 'Servant', is on the receiving end of all these forms of power. He performs the required worktasks, obeys the standards, meets the deadlines, conforms to the imposed rules of speech and behaviour and so forth: throughout being under the hidden or overt threat of being excluded ('suspended', 'expelled', 'failed') from his present (and even future) employment if he does not so serve. In some cases, namely in most primary and secondary schools, this structure of domination actually verges towards jailor-prisoner, as the language of these schools ('patrol', 'detention', 'term', 'corporal punishment', 'incorrigible', 'squealed', 'correction', 'confess', 'outside world', 'offender') - suggests.

In short, the relationship is one of domination and servitude: intractably ensconced as such by virtue of the master (the teacher) being obliged by written regulation to enforce his set of institutional powers on his charges. If he fails to do so, he himself will be excluded from his life-support base by higher authority.

THE SECOND CONCEPT of the teacher-student relationship, professional-client is the one of educationist rhetoric and pretense: of, that is, educationist ideology. Teachers make a conscientious effort to gain public (and their own) acceptance of this ideological concept by persistently solemnizing about professionals, professionalism, the teaching profession, and so on: even though the necessary conditions of a profession (voluntary clientele and self-government) are explicitly absent (except in the case of university teachers, who represent a curious mix of master and professional).

Though the students are seldom straightforwardly called clients by educators, there is an increasing tendency to construe them as such: as, for example, medical patients who have to undergo 'modification' before they can be released from the schools' 'operations' as certified safe-and-well members of society.

There is a certain confusion in this whole concept, as one might expect given its substantial conflict with reality. But it is one which is widely employed and implied in educationese and one which has impelled, indeed, an increasing movement towards making teachers into independent practitioners, and students into voluntary clientele with rights of free-market purchase by means of a sort of educational version of a health insurance card (a 'voucher').

It may well be that this second concept of the teacher-student relationship will eventually go beyond rhetoric and take actual hold in our educational practice in place of the master-servant principle. But I am inclined to doubt the possibility of such a qualitative development in the near future, inasmuch as the overriding social function of the schools is, however it is dressed up, to produce obedient youth who will submit by habit to the internal dictatorship of current corporate bureaucracies, families and labour-lines. Undermining the crucial master-servant conditioning of the schools by granting students the status of freely-choosing clients seems just too obviously subversive of vested ruling powers to be tolerated in our society yet.

THE THIRD AND FINAL CONCEPT of the teacher-student relationship, I-Thou, is what might be called an ideal: neither realized in practice nor, even, in the ideology of educators generally. It has a long history, however, stretching from the Boddhisatvas of Buddhism to the modern advocates of radical free schools. In this concept both teacher and student are construed of as autonomous subjects. Unlike the master-servant relationship, there exists no right of nor obligation to command on the part of the teacher. And unlike the professional-client relationship, the student is not confined in his identity to the role of a client to be serviced in a one-directional, specific and prescribed way for a fee. Rather the relationship is one of human ends-in-selves meeting in mutually committed encounter. The teacher is simply he who has the authority (and only the authority) of craft and experienced interest: an authority that can spontaneously shift with the locus of discourse (e.g., I have much to say to my students on philosophy and literature, but they have taught me much about underground music and their generation's values). The relationship is non-directive, it is two-way and it is mutually concerned and creative. It is, in brief, a form of love.

WHAT DISTURBS ME MOST about our present educational institutions is that this ideal relationship of teacher and student is (through a mayriad of impersonal administrative dictates) forbidden to obtain. It is, as it were, against the law. That this should be the case in the one place in our society that is putatively dedicated to the growth of minds rather than profits and things is the unkindest cut of all. We require, I fear, a revolutionary change of vision in such things, or we are lost.

The heffalump, a sometime white-elephant is a craft shop which the Alma Mater Society started in downtown Kingston about a year ago. It has been plagued with various financial difficulties. In addition, legal difficulties with Walt Disney have forced them to change the name.

Tuesday, they decided to call it the Lumpe.

The Lumpe of heffalump or whatever is at 231 Princess. Below are the impressions of our reporter Sue Bourbonniere.

After a long winter of uncertainty and much criticism, the Heffalump craft shop survived and is flourishing with the summer. Jane Corkin, the manager, said that though there was mass paranoia at first on the part of those "Queen's people" working on Heffalump, about moving into downtown Kingston, these fears have since been disavowed and the neighboring merchants have encouraged and helped them in many ways; "friendly competition" exists between Heffalump and the Canadian Shop which both deal in handmade crafts. Originally the organizers of Heffalump, people like Victor Bradley, Peter Griffiths, Jim Whittely, from Job Bank, hoped that the store would be a good way of getting people jobs and also getting them involved with the community by selling their crafts, but unfortunately this ideal has been lost, to a certain extent, because of the anger of some people who feel that since the shop was set up by the AMS it should deal only in the articles made by Queen's students. Things sold at the Heffalump come from craft shows, the penitentiary, the Old Age Home, but, uniquely, most of the stuff is sold on consignment whereby the shop and the craftsman share the profit. Heffalump will buy anything that is brought in, but there is a time limit on how long the craft can stay in the shop at the given price. Wall hangings seem to be among the most popular items for sale, "we ne enough of them" Ja and it is not uncom even the most ex painting or batique quickly snatched up are quite a few pe regularly bring in th sale, and for them thi than a job, it is a thusiastic committme makes the shop "su for them. Quelques étudiants du Summer School of English (ils sont arrivé à Queen's cette semaine) vont trouver que cette article est amusante plus que serieuse. Robert Choquette de Montréal l'a écrit pour la Semaine par Canada, qui vient de finir. The Queen's Journal la présente pour l'édification de tout le monde qui peut la lire. Nous invitons des étudiants québecois à donner leurs opinions, sur ce sujet ou sur des autres, soit en français soit en anglais, et nous allons les publier les semaines qui viennent!

Voici venir l'époque de l'année où, d'une province à l'autre, la plupart des Canadiens vont célébrer la Semaine du Canada. Comme ils le feront pour la quatrième fois, on peut affirmer que cette célébration est en voie de passer dans nos habitudes. C'est déjà quatre fois tant mieux. Et d'autant plus que le Comité qui a conçu cet événement et en a fait une réalité n'est pas une créature de l'Etat, mais un organisme formé au sein de l'entreprise privée, groupant des Canadiens de langue française et de langue anglaise appartenant à des millieux les plus divers, sans distinction d'origine, de partis politiques ou de croyance religieuse. Fondé en 1964, le Comité Canada comprend aujourd'hui plusieurs milliers de membres engagés à raffermir chez nous le sentiment de solidarité.

Pourquoi une Semaine du Canada? On peut s'étonner que l'apathie d'un bon nombre de Canadiens ait besoin semble-t-il, d'une tape sur l'épaule. A moins que cette indolence ne reflète, au contraire, une calme confiance dans Et pourtant, cette Semaine du Canada doit être une preuve d'optimisme, une profession de foi, un témoignage de confiance en l'avenir de ce Canada qui est nôtre et le deviendra de plus en plus si les Canadiens veulent bien apprendre à se connaître mieux. Cela est en train de se faire, progressivement, en profondeur, à la façon généralement imperceptible dont croissent les plantes et les arbres. Avec des soubresauts et des tressaillements, bien sûr. Comment en serait-il autrement, si l'on songe qu'hier encore, à l'échelle de l'histoire, les deux groupes fondateurs du Canada. Moderne se saluaient le mousquet à la main? Il faut être aveugle aux progrès accomplis dans ce sens depuis quelques années, pour tourner le dos à l'espérance malgré, d'une part, certains esprits touchés d'immobilisme, dont on dérange le confort intellectuel et la douceur de longues habitudes et malgré, d'autre part, quelques semeurs de discorde, quelques fabricants de névrose, quelques vendeurs de haine. Ce n'est pas en laissant toute la parole aux mauvais maîtres que ceux qui veulent un Canada meilleur le serviront. Ce vaste et riche pays ne sera grand que si les Canadiens s'en montrent dignes. Ce magnifique pays éployé d'une océan à l'autre, ce pays où l'espérance a de la place, il faut que nous le méritions par l'intelligence et par le coeur. Voilà un peu et beaucoup pourquoi on a créé la Semaine du Canada.

No matter how often I'm assured that our team will be taking Tang with them to the Olympics in Munich, I'm more than just a bit concerned over the whole concept of the Olympics.

Remember Avery Brundage? He's the nasty man who lowered the boom on skiers who supplemented their income (by about 900 per cent) by allowing pictures of them using certain brands to somehow become very common. He's also the terrible person who wouldn't let Canadians use professional hockey players in the Olympics. (which are for amateurs only). I hated him too. So now he feels that people are tired of his fight for amateur Olympics and he has decided to resign. Everybody happy? Well I'm not! Everybody knows that I'm just impossible to please but this time how about giving it some thought.

Its about time that people decided what they really want. Nearly every country involved in the Olympics spends as much time trying to dodge the amateure status rules as they do training their teams. Some even succeed to an extent. Who really believes that the Russian hockey team is paid to be in the army? Do you ever wonder what the other lads on K.P. think of the special hockey duty the Moscow selects get? Maybe they have to skate around the rink for an extra hour for having a dirty locker. Fortunately we, as Canadians are in a unique position to view the problem. Canada will never do particularly well in the Olympics whether it is amateurs, semi-pros or professionals who compete. (but in the latter case we might win a few games of hockey). Unlike poorer countries, the standard of living in Canada is so high that a person can't be an outstanding amateur (In the old Olympic sense) without some massive gifts of money. (which Canadians are not famous for providing) On the other hand, where professionals are concerned Canada supports very few. (even hockey players have to sell their talents south of the border to get much pay) Besides professionals have their own world playoffs. So that takes us back to amateurs.

Somebody decided that amateurs had to be allowed to make some per-centage of their income by selling their talent. I hate to echo Mr. Brundage, but if you want amateur Olympics, why do you want a rule like that?

It must be obvious that rules like that, which the richer countries were all most happy to get, were largely developed to please poor losers like Canada who want the pride of Olympic victory without being handicapped with having to support amateurs or take an interest in their competitors. If Canadians cared about amateur achievement at any time other than the short duration of the olympics every four years (which I'm sure they don't) they could easily find ways of supporting them. I doubt that Canadians, or their southern neighbours either, are the least bit interested in an all-amateur Olympic Games.

What would happen if Amateur status were restricted to the old status? For starters a lot of people would lose interest because the countries that can't be bothered taking an active interest in their competitors would always lose and their nationalism would take a well deserved beating. The quality of Olympic competition would almost certainly drop. After all when you can run for a living you can train more than if you had to earn a living on the side. Competition, however would probably be closer with the small countries showing more strongly than before. But we dont want that. We're a have country and as long as we have semi-pros in the Olympics it's all right. Besides, how many people in Canada or the U.S.A. would afford to be amateurs (or want to be) if it had absolutely no money in it. I don't doubt the sincerity of people who train hard and don't even want to be professional, only their sanity. In the land of the Puritan Ethic you either produce a saleable good or service or starve. (and you won't get a whole lot of support either) Of course you get some support from the government, Canadian people are indifferent to it too.

Most people feel that it is rediculous to stick by the old idea of an international games where athletes who have trained hard and given up a great deal can compete. Most people care more about their national over-all standing than who competes or how he got there too.

Wouldn't it be nice if pros were pros and amateurs were amateurs and everyone stopped trying to mix the two? Then in 1976 when the Olympics Games come to Montreal the Canadian team might have a chance. After all the Olympics were never intended to be dominated by richer nations. Also those who really want to be amateurs will quickly be sifted out and receive a just reward, Countries which don't really care would be virtually eliminated. Maybe we could just hang out a large sign, "Welcome to Canada.. Land of the Professional".

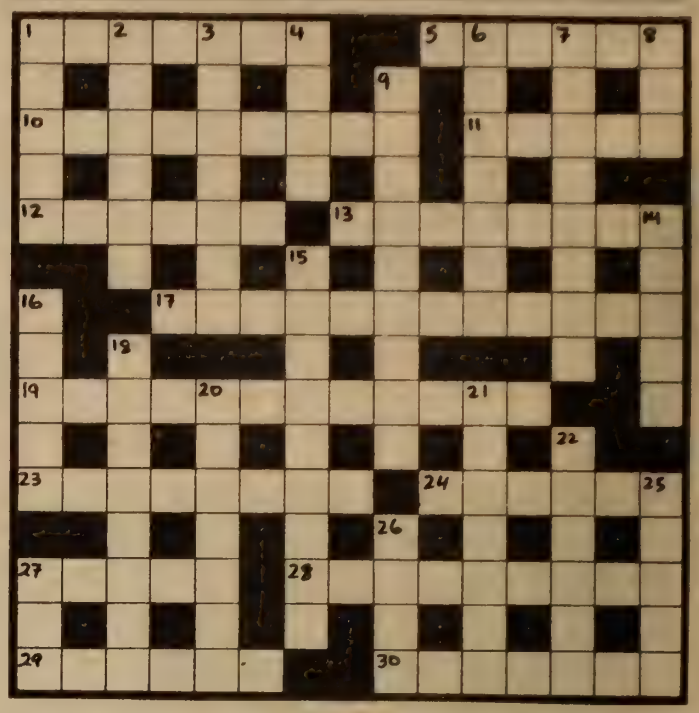
letter

Dear Editors:

Thank you for the extensive article (June 22) on the Preliminary Report of the University Centre Users' Committee. The full report (somewhat revised in wording but not in substance from the draft you have used) is to appear as a Queen's Gazette Supplement on July 5. Interested parties are encouraged to comment and criticize.

Your account gives a generally accurate picture of our proposals, but I would like to correct one statement. The report does not say that the Student Health Service "will do better to stay where it is". The committee does not question that the present Student Health Service accommodation is unsatisfactory. We do not feel, however, that it is advisable to include this service in the renovated or new space on the corner of University and Union, for reasons that are stated. There are other possible locations for this service being considered by those responsible.

Perhaps I could also comment on some other smaller points, some of which arise because you have been working from an earlier draft version of our report. Concerning the students affairs offices, the sentence you quote was deleted, and replaced by "It does not seem useful to relocate this service in a new building. Rather, we prefer to think of the house (165 University) as part of the University Centre". Part of the difficulty in discussions has been that people say Centre sometimes meaning "New building plus Union" and sometimes meaning "New building plus Union plus sub-centres". As you correctly report, the Preliminary Report is primarily concerned with defining those services and functions that should be accommodated in "New building plus Union", or possibly in a house adjacent to them.



With reference to the Alumni, it is true that some committee members did not initially see why they needed space in the Centre (rather than elsewhere). But it was my impression that there was general agreement that the reasons for including the Alumni Office were valid (reasons additional to the monetary contribution).

Finally you speak of "Lots of lounges". If "lounge" is understood as the conventional large Students' Union Lounge, then the committee's intentions will be misunderstood. People need places to sit, to talk, to read, but we are not proposing to provide such places by means of "lots" of traditional large lounges.

I hope that the Journal will give further publicity to our Preliminary Report both in July for summer school students, and in September for full-time students. The Users' Committee will be better able to do its job if it receives a vigorous response from the University community.

R. D. Norman
Chairman,
University Centre Users' Committee.

This year's summer school session was ushered in last Monday by wet and foul weather. That summer school should start this way was no mistake; rather, it was a ploy of the provincial government.

Those of us who have been watching the activity of the government during the past year will have noticed that increased seriousness with which they view post-secondary education. For many years, the government policy was to let universities grow as they would, in a random fashion, admitting everyone, and exercising only a general guiding hand.

The result of this permissive attitude was a mushrooming of post-secondary institutions, and a dramatic increase in the costs of keeping them running. This past year "Bill" Davis and his cronies decided to place limits on post-secondary education, and among other things instituted fee increases. This could be interpreted as an attempt to discourage people who are wavering about enroling at a university. They might view the costs as being too high, and thus would think twice before committing themselves.

The first real test of these limitations was to be the summer school enrollments of this year. However, as time wore on into early summer, it became evident that summer school enrollments were not decreasing as had been expected. In fact, the increased competition in the teaching profession and the decreased summer employment for regular students meant very large numbers of people attending summer school.

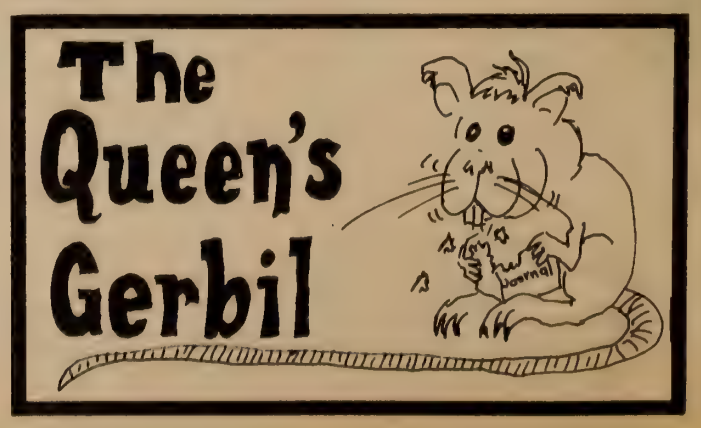
When these facts were filtered to the provincial government, panic took hold. The frenzy spread. In the midst of it all, "Bill" Davis decided to call an inter-departmental meeting so that major minds from all areas of government could reach a solution. The provincial treasurer and the heads of relevent departments were invited to the meeting. As "Bill" checked over the list of officials who had been invited, he noticed that the provincial weatherman had been left out.

'Now, "Bill" knew that there was not much point in having this fellow at the meeting, but he also knew that the guy was very sensitive. The prevailing feeling in the cabinet at the time was one of apprehension, for with the creation of the "super" ministries had come a great deal of consciousness of status. To not be invited to a meeting was to be subjected to the scorn of one's colleagues. "Bill" didn't want to offend the weatherman, for when he had done it once before, the man had dreamt up bad weather reports, thereby ruining the weekend plans of over three-quarters of the cabinet.

So, the weatherman was invited. The meeting, from all reports, was typical of recent government meetings. It was confused and scattered, with each department representative working hard to make his impression. As the ideas became more and more ludicrous, "Bill" became increasingly desperate. Suddenly, he noticed that the weatherman had not said anything, so he called on him for a comment.

The eyes of the meeting swung towards the man they had all assumed was a meteorological buffoon. He shifted back in his chair, glanced at the ceiling as if for inspiration, cleared his throat, and began.

"I take it" he began, "that one of the reasons that summer session is so popular is that the weather is fine. The trees are in full bloom, the waters are warm, and grass is full and soft."



"Correct," leapt in George Kerr, the minister in charge of post-secondary education, in an attempt to assert his expertise.

"I further take it," posed the weatherman, "that students enjoy school more in the summer because they can study on the lawns of our universities, and can walk with ease from place to place and derive great pleasure from their learning environment."

"Right on," chimed the cabinet as a voice, trying to impress "Bill" with how "with it" they were.

"My plan then," said the weatherman, leaning forward in his chair and speaking confidentially, "is to open the summer session with one day of bad weather so that students will become severely discouraged, and will not want to continue. We will have rain and clouds, lower than average seasonal temperatures, and slippery driving conditions. The grass will be wet, the waters unduly cool, and the trees dripping with rain. Students will be discouraged, and will go home."

Well, the genius of his plan carried the day. The cabinet burst with enthusiasm, the weatherman was given the go-ahead, and thus we had foul weather last Monday. Government education policy received a new ally, in the form of the oft-feared but seldom believed weatherman.

WASHINGTON - US President Nixon announced last week that the Viet Nam peace talks would resume in Paris July 13. There was little optimism that the talks would be any more productive than they have been in the past.

WASHINGTON - The US Army will station several thousand troops within easy reach of Miami for the two political conventions this summer.

NEW YORK - Hurricane Agnes caused property damage in excess of $1 billion to parts of the Northeast United States. Weather experts are still not sure what caused the storm to stop moving while still picking up water from the Atlantic Ocean and dumping it on a relatively small area.

BELFAST - The IRA and the British Army agreed on a tentative cease fire last week, but tension remained high. There have been a number of incidents but the basic truce seems to be holding. Meanwhile protestants created a number of "no-go" districts in protestant areas in protest against the British army's tolerance of Catholic "no-go" areas.

PARIS - France started its series of atmospheric tests in the South Pacific despite world-wide protest. So far, only one explosion, of small yield, has been set off.

WASHINGTON - The Democratic Credentials Committee in a surprise move last week voted to deny George McGovern 151 delegates from California. The primary there had originally been fought on a winner-take-all basis, giving McGovern all 271 delegates. The credentials committee also unseated Chicago Mayor Richard Daley's Cook County delegation, giving McGovern an additional 41 delegates. Observers said that McGovern's nomination is no longer virtually certain but still highly probable.

WASHINGTON - In a 5 to 4 decision the US Supreme Court has ruled that capital punishment violates the eighth ammendment's ban on cruel and unusual punishment and is therefore unconstitutional. President Nixon's 4 appointees to the court all favoured retention of the death penalty.

SIMLA INDIA - India and Pakistan signed an agreement on the weekend providing for some troop withdrawals from border areas and an easing of tensions in Kashmir.

SEOUL - North and South Korea have agreed to high level secret meetings to work for reunification of Korea.

LONDON - The British pound was allowed to float free on international money markets last week and fell about 8 per cent in value compared to the US dollar.

MONTREAL - Striking longshoremen at Quebec ports voted to end their 7 week strike, as long as certain changes are made to the proposals made by federal labour department negotiators. The wildcat strike was called shortly after the signing of a new three year agreement that was supposed to bring peace to the Quebec waterfront labour scene. The unions claimed that the Maritime Employers Association was not implementing the agreement properly.

TORONTO - Ontario Hydro workers, members of CUPE local 1000, have been staging rotating strikes against Hydro. The Union and Hydro have been unable to reach agreement on a new contract. Hydro has been maintaining services using supervisory staff, but have closed down the new Pickering Nuclear Power station during the strike because they were unable to maintain the high safety standards using only supervisory staff.

MONTREAL - The CBC and its striking technicians reached agreement on a new 4 year contract last week.

OTTAWA - The Canadian Radio-Television Committee (CRTC) last week denied a CBC request to allow it to reorient its AM service into popular-style broadcasting. Instead the Commission urged the CBC to phase out commercials and to concentrate on high quality broadcasting rather than on trying to imitate the commercial broadcasters. The commission also urged the CBC to improve the standard of many affiliate stations.

ORILLIA - The Ontario New Democratic party provincial council voted almost two weeks ago to expel the Waffle wing, but it is still not clear how (or if) this will be done.

OTTAWA - The Immigration department has adopted new streamlined methods of processing applicants in an attempt to eliminate the backlog of over 13,000 cases waiting to be heard. Basically the process involves relaxing the standards for immigration.

Tension grows over summer fees, representation

Tension between year-round students and summer school students is growing at Queen's, with the summer group feeling that in many cases they are overcharged and under represented for what they get, and that winter students look down on them and want to take their money.

The Alma Mater Society (the year-round student government) has been unhappy for years about the low fees which, it appears, summer students pay for nonacademic facilities such as the Students' Memorial Union.

The Queen's Summer School Association, on the other hand, feels no obligation to the AMS and suggests that its members already pay too much for what they get.

(The Journal has learned that -- as one measure of the distrust between summer and winter students -- a faction in QSSA wants to ban intramural students from membership in the summer school body.)

While intramural students pay separate academic and non-academic fees, extramural and summer students are charged an "all-inclusive" $115 per course. From the revenue this fee provides, the university makes certain grants to services which the non-academic fees support in the winter.

Last year these grants were $3000 for the Student Health Service, $500 for the Students' Memorial Union. $2500 to the Queen's Summer School Association, and 35c per student (about $600) to athletics. The amounts are expected to be the same this year.

An administration spokesman told The Journal on Tuesday that the "all-inclusive" $115 fee is a tradition, with distribution having been altered from time to time. He agreed that it was inconsistent to have an all-inclusive summer fee and distinct winter ones, but said any policy change would have to be initiated by students.

The AMS is preparing a submission, suggesting a change, to be presented later this summer.

QSSA president Jeff Young confirmed that the discrepancies in the nonacademic fees are controlled by the university, and that QSSA could do nothing about them.

Young agreed that summer students benefit from nonacademic facilities as well as from formal instruction, and said that in future a fee schedule should itemize the distinction.

Winter students, in art and science, paid $500 as their academic fee, plus a $63 non academic fee last year, an amount slightly lower than a summer student would pay for the same number of courses. (A further disadvantage to the summer students is that they spend longer at university -- up to ten years at one or two courses per year -- and may be subject to repeated fee hikes.)

For 1972-73, winter tuition has risen to $600. Extension and summer school tuition, correspondingly, has gone up $20 per course.

Summer school students have a disadvantage in representation as well as in finances. They have only one representative on the arts and science faculty board, a body on which all professors sit. It also includes one representative from the students of each department -- about thirty altogether.

This works out to about one representative for 175 students in the winter, and one for the 500 "full-time equivalent students" represented by the 1800 summer students. There is about ten percent overlap between summer students and winter intramural students.

Young said QSSA had received authority to appoint a faculty board representative just this spring. His organization was happy to get representation on that governing board, he said, despite "a great deal of inconsistency" in the number of representatives allowed.

When the issue came up in 1971, Young said, QSSA had asked for "representation" without mentioning numbers.

"Our next job is to get more representation," he added.

QSSA, which is in the process of revising its constitution, will decide this summer how its representative should be chosen, Young said.

Summer students at the faculty of education, who are not regular members of QSSA and not involved in the faculty of arts and science, are not concerned with this faculty board representative.

Booms shake campus

Booms which shook the campus several times Tuesday and Wednesday were the result of blasting on the lower campus, but will not be a feature of campus life for long, the job superintendent has told The Journal.

Frank Burkhart of Caribou Construction, which is building a two-storey underground parking garage in the area south of Kingston Hall, said the blasts were very loud as the job began because "it's all congested".

But "once we get a hole started where the trucks can work, it won't be nearly so bad."

That should take another day or two, he said. Lighter blasting is scheduled to continue for four to six weeks.

The construction site notifies the Queen's computing centre before each charge is set off, Burkhart said, and the explosion goes off only when the centre has confirmed that delicate equipment is turned off.

He said Caribou also tries to clear its noisiest work with Queen's administrators in Richardson Hall and the metallurgical engineers in Nicol Hall.

Noise and vibration from the blasting definitely will be "tapering off", he emphasized. But even when rock faces are more accessible than they are early in the job, "you're definitely going to hear a blast."

Burkhart said there had been only one noise complaint during Tuesday's work on the south side of the project, opposite Kingston General Hospital. And that, he said, was immediately after a blast which Caribou did not set off. Burkhart said he did not know where that explosion, heard about 10:40 am, had come from.

Assistant dean quits

Miss Shirley Mason, assistant to the dean of women at Queen's for the past seven years, has resigned and will leave Queen's before the end of this summer, The Journal has learned. She will take a post in residence administration at another Ontario university.

Miss Mason's departure completes a staff change in the dean of women's office which began last October with the retirement of Mrs. Beatrice Bryce, dean since 1969, and the arrival of her successor, Mrs. Evelyn Reid. Mrs. Mary Johnston, key member of her staff for years, has transferred to an office responsible for residence admissions.

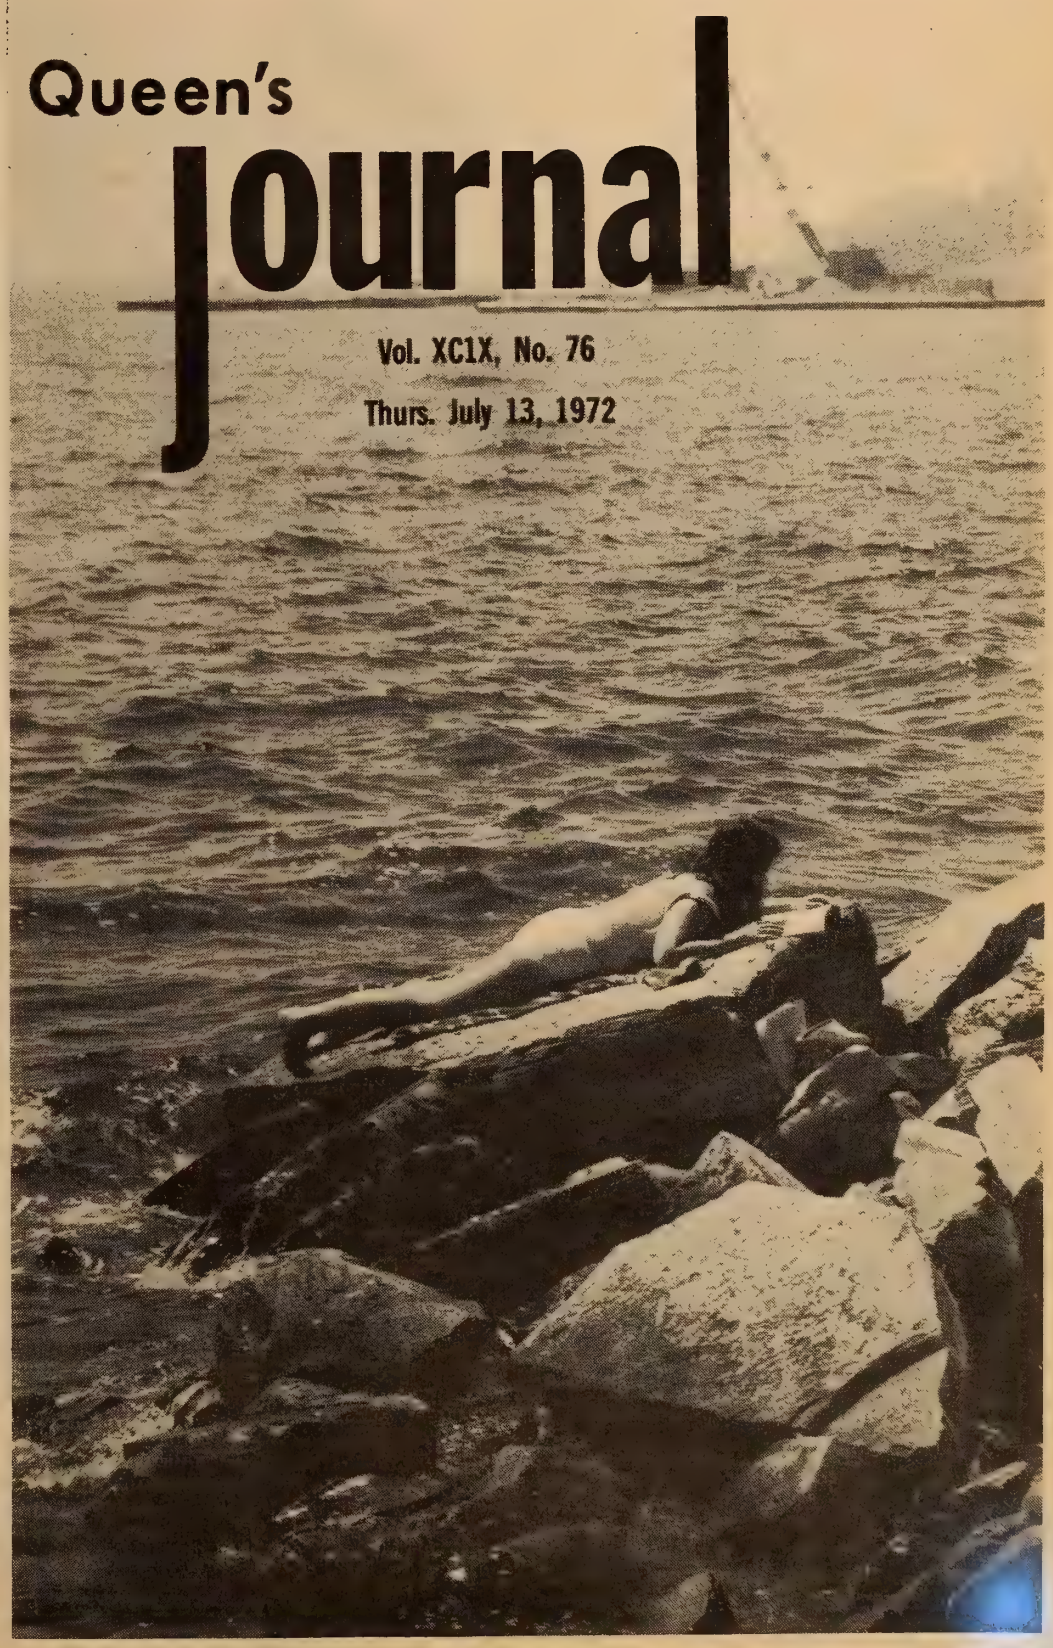
Asked why she was leaving, Miss Mason said it was not a recent decision; "I've been thinking about it since two years ago last March."

But it is no secret that the change in deans has had considerable impact on residence staff and on students who work with the residence government.

Mrs. Reid is less formal in her role of dean than was Mrs. Bryce, and some students have said privately that she is determined to sweep away the structures which existed under Mrs. Bryce.

"Too many" campus break-ins

Campus security director R. I. Luker told the Journal that there have been a number of break-ins on campus this summer -- "too many" in fact. He said that the university is taking no positive steps (security patrols) yet to combat the problem, but is instead relying on educating regular staff to pay more attention to security matters, such as locking doors and windows, and challenging strangers.



In one incident, a hundred and fifty dollars and an amplifier head were taken in a break-in at the Queen's Pub last Thursday.

The amplifier, belonging to the Syrup Jones Blues Band, was discovered missing about 1:30 p.m. The money, in a pub deposit bag inside a briefcase, was found missing at 2 p.m. Pub sources say the amp could have been taken anytime over the evening, but the money was taken sometime between noon and 2 p.m.

by Paul Gompertz

Last Wednesday at 11:00 am I went to talk to Mr. Lee Tomarello, the director of the St. Lawrence Summer Playhouse, to find out a little of the history and aims of the Tent Theatre.

Mr. Tomarello is an American who has been with the Tent since its inauguration. When not working with the Tent he is a drama teacher in Pittsburg, and he intends to go to university this fall to obtain a B.A. in drama. He told me that the summer playhouse was in its sixth year, though this is only its fourth in Kingston. It came here after two years in Gananoque as a result of negotiations with the city.

Mr. Tomarello considers that the prime function of the theatre is to provide entertainment, and he tries to present five light shows in ten weeks, three of them musicals. He emphasises that it is commercial summer theatre without intellectual aspirations, and he urges people to come for the sake of enjoyment. The unique nature of the theatre puts its own limitations upon the kind of shows that can be presented, and Mr. Tomarello, acknowledging such problems as noise and limited rehersal time and space, said that such limitations should be taken into consideration by both audiences and critics.

He was pleasantly surprised by the amount of talent in Kingston, but expressed concern over the general inability of many people to offer adequate auditions, and cited as general examples those who came shabbily dressed for show girl parts in musicals, and who seemed surprised when asked to sing!

Mr. Tomarello believes that his main talent lies in directing musicals, and this year he is offering "You're a Good Man, Charlie Brown', 'Gypsy', and 'The Man of La Mancha'. In the past the remaining two shows have been entrusted to guest directors, but this year Mr. Tomarello is also directing 'Last of the Red Hot Lovers' and 'Forty Carats'.

He closed the interview by saying that he hoped the Tent would continue its association with Kingston, and assured me that it would definitely be back next year.

I was surprised when, 24 hours after this interview, a member of the Tent staff, at the instigation of Dianne Saelman, Mr. Tomarello's Business Manager, telephoned the Journal to demand a formal apology - the interviewer had been intimidating she said. If this were so, why was I allowed to stay for an hour and a half? Mr. Tomarello was not under any obligation to be interviewed - why was I not asked to leave.

Minature-sized art show

In a small van outside the Student Union, Tuesday and Wednesday this week, American artist Steve Kek is exhibiting an unusual collection of his Jewel Sized painting, prints and sculptures. Mr. Kek is touring the universities of Eastern Canada and the United States as an exponent not only of his own tiny paintings but of the ecology movement which he claims to have helped to begin by using as his subjects birds and landscapes which are being mutilated and destroyed by our technological environment.

Mr. Kek is exploring through his work the effects of "rapid perception" on his audience, for he states that since the advent of television, most people are able to observe small pieces of visual stimulae quickly and can take in any number of images which are worked into a composition.

Jewel sized painting although a rare form of expression is not altogether new, however it is getting its second awakening. Miniatures were painted during the Medieval ages, he claims but are still very hard to locate.

Mr. Kek is extremely versatile in his art. His paintings reflect a panorama of artistic forms and ages, from the impressionists to what he calls "cine-painting", series of paintings done during a trip from Buenos Aires to the U.S. which is being documented on film. He uses uncanny materials, including the material used by dentists for filling teeth, and computer cards.

Born in North Carolina, Mr. Kek has a studio in New York

From some of the conversations I heard during the past week, it is evident that professors begin summer courses in much the same way as they do winter courses. The primary ingredient in the first lecture of each course is intimidation.

Faculty members do this because it is apparently the dream of most of them to teach a small class of brilliant people. They realize that the enrolment in every class will have given percentages of bright, average, and dull people, and it is their intent, sometimes subconsciously, to scare the average and dull students away and have a great time with the bright ones.

Thus, they begin their course with a statement of what the course will be about, in which they make it sound difficult, ascetic, and totally devoid of interest for any but masochists.

As near as I can recall, there are two methods of intimidation. The first is straightforward, and sounds something like the following.

"Good morning ladies and gentlemen. My name is Professor W. E. Ardure. I am here to attempt to teach you, miserable lot that you are, Dutch History. I am well prepared for this, and I might say that I am the only one here who is prepared for anything, by nature of my extensive education. I received my first degree from Harvard, my masters from Toronto, my doctorate from the Hague, and have spent five years as a Fellow at the Silesian Institute for the study of Dutch Historical Artifacts. My reason for telling you these things is to point out that I am qualified for considering the material in this course, which point, I might say, renders me unique in this class.

"Now, for some of you, the duration of this course will be six weeks. For most of you it will be either two days or two years. I have distributed the reading list for the course. It is divided into two sections. The first, which contains two titles, lists books we will use which have been written in English. The first book there, Der Kwoegen's 27 volume History of the Netherlands, will be the subject of an examination later this week.

"The second section lists the books we will use which have been written in Dutch or German. I have termed this list optional, which means that you only have to read half of the 124 books. To make sure you are keeping up to date on the reading, I will ask you for a short book review on each, not to exceed 4000 words per review.

"I believe in examinations, and thus we will have one each day. I will lecture for the first hour of each two hour class, and you will write the examination during the second hour. Each exam will consist of three essay questions, which answers will be of about 1000 words in length."

This introduction is accompanied by looks of panic in student eyes, followed by large scale exits. The original class is severely depleted the next day, the initial 50 students being trimmed to a manageable six.

The rest of the students appear in the class of the professor who has used a more subtle process of intimidation. He has a greater understanding of the human mind, and a massive enjoyment of manipulation, and thus plays at the subconscious fears of students. His introduction, as best I can recall, goes as follows.

"Hi. My name is Frank Leman, and I want you to call me Frank, or Franky if you wish. We are going to be looking at a bit of Dutch history together. I have done a bit of study in the area, but we're all in this together, so don't think I'm the expert. We'll just sit back and wing it, if you take my meaning.

"Hey! Do you people find these surroundings as intimidating as I do. I say that we shouldn't meet here, but instead we should "get it on" together in the pub, or perhaps in someone's apartment. Maybe this girl here in the front row, yes you sweetheart, will volunteer her apartment.

"I think if we just got to know each other a little better before we started, we could really get this Dutch history bag into our groove, can you dig it? I mean, we could just meet in this lovely young thing's house, and really get to know each other. Really pick each other's minds.

"One method I found useful when I was in graduate school was for the class to act as a sensitivity group. We would all get together and sit around naked, and just pick each other's minds, if you know what I mean. And instead of getting right into that stodgy Dutch history, we would each tell about the most frustrating thing that had ever happened to us. We would dredge up all of our problems, and really bare our souls to one another.

"So lets all get together tonight at this delightful girl's house. Everyone come prepared to tell of the most inhuman and depraved thought that you ever had, as a starter. Let's face it gang, we are never going to beat Dutch history until we beat that monster in our head."

Well, of course, that night there would be one locked apartment and 49 students filling out re-registration forms. The professor would find the next day that all of the students had vacated his course, and would collect a nice summer salary at the Picton marina.

Either method is of great value to faculty members in clearing out deadwood. The first is less precise than the second, and certainly less contributory to student insanity. Both, however, are well used, and have proven successful.

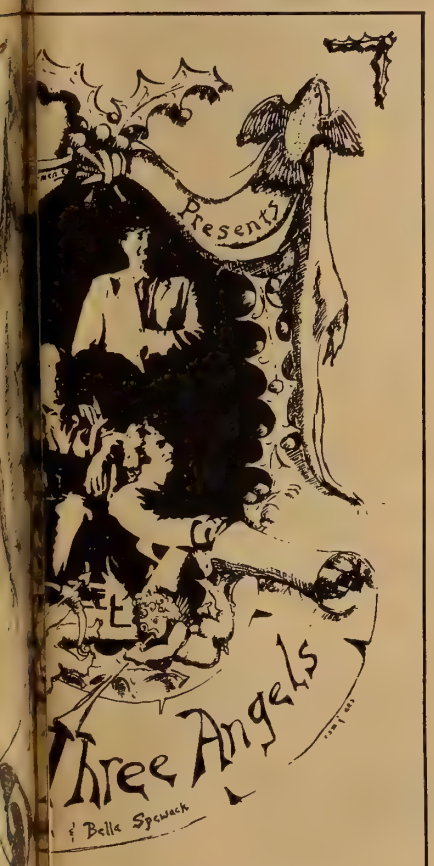
pensons-y

La lecture de l'article "Pensons-y" de Robert Choquette dans le dernier numero de votre journal ressemble à un magnifique sermon qui fait plaisir à entendre de temps a autre afin de se donner bonne conscience.

Au fait, pourquoi une Semaine du Canada? M. Robert Choquette devrait y penser un peu plus profondément. C'est curieux que les Canadiens ressentent tout a coup le besoin de célébrer une Semaine du Canada après un centenaire d'existence! Cela me rappelle trop le dévoilement de notre drapeau canadien qui semblait prôner le même sentiment subit mais tardif de fierté nationale.

La Semaine du Canada tout comme le drapeau canadien sont beaucoup plus dis symptômes de l'effritement du canadianisme. C'est un peu comme le crémage que l'on met sur un gâteau défraîchi. Au début, on peut s'imaginer que le gâteau sera delicieux mais, tôt ou tard, on découvre que les apparences sont souvent trompeuses. Il faut se méfier de ces charlatans ou de ces pseudo-prophètes qui nous déclament que tout va pour le mieux dans le meilleur des mondes.

La Semaine du Canada m'apparait, donc, avant tout comme étant un masque qui cache superficiellement une désintegration du Canada (désintegration inévitable à plus ou moins brève échéance) plutôt que d'être l'expression spontanie d'un vif sentiment de solidarité nationale.



Ainsi, lorsque M. Choquette déclare que "cette Semaine du Canada doit être une preuve d'optimisme, une profession de foi, un témoignage de confiance en l'avenir du Canada qui est nôtre". L'auteur semble oublier ce fait très important, à savoir que les Québecois n'ont jamais été vraiment chez eux à l'intérieur du Canada. Cependant depuis la naissance de la Confédération (1867), les Québecois ont toujours essayé de s'identifier avec ce nouvel état, mais jamais (et cela depuis plus de cent ans) ce rêve tant caressé par nos aieux devait se réaliser.

Or ce qui est vraiment nôtre, c'est le Qébec, i.e. cet état francophone qui actuellement est en pleine phase de structuration et de naturation C'est pourquoi cette Semaine du Canada capte si peu l'attention et suscite si peu d'intérêt dans l'âme des Québécois. Elle (la Semaine du Canada) n'éveille que de lointains souvenirs et d'anciens rêves.

Essayer d'y penser ce serait vouloir ressusciter une fois de plus en nous de stériles illusions. Essayer d'y penser bref, c'est nous forcé à ne plus y penser. Notre fête nationale c'est le 24 juin et non le ler juillet. A propos, ce sera pour quand la Semaine du Québec? Pensons-y car ce ne sera certainement pas d'autres personnes qui le feront à notre place.

WORLD - McGovern Nominated

MIAMI BEACH - Senator McGovern seems assured of the US Democratic presidential nomination following the withdrawal Tuesday of his two chief opponents. Senators Humphrey and Muskie announced that they would not stand for nomination after pro-McGovern forces scored a significant victory Monday night, overturning a credentials committee ruling which had deprived McGovern of 151 California delegates.

TOKYO - Trade minister Kakuei Tanaka was elected Prime Minister of Japan by the ruling Liberal-Democratic Party, replacing Eisaku Sata who retired after almost eight years. Foreign Minister Fakuda who was favoured by Sato was Tanaka's closest challenger.

BELFAST - The IRA broke off its cease-fire with the British Army on Sunday. After the end of the truce, bombings and shootings resumed with more vigour than before. Seven people were killed on Sunday including a catholic priest. Fears are mounting that an all-out civil war may develop between the IRA and the protestant extremists.

NEW YORK - In a surprise move the National Hockey League signed a 3 year $7 million contract with NBC for US hockey broadcasts. For the past 5 years the NHL has been dealing with CBS.

SAN FRANCISCO - US Federal Agents stormed a Pacific Southwest Airline jet at San Francisco which with 81 passengers, was being held by two hijackers demanding $800,000, parachutes and passage to Siberia. The FBI agents shot and killed both hijackers but not before the hijackers shot three passengers, one, Stanley Carter of Montreal, fatally.

Canada - Millhaven Jailbreak

MILLHAVEN - Fourteen prisoners escaped from the new maximum security prison at Millhaven Monday night in Canada's biggest jailbreak in memory. The 14 cut their way through two wire fences shortly after a softball game. Poor lighting along the perimeter fence of the prison, claimed by many to be virtually escape-proof, was blamed for the escape. Police immediately set up roadblocks, and even stopped a train, and searched the area. By Tuesday night five of the excapees had been recaptured.

KINGSTON - Preliminary information from Statistics Canada shows that the population of Kingston increased by 43 to 59,047 between 1966 and 1971. Kingston Township experienced much greater growth but the figures have not yet been released.

KINGSTON - The provincial government has agreed to provide $500,000 to aid in land aquisition if Kingston is successful in its bid the host the sailing events of the 1976 olympics.

QUEBEC - Quebec Justice Minister Choquette introduced legislation last Tuesday giving the police commission wider powers including the right to search on its own warrant, and to hear private testimony to aid in combatting organized crime. Federal Justice Minister Lang declined comment until his officials have studied the proposed bill.

OTTAWA - Former Liberal Cabinet Minister Paul Hellyer Friday blocked the governments new family allowance bill by refusing unanimous consent to shorten the private members hour during the last hour before the House adjourned for the summer. The legislation, which would tie family allowance benefits to income can be reconsidered when the House reconvenes in the fall, but many observers expect an election to be called before then.

ST. JOHNS - Former Newfoundland Premier Joey Smallwood was named last week by a Royal Commission as one of three partners in a firm which rented buildings to the provincial liquor Commission at prices considerably above their actual worth. The Commission also claimed that Smallwood owned shares in Brinco, the company that developed Churchill Falls, at the time that his government was negotiating with the company. Smallwood had denied all the charges in connection with the liquor commission. He admits to owning Brinco shares but claims he has sold them, and is in debt as a result of the transactions.

KINGSTON - Providing Kingston will spend $138,000 for improvements the federal government will spend several hundred thousand dollars upgrading the Kingston airport, includind lengthening the runway to 5000 feet - adequate for executive jets. Grant increase is called inadequate by principal Government support to Ontario universities will increase next year -- but not as much as costs will, according to Queen's principal Dr. John J. Deutsch.

The "Basic Income Unit", the arbitrary figure on which government support is based, will be set at $1825 for 1973-74, the Ontario government announced on July 12. This represents a 3.4 per cent increase from the 1972-73 value of $1765.

"The increase is likely to be less than our increase in costs," Deutsch stated. "The tempo of the increases is running in excess of that figure (3.4 per cent) and it's hard to see any amelioration."

As a result, Deutsch said, "our real resources are decreasing."

More than 80 per cent of what Queen's spends goes for wages and salaries, Deutsch said. Wage and salary indexes are rising considerably faster than the 3.4 per cent, which is roughly keeping pace with the Consumer Price Index.

The statement in which George Kerr, minister of colleges and universities, announced the BIU rate for 1973-74 emphasized Ontario's commitment to post-secondary education: "This announcement, which comes in a period of great fiscal restraint, should indicate to you our strong and continuing commitment in this area."

Commenting on this statement, Deutsch remarked, "I must take it for what it says."

He continued, "It must imply that something worse could have happened. It isn't as bad as the rumour!"

There is, Deutsch said, "a feeling on the part of quite a few people that too much money is being spent on post-secondary education. This has been clear in the events of the past year."

Those events included the presentation of a stunning preliminary report by the government's high-powered "Wright Commission" on post-secondary education, which called for much tighter government control over universities. Deutsch is a member of that commission, but is known to disagree with much of what the preliminary report said.

Also this year came a sharp drop in hard governmental support -- the BIU for 1972-73 is only two per cent above that for the previous year, a figure which runs far behind cost increases.

The 3.4 per cent increase "will enable the colleges and the universities to maintain present standards of excellence and at the same time provide incentives for efficiency," Kerr's statement said.

It will, furthermore, mean an increase of about 9 per cent in total government grants to universities, taking enrollment changes into account, the statement said. The increase for community colleges will be even larger.

Deutsch would not predict whether the 1973-74 BIU level meant Queen's would have a third straight year with a deficit budget. He pointed out that spending reviews are going on continuously and that a budget for that year has not yet been drawn up.

Cutbacks will be necessary somewhere, he admitted. "Some thought has been given to areas which seem to be not as urgent as they were. We have to keep in mind the overall balance of the university, but as a matter of policy, not automatically."

He said this approach was reflected in the December report of a special study committee in the faculty of arts and science. That committee touched gingerly on the possibility of eliminating departments or programmes or cutting back substantially in certain areas, particularly ones in which enrollment is declining and costs are high.

"We may go so far as to consider the possibility of people teaching in other departments," Deutsch said Monday.

Shifts in financial emphasis, Deutsch siad, would have to be arranged to do "the least damage to our main purpose.

"Teaching, scholarship and research -- this is our work."

Although government support is not the only source of operating funds for Queen's, Deutsch said, it is the major one (about 80 per cent). Private gifts continue to come in -- "we get more than most people, actually" -- but "it's getting more and more difficult in the passing years."

He pointed out that the recent capital fund drive, aimed at collecting $6.5 million in donations from alumni and friends of the university, reached its goal only with "quite a struggle, even for Queen's".

In a time of financial stringency, the principal said, "We'll try to keep up the academic standards to the limit, of course. But only time will tell that story."

Editorial: summer students' role

The executive of the Queen's Summer School Association voted on Monday not to accept a proposal from The Journal to include their weekly bulletin, Quassa, as a page in each week's Journal.

They might have saved some money by doing so; more important, maybe, they might have reduced some confusion, and provided an important point of contact between summer school students -- here for six frantic weeks -- and the people who inhabit Queen's year-round.

They chose not do so. We're sorry, but that's how it is.

Maybe it was an administrative decision, and in that case we can't complain. But we think it was a political decision by a hard core of summer school students who want nothing to do with the rest of Queen's University. And we can complain about that a great deal.

Queen's is a year-round university -- it made a great point of that in its annual brief to the Ontario government last fall. The buildings are the same all year round; so are the professors, the administrators, the regulations. Increasingly, so are the students. Intersession demonstrated that fact, and so does the rising percentage of summer school enrollees who are winter students as well. With the incoming requirement that new Ontario teachers be university graduates, it is a matter of time until teachers make up a far smaller segment of summer school. "Summer school students" will soon mean just that -- students who happen to be at school in the summer.

This paragraph appeared in last week's issue of Quassa:

There's talk of winter students trying to take over the running of summer school activities. It's said they can do it by raising 30 people to vote in their members at the annual meeting on July 26. (Usual attendance of extension students at this meeting runs about 10 to 15.)

That would be a very drastic tactic, with little reason and little change of achieving a useful purpose. Takeovers usually mean the substitution of one clique for another.

But, summer school students will have to accept that they are part of Queen's. Where they receive benefits, they will have to pay. Where they study, they will have to share in the hard work that makes planning possible. And where they are discriminated against, where they suffer from "second-class citizenship" and shoddy services, they will have to holler until they are heard.

Winter students did the same thing long ago, beginning in 1858 when the AMS was formed. An alliance of summer school students with the AMS, whatever structural form it takes, is the correct route to a peaceful amalgamation of summer school into Queen's. And we hope it will start this summer.

Meditators await Maharishi's arrival on Leonard Field

By Sue Bourbonniere

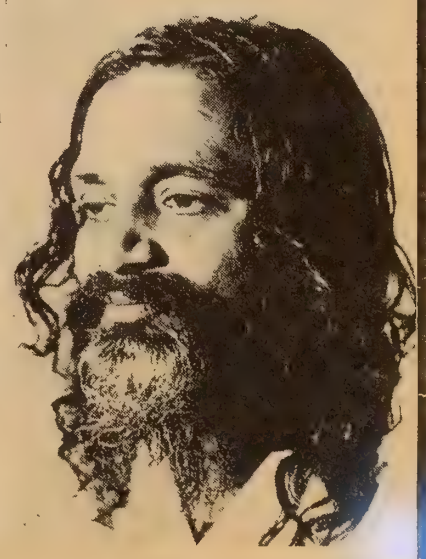
One thousand people from the Students International Meditation Society have converged on Queen's for a month long symposium. They have come from across Canada, the United States, South America and Britain to explore with Maharishi Mahesh Yogi the validity of the Science of Creative Intelligence. The Maharishi will arrive at the end of July. His science in concerned with finding the common basis creativity in all people.

He sees specialization and the lack of co-ordination between all fields of knowledge as a threat to the individual and to social progress because we still are not aware of the common basis of creativity.

His technique of meditation is designed to allow each person to rise to his highest potential and utilize his brain fully. It involves putting the brain in the fourth state of deepest rest, which is the forerunner of more dynamic action.

Many Psychologists admit that meditation does reduce anxiety and that meditators are more self actualized, more energetic.

This is the Maharishi's first visit to Canada since 1968. At that time he presided over a meditation course at Lake Louise.



Is is difficult today to find residences anywhere which are large enough to accomodate the growing number of people who wish to hear the Maharishi. This winter 4000 attended courses in Spain and Italy. As many as 8000 are likely to attend that course this winter. The Maharishi is presently speaking to gatherings in Norway and Britain.

Before his arrival the students whose average age is 23 are studying a course he laid out. It entails study groups with a lecturer trained in the teaching method and colour video tapes recorded by Maharishi this spring in Italy.

Many eminent speakers have been invited to address the group. These include Marshal McLuhan, noted for his books on communications and the mind such as Understanding Media and the Medium is the Message, the medical scientist Dr. Hans Selye, geneticist Davis Suzuki, Dr. Solbert Permutt of John Hopkins, New Zealand biologist Dr. Fulton Fisher, Neurologist Dr. John Wada and Dr. Harry Brody Professor and Head of Obstetrics and Gynaecology at the University of Calgary.

Most of the students have never met the Maharishi. One girl said she had come because "I have been told that SCI will give me a new way of thinking and learning, a finer state of awareness and the ability to use a fuller value of creative intelligence. I hope it works."

SCI is already a credit course in a number of U.S. universities, among them Stanford and Yale. It has been presented in the Continuing Education departments of the Universities of Victoria, Ottawa and Simon Fraser.

Outlook faces staff shortage

Camp Outlook may be forced to cancel three scheduled trips because of lack of staff, Peter Dalziel, program Supervisor told the Journal.

The camp provides free canoe trips for young people twelve to seventeen years old who might not otherwise have the chance to see Northern Ontario. Campers are referred to Outlook from various social agencies including the Guidance Counciling service of the Board of Education, Probation services, North Kingston Parish and the Psychiatric Hospital.

Outlook was surprised to hear last spring that they would not receive a grant. Graham Deline, District OFY Project Officer told them that the Kingston community should support the Project and that of the 99 proposals received from the Kingston area, only 11 could be accepted. He also indicated that the Government does not wish to support second year projects, but rather to encourage new projects.

Without a grant, the quality of the program has been severely jeopardized. Plans for improvements have either been scrapped or paid for by the staff of Outlook. A staff shortage has arisen because many students require a paying job in order to support themselves through school.

The community already supports Outlook with up to $10,000 in private donations. An additional grant from the Federal Government would have enabled the camp to continue and develop for at least three years, but now the programs future operation will face severe difficulties.

Outlook provides a valuable public service and it is unfortunate that its success is being hindered and discouraged.

newsbriefs

New artist in residence

The university has announced the new position to be held by Ralph Allen, whose resignation as director of Agnes Etherington Art Centre was reported in The Journal on June 22.

A university press release Friday said Allen would become the university's Artist in Residence effective September 1. He will also be a full professor in the department of art history and carry out part-time duties there.

Commenting on Allen's resignation after seven years as director of Agnes, Queen's principal Dr. John J. Deutsch said in his statement that "The Art Centre has been firmly established, not only as an impressive asset to both the University and Kingston community, but also as an institution having an excellent national reputation."

Queen's legal aid gets grant

The Legal Aid Society run by Queen's University law students will receive a $10,000 grant from the Federal Department of Justice.

Queen's law student Paul Abell said that technically the legal aid service is a "creature of the provincial government" but the province will only fund two students and a part time secretary.

The federal grant was awarded under the program of grants to community legal services projects announced in April by the department.

Funds for the legal aid service which began in 1970 have been gathered from many sources, said Abell.

Four students are financed by an Opportunities for Youth grant, one by the Provincial government and allotments for a secretary gathered from the two sources have been pooled to hire another law student.

Last year, they were given $1,500 by the Alma Mater Society.

Job bank makes progress

By the end of June, Job Bank, a non-profit job referal agency run by the AMS and the University, had placed 595 students in full and part-time positions. Applications are mainly from Queen's students, but a few students from high schools and St. Lawrence College have been placed in jobs. Job Bank has been unable to fill 122 positions, mostly babysitting and Mothers' helpers.

To award more bursaries

In 1973 Queen's will award 30 entrance bursaries of $300 each to students from the Yukon and Northwest Territories and the eight provinces other than Ontario and Quebec.

The bursaries will be open to Canadian citizens and landed immigrants and will be awarded on the basis of merit and need. They will be alloted in proportion to the population of the areas: Yukon and the Northwest Territories 1; British Columbia, 8; Alberta, 6; Saskatchewan, 4; Manitoba, 4; and Atlantic Privinces, 7.

AMS opposes strike

Queen's studer leaders will tell students fro1 other Ontario universities o1 Monday that Queen's will not take part in a student fee strike which has been proposed for September.

A meeting of the Ontario Federation of Students, scheduled for Monday in Toronto, will discuss the strike proposal, which has support in varying degrees from student councils at several of Ontario's fourteen provincially supported universities.

The strike would be in protest against fee hikes, announced in the Ontario government's March budget, which will bring undergraduate fees from $500 to $600 and graduate fees from $500 to $877 next year.

Alma Mater Society vice-president Wally Palmer, who will lead the Queen's delegation, said Queen's would speak and vote against a protest in which students were asked not to pay fees in September.

But, he said, Queen's might support a compromise proposal asking students to pay their fees in the two installments which regulations allow.

This would leave ample time between the September first installment and the January second installment due date for the AMS to discuss with students whether they wanted to conduct a strike in January.

Student Councillers at The University of Toronto last week adopted the same policy.

Palmer, and AMS president LeBlanc, have pointed out repeatedly that a fee strike will hurt the universities, rather than the government, and would tend to alienate the general public from student concerns.

Palmer will also take to the OFS conference a resolution sparked by a Journal investigative story of June 15, in which The Journal pointed out that the Ontario government is about to abolish the "stipend" of $37.50 or $50.00 per week paid to rehab therapy students on their summer work terms.

The resolution, which Queen's will introduce, and which is expected to pass, will put the OFS on record as opposed to the removal of the stipend and in favour of an increase to levels of $43.50 and $58.00 recommended by the therapists' professional associations.

All rehab students must fulfill the summer internship requirements after their second and third academic years. Three Ontario universities - Queen's, Toronto and Western - have rehab schools.

The resolution will put the potential support of almost 100,000 Ontario university students behind the individual complaints of rehab students and the protest which the Rehab Therapy Society at Queen's is trying to organize.

Heffalump has been renamed

The Heffalump, the AMS-owned craft shop Princess Street which has suffered financial ups, downs and tumbles over the past year has settled on its new name: Tumblewood Craft Shop.

Two weeks ago shop officials reported that they had decided to rename the store The Lumpe, but Monday that was out and Tumblewood was official.

Heffalump-cum-Tumblewood is completing its first year of operation as an AMS-owned retail outlet in downtown Kingston. Its original name came from Winnie the Pooh, where it is apparently A. A. Milne's word for a child's mispronunciation of "elephant". Last year store manager Jane Corkin was informed by a lawyer's letter that the store was violating copyright by using the name, which -- with the rest of the Pooh stories -- legally belongs to Walt Disney and Simpsons-Sears.

Miss Corkin had the AMS lawyer check into the question, arguing that Pooh must be in the public domain, but he reported that Simpsons-Sears' lawyer was correct and that the store name would have to be changed.

Miss Corkin then ran a contest to pick a new name. Entry forms were placed in The Journal, and a great many suggestions were received. The Tumblewood name was suggested by a group of people Miss Corkin described as "friends of the Heffalump"; they have declined the prize offered for the winning name, a hand-made leather vest.

Other names strongly considered were Lohengrin, Xanadu, and Woozle Works (the last being a new echo of Winnie the Pooh). The people who made those suggestions will be contacted by Tumblewood and invited to select merchandise prizes each worth one-third the value of the vest.

As the store enters its second year of operation, Miss Corkin said, it is hoping not to receive letters from coyyrighted Tumblewoods. But for the AMS boutique and its staff, crises are getting to be the crustomary proseedcake.

Happiness is You're a Good Man, Charlie Brown

by Marney Cousins

The exuberance of the Peanuts gang is a cantagion which is happily caught by all present this week at The St. Lawrence Summer Playhouse. Charles Schultz's six cartoon characters are so subtely inturned in this musical comedy that t charm and simplicity of their actions d dialogues captures the whole audience.

The price of admission alon is worth seeing the supper time song d dance routine of Snoopy, played by Glen er. It is hard to imagine this world reno ed dog brought to life, but Piper's high ener level, intricate dance routines, and obvio enjoyment in his role dispel any doubts as to Snoopy's existance.

Cindy Walls is the perfect Lucy. Her jaw set at right angles to everyone, her decisive stride on and off stage, even the handling of her baseball mitt, all establish Lucy as the leading lady. Miss Walls is continually in control as evidenced in her strong musical solos and clearly delivered lines.

Charlie Brown escapes becoming a pathetic figure through Norman Campbell's portrayal. His failures and successes are ones that the audience can identify with. His air of dejection is not one of failure, but rather of disappointment. When the kite finally flies we believe it. Charlie Brown can succeed!

It was just another quiet evening at home for Ethel and Egbert and their dog Rover. Ordinarily, all three might have watched 10-pin bowling classics on the tube, but something was on-the-bum, and Ethel's brother--the repairman--refused to make house calls. Ethel was about to clear the TV dinner plates from the table when the paperboy arrived with the Kingston Frigging Standard.

In a flash, (read crash) Rover was on his feet to fetch the Frig. This was a trick which Egbert had been teaching him spasmodically throughout the dog's thirteen year life. Rover had almost mastered it. The only problem could be traced to an excess of eagerness on the part of the puppy. Rover had an acute bladder problem, which was activated with excitement. To top this off, he inevitably returned carrying a paper which was covered with slobber and filled with teeth marks. But there was still hope. As the years rolled by, there seemed to be fewer and fewer chew holes (although more drool). Egbert possessed the necessary insight to connect this improvement with the dog's progress and to discount Ethel's suggestion that it had anything to do with the fact that the dog was losing his teeth.

In any event, Rover returned bearing a moderately chewed and thoroughly soaked Frig. in his mouth. Egbert patted the dog on the head with approval, smiled sheepishly at Ethel, and mumbled generalities to himself. He removed the 'frigging thing' from the dog's mouth. The sports section and the comic page were beyond recognition, so Egbert wandered aimlessly through the pages. Eventually he came upon an yellowing headline ... MORAL: If you might as well wat vice-versa)

by Murray G. Hall

All in all, Kingston's Theatre 5 group presented a commendable performance of La Reigen, by Arthur Schnitzler (1862-1931) on July 13th, 1972. The opening night, Thursday 1862, the son of a Schnitzler, born in Vienna, Austria by profession physician, was also a friend of Freud and quite and a confrere of Freud's writings in the first familiar with the 20th century. Schnitzler decade of the 19th figure of the "Jung-was also a member of a predominantly Jewish Wiener-Kreis which frequented Viennese literary circles around the turn of the century. coffee house. An authorized English translation of The Reigen, entitled Hands Around Schnitzler Theatre 5), was printed privately (not for sale) in New York in 1929 for members of the Schnitzler Society in a limited printing of only 1,000 numbered copies. Similarly, Schnitzler's misgivings on the marketability of Reigen in Vienna in 1900 led him to have a mere 200 copies of the manuscript printed at his own expense for distribution to his friends only. While writing the play during the winter of 1896-97, Schnitzler remarked that there had never been anything as impossible to put on the stage. Long before Schnitzler's series of ten dialogues was premiered in Berlin in late 1920, the play was doomed. The published manuscript hit Vienna like a bomb. Book reviewers were extremely hostile, found little artistic merit in it, called Schnitzler immoral and accused him of elevating pornography into the world of art. One review written after the printing of a public edition in 1903 sounded a different note by calling Schnitzler a Jewish exploiter and the play the most disgusting thing ever seen in a theatre. It was, the reviewer continued, the duty of the Viennese Catholics to unite in a strong protest against it.

Two weeks after the premiere in Vienna in 1921 and in the midst of an organized scandal, further performances were forbidden by police in the interest of public law and order. A similar fate was in store for the third public performance of Reigen in Berlin several days later. The performance was sabotaged and the presentation led to the trial of the theatre directors and the producer later in the year on the charge of inciting a public scandal. Though the accused were subsequently acquitted, Schnitzler, sceptical of his play ever receiving the artistic discretion necessary for a performance forbade any further presentations. So it has remained since 1922.

As Schnitzler had no control over film versions and no copyright on translations, two French film versions were made. One of Vadim based on a Anouilh and the other 1950 by producer Ma Theatre 5 must be

Profs show their stuff

by Paul Gompertz

My 3 Angels provided a fitting climax to this year's Drama, as professors who have spent all year telling others how it is done, finally got up on stage and showed that they really can do it themselves. The result was a very slick and entertaining show with a very high overall standard.

Fred Euringer and Norma Edwards, as M. and Mme. Ducotel, were the centre piece of the show, for they had their respective characters so intelligently developed and so perfectly under control that they provided a solid focal point around which the remaining characters could weave their somewhat more erratic paths. Without them, the vagaries of the rest of the cast (particularly the 3 angels) would have threatened anarchy; with them, the anarchy was turned to comic dissemination. Both of these actors superceded illusion, and achieved a depth of character seldom seen on the stage at Queen's.

The three angels were a very volatile group upon whose shoulders fell the major comic burden of the play. All of them exuded the amoralism that was essential to belie the more sinister implications of some of the comic possibilities of their roles in different ways. David Kemp wandered amiably in and out on every occasion with gusto. He moved and spoke with delightful animation and demonstrated his comic timing with skilful modulation and expression. Rod Robertson as Jules proved that how and when a line is said can be more important than the line, itself, and presided over his partners with a wry humour and a deeper sensitivity. He paid more attention to characterization than the other two, and projected a far fuller figure that was more than a comic veneer. Tim Chapman as Alfred suffered understandably from the company he was in, and a basically good performance was made to look pale by the comparison. He was never as relaxed as his partners, and did not attain their self-indulgent confidence in his lines. The only failing of these three was that they never aspired to a comic unity; each worked primarily on his own, and they never bonded together to create a comic presence as a trio.

Donna Killoran as Marie Louise Ducotel was effusively adequate, but gave the impression that she was acting by rote. Her melodramatic reactions and gestures were studied, and looked as if they had been painstakingly drilled into her. Her performace was general and learnt, rather than individual and created, and she seemed content to portray a young woman with no personal salient characteristics. As a result, she stood in very painful contrast to her parents, who were full paintings against her shadowy thumb-nail sketch. Her opposite number Frank Smith as Paul, suffered from the same failings, without ever aspiring to Miss Killoran's prophylatic exuberance. Wilf Thomas as Henri Trochard did a magnificent job in daunting company. His indomitable spirit allowed him to spit venom in all directions, without quailing before either his dramatic peers or superiors. Carolyn Hetherington and Graham Bock both performed cameo parts, the former with delightful exageration, the latter with startling prettiness and a slightly different air.

The honours of the night really went to Gavin Semple for an outstanding set which cannot be overpraised. It was superbly imaginative, and ideal from the point of view of both audience and actors. It left all the essential lines of action uncluttered, so that the actors had great freedom of movement, and at the same time gave the impression of chaos which was a necessary concomitant to M. Ducotel's ineffectuality as a store-keeper. So substantial was the set that it transcended the last boundaries of illusion, and created by suggestion both the shop and the garden, which is a very rare feat. It also highlighted the main failure in the earlier production of 'What the Butler Saw' for it aided and abetted the actors where the latter had obstructed and confused them. Imagination and eccentricity are two very different things, and it was imagination and flair that devised this set. It is sad that such a talented designer is leaving, and he will be sorely missed, but what a magnificent swan-song!

My animadversions are not intended in any way to diminish the stature of this production, for no amount of critical investigation of the minutiae can detract from a production that was both skilful and impressively polished.

and the rather creaky revolving stage used to create the carousel nature of the dialogues. The music chosen to create an atmosphere of Vienna in the 1890's--a number of German (Bavarian) beer-drinking songs, including "In Munchen steht ein Hofbrauhaus"--was unfortunate. Here a better choice would have been either Strauss waltzes or "Wiener Schrammelmusik". The between scene delays were understandable for an opening night, but somewhat disturbing was the noise backstage throughout the play.

As strongest actress in the series of dialogues, I would choose Theresa Sears in the role of the Young Wife. The Little Miss came over rather unbelievably, while the Poet and the Count tended to be overly foppish. The best played scene of the ten was the dialogue between the Young Gentleman and the Young Wife.

Following the black out-cum-sexual act of each scene more realism in the appearance of the various characters would be in order--for example, dishevelment of hair and clothing.

The Theatre 5 reading of Reigen lacked sensuality (though the actors attempted to substitute for this sexuality) and was void of the serious or tragic tone so inherent in Schnitzler's view of "la condition humaine". Numerous references to death, the shortness and emptiness of life (for example, by the Whore, the Young Gentleman and the Count) got lost in the humour. The interpretation left the viewer with the feeling that the play was based on a modern-day 'carpe diem' theme rather than a pronouncement on the fate of individuals who are lonely, isolated by choice and despairing. Not clear from the Theatre 5 performance of La Ronde is the fact that Schnitzler has written psychological depth into his ten characters and that these ten scenes are representative of the entire life of the individuals. None of the actors on the stage at the Grand Theatre portrayed his or her character seriously enough. The net effect of Theatre 5's La Ronde is comedy, though this is precisely what Schnitzler's play is not.

To conclude with a minor point, some of the literal translations from the Viennese Schnitzler, such as 'treasure' for 'dear', 'notion' for 'idea' laboured in the English dialogue. In addition, the Count's final remark to the actress at the end of Scene Nine was also rendered incorrectly in the English version: "Ich kuss die Hand, Fraulein" does not mean "I kiss your hand, Miss' in Schnitzler's Viennese dialect, but on the contrary is merely an innocuous polite greeting.

The wonderful world of contests came to my attention the other day. The media has made the contest world blossom as never before, and dictated that contest designers develop a pecular politic to govern their enterprises.

There are, of course, many jokes about contests. There is the one about the contest which offered as first prize two days at the beautiful Mirador Hotel in lovely Napanee. Second prize was a week at the beautiful Mirador Hotel in lovely Napanee, third prize two weeks there, etc.

While reading the local newspaper, the Whig-Standard, I saw an advertisement for a contest run by downtown merchants. By filling out an entry form and enclosing a receipt from one of the supporting stores, it was possible to win a paid vacation for two in the Barbados, or some similar place. In fact, it may have been the Balkans, rather than the Barbados. However, the winner would spend either several days or a week in either the Barbados or the Balkans.

What really caught my attention, however, was one of the qualifying statements in the contests advertisement. If the winning entry did not include a receipt from one of the participating merchants, he would receive a fully paid two day vacation in Toronto.

To my mind, offering someone a two day vacation in Toronto is enough to send anyone interested in the contest racing downtown to buy something at every participating merchant's store. The threat of being sent to Toronto for even two minutes would ensure a booming rise in downtown business. And, of course, when compared with a vacation in the Barbados, or the Balkans, Toronto would seem like an all expenses paid two year respite in Siberia.

Another contest come to light while I was watching the television last week. One of the oil companies was offering a galaxy of prizes through their gas stations. All one had to do was fill out an entry form, and it seemed that the prizes would just start rolling in. Apparently, you didn't even have to buy any gas, although that was suggested.

I decided to take a closer look at this contest, for the prizes seemed truly exciting. I forget what they were now, but it seems there were things like colour televisions, cars, boats, appliances, and blankets.

The advertisement had told me to inquire at any participating dealer. I went into one of the dealers, and asked him about the contest.

"What contest?" he replied.

I told him about the contest, but he hadn't heard of it.

"We ain't participatin' in any contest, bud," he told me. "We have a hard enough time making money around here without a bunch of greedy clowns interupting my pumping and greasing every five minutes. We just ain't interested in being participating dealers."

I went on my way, and found another dealer who looked a little more theatrical and prone to contest participation. I asked if they had any of the contest entry forms, and I was greeted with a steely glance.

"Is that your Ford out there by the gas pump?" the burly attendant demanded.

"No," I replied, "my car is parked across the street."

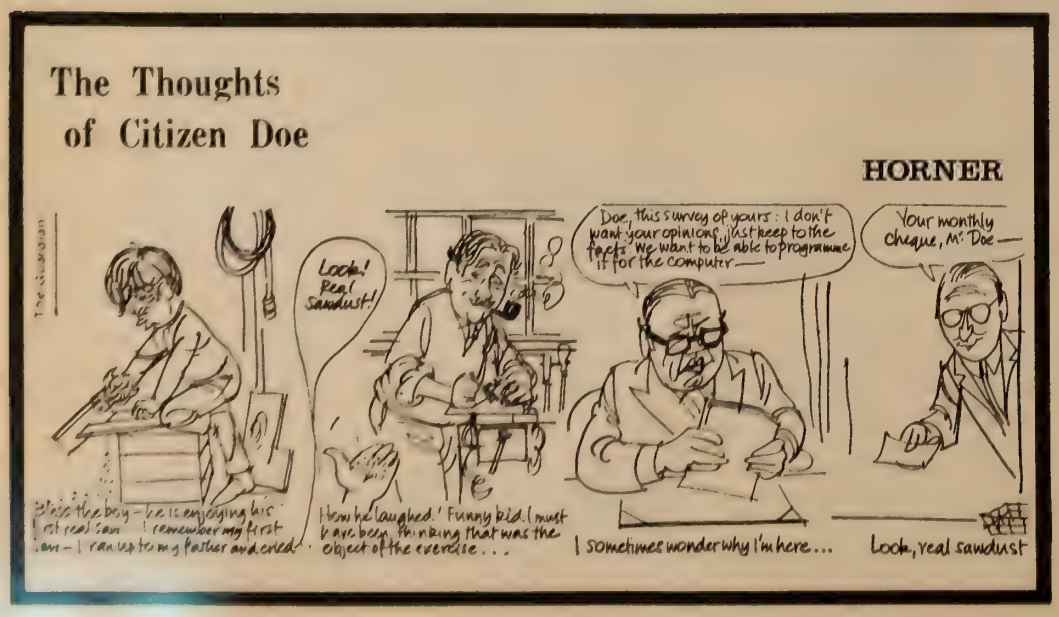
"Well then you don't get an entry form."

"But the advertisement for the contest implied that you didn't have to buy any gas," I told the slowly reddening attendant.

"Listen, pal," he snarled, "I couldn't give a good goddam what the advertisement said. I'm a participating dealer on my terms. You buy the gas or you don't get an entry form."

I looked indignant and told him that I would merely go to another dealer and get my entry form from him. I added that I might even buy some gas from the other dealer, just to make him feel bad.

"Nice try, bud," he said rather triumphantly. "I am the only participating dealer between here and Belleville. We always have just one participating dealer in any area. That way we can set our own terms, and not have to worry about getting undercut by the oposition. It was my turn to participate in this contest."



Seeing defeat staring me in the face, I relented.

"All right," I said, "I'll buy some gas here."

"That isn't good enough, buster," he informed me. "To get an entry form from me you have to buy a full tank of gas, get a lubrication and oil change, have you engine tuned, get your car repainted, and have a new transmission installed. In addition, you will have to man the pumps for four hours while I go home and relax."

I thought his terms to be rather steep, and told him I wasn't interested. He asked me to leave his lot, which I did while he heckled me. I never did enter the contest.

Instead, I went home and watched the baseball game on television. Between the third and fourth inning, there was an advertisement for a great new contest with incredible prizes. I am looking into it now.

Reviewer not monopolized

Dear Editors:

Paul Gompertz's article in last week's Journal was, as per usual, very informative. He has definitely been an asset to the Journal entertainment staff.

Actually, it was the editors' note appearing in his article that bothered us. Referring to Miss Naiman's "occasional reviews" for The Journal -- how is it that the Journal staff is unaware that Miss Naiman is soon to be their entertainment editor? If they are aware, is it their editorial policy to discount staff members in their first moments of public outcry?

Miss Naiman's reviews are often opinionated and contrary to popular acceptance, but that is one aspect that always makes them interesting. If the Tent Theatre is so easily intimidated by forthright criticism, it's their problem. Why, though, is The Journal just so easily intimidated?

Lee and Paula David

(Editors' note: Advance to Go and collect $200. Miss Sandy Naiman will, indeed, be entertainment editor of The Journal beginning in September. The only point of last week's editorial note was to indicate that she also wrote for The Kingston Whig-Standard and that what she writes for them does not concern The Journal. We'll be happy to have her -- opinionated or not.)

Why are fees so high?

Dear Editors:

Thumbing through some COU reports the other day, I chanced upon some interesting information for Queen's students. According to a February 1972 report of the Committee of Financial Officers, Universities of Ontario, Queen's spends, as a percentage of its operating expenses, the lowest sum in Ontario on student services, namely 0.7 percent. The next lowest are U. of T, spending 1.4 percent, and UWO, 1.8 percent -- twice what we spend. The highest spend seven times more -- 5.1 percent at Laurentian and 5.0 percent at Waterloo.

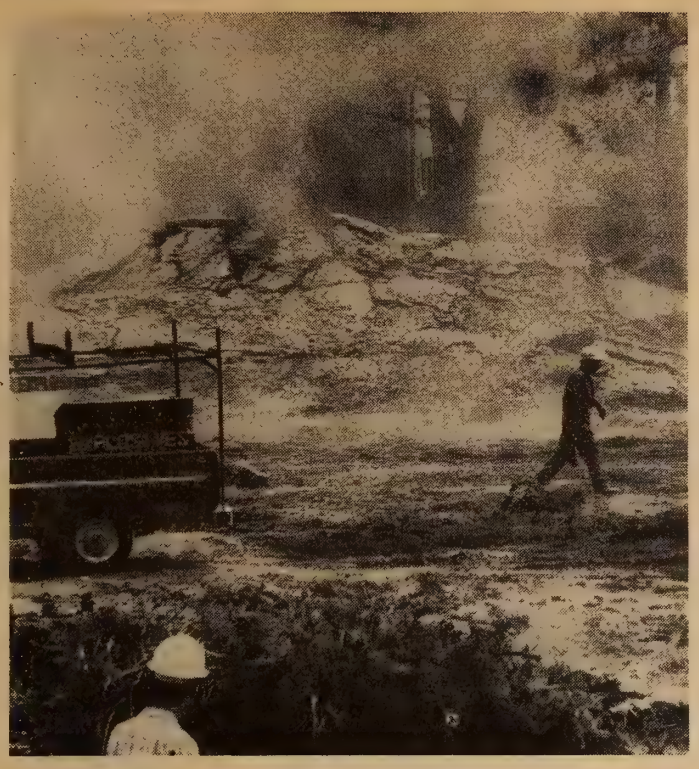
Student services are defined as "Services provided to students by the university outside of normal teaching, research and administrative services, which are provided at no specific charge or where a charge is included in the incidental fee structure of the university. This will include Health Services, Counselling, Athletics, Dean of Men or Women, Placement Services, Student Housing Services, Grants to Student Organizations, Student Programme Costs, e.g., cultural, Student Centre costs, music, drama, etc., . .These do not include student activity fees collected and turned over to Student Councils or Federations where the university is acting in an agency capacity." Consider the following data reported under Student Services for two universities comparable in size to Queen's but with mid-range student services expenditures:

Operating expenses for student services, year ended June 30, 1971, in $000. Salaries and wages: McMaster 537, Queen's 105, York 782. Fringe benefits, McM 51, Q O, Y 64. Furniture and equipment McM 6, Q 1, Y 1. Space rental McM 4, Q 0, Y 1. Operation supplies and expenditures McM 207, Q 3, Y 190. Internal cost allocations McM 0, Q 86, Y 0. Scholarships, bursaries, etc. McM 85, Q 0, Y 0. Miscellaneous McM 21, Q 6, Y 105.

Student services subtotal McMaster 911, Queen's 201, York 1143. Total operating expenses McM 29,488; Queen's 30,500; York 31,001. Student services as a percent McMaster 3.1; Queen's 0.7 York 3.7.

The report makes the general caveat that the comparability in the reporting of financial information requires much further research and analysis due to inter-university differences in accounting procedures, organization, etc. Is this the reason for the above disparities?

Or do the figures explain why Queen's students pay the bill with the highest non-academic fee in Canada?



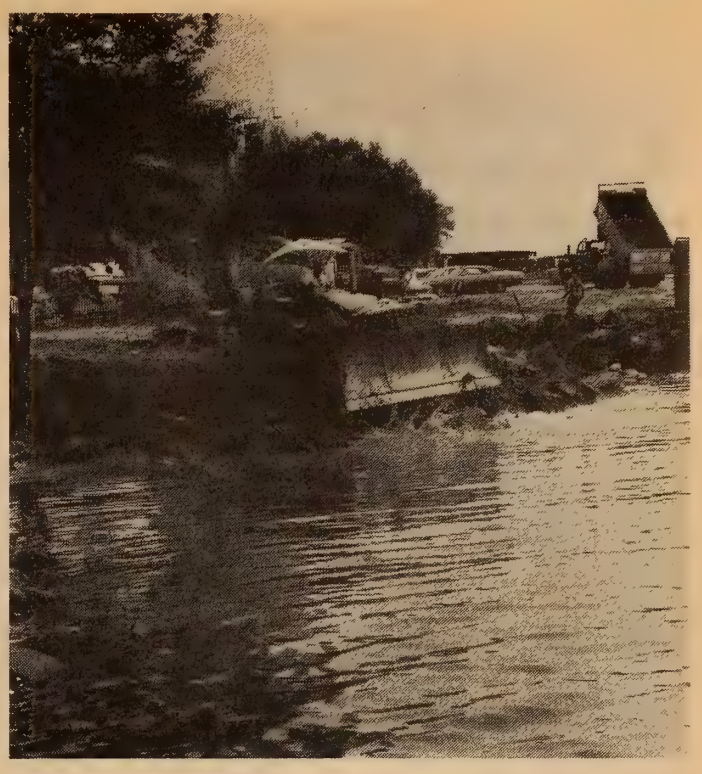
Doug Pritchard

(Editors' note: Mr. Pritchard wrote the above letter as a private individual. However, his general knowledge in the field of university administration is undoubtedly related to the fact that he is president of the Graduate Student Society at Queen's.

Queen's is generally recognized as having the best non-academic services among Ontario universities -- with certain prominent failings, of course. We suspect that the reason for this is a happy combination of two things: the university's willingness to provide student services as an everyday part of its affairs, and the students' willingness to take a share of the burden. Because the university has provided services as a matter of course, they do not always appear in the balance sheets; thus, the newly-established Student Counselling Service has operated for a year under the budget of the department of psychology, and still relies on the aid of highly-paid specialists from other areas of the university.

And because students have always willingly taken a share, Queen's has a high non-academic fee, though not spectacularly high than anyone else's. Every piece of the non-academic fee was put there by student vote, and can be repealed at any time in the same way.

Still, we agree that an explanation of the numerical discrepancies might be very interesting. Since students are well-represented on the senate budget committee and other appropriate bodies, they are in an excellent position to get the information.)



QUEEN'S BUILDS LAKE

An expanded park area including marine lagoons is being built near the Queen's University heating plant.

Rock for this land fill project is being supplied by excavations for the underground parking lot and the medical sciences centre. The rock pile will then be covered with earth from lower campus excavations.

The land belongs to the city of Kingston and the project is the result of a joint agreement between the city and Queen's.

Got a little brother or sister looking for something to do

Got a younger brother or sister who's complaining about the heat and bewailing the fact that "there's nothing to do"? If he or she can generate a little bit of interest and something in the area of $15.00, the Queen's Summer Youth Recreation Program can offer instruction in Springboard Diving, Track and Field, Archery, Trampoline, and Advanced Tennis Skills, starting this Monday, July 24th.

The full program offers a wider range of activities than these, but openings are available only in those listed above. The programs are open to those between the ages of 8 and 18, with the exception of Advanced Tennis and Archery, where the lower limit is 10 years of age.

There are also a limited number of spaces still open in the Senior Red Cross instruction course; this course is limited to persons between the ages of 11 and 18.

The Track and Field program could be of real value to many young competitors in the Kingston area. Brenda Mackie, the current coach of the Queen's women's track team, Margi Myllykangas, and veteran Queen's Trackman Gord Ellis provide top-notch instruction in the basic techniques vital to success in track and field events. Naturally, these skills are best aquired early, so the opportunity to get personal instruction, especially for those of pre-high school age, could be very valuable.

A more unusual program, available in two sections, for those up to 12 and those 12 to 18, is springboard diving. Most young people don't come in contact with springboard diving, particularly in a city like Kingston, where the number of suitable pools is limited, but those that enrolled in the Queen's program during the first session enjoyed themselves immensely.

Both sections are taught by Carla Lennox, and English grad who has been a one-woman diving team for Queen's for the past couple of years. Carla's an excellent teacher, and this goes a long way towards making a skills course like this one worthwhile.

So, if you know somebody who's bored, point them towards Howard Pearce's office (immediately to your left inside the front door of the Phys. Ed. centre) or call 547-6984 for more information. Better hurry though - the program starts Monday.

Une epine dans le talon d'Achille

par Gérard Landau

(Note du rédacteur: M. Landau a répondu à notre invitation que les étudiants d'été écrivent sur le fait canadien. Nous invitons encore des lettres, soit en français, soit en anglais.)

Cet article est une réponse à l'invitation qui a été faite aux étrangers séjournant à Queen's de donner leurs impressions sur le Canada. Il se veut, en même temps, être en quelque sorte le prolongement de deux articles précédemment parus sous le titre de "Pensons-Y".

Il va sans dire que ce qui suit est moins le fruit d'observations studieuses, que d'impressions plus ou moins bien ressenties par un voyageur qui n'est ici que depuis quinze jours, et à qui il manque un très grand nombre d'éléments d'appréciation. Quoi qu'il en soit, il faut tenir comme extrêmement opportune l'occasion qui est donnée, ici, à chacun de s'exprimer, en voyant là une confirmation de la longue tradition d'hospitalité de ce pays.

Un Pays Super-Développé

L'étranger qui arrive ici est frappé par le nombre et l'importance des réalisations témoignant du très haut niveau de vie qu'ont atteint les Canadiens. Dès l'abord, il perçoit qu'il a à faire à un pays super-développé. Cette évidence vous saute aux yeux sitôt que l'on a débarqué. De l'avion, il a accès aux salles de contrôle par des tapis roulants silencieusement ou par de longs et larges couloirs, dans lesquels il se perdrait certainement, s'il n'était pas précédé par d'autres voyageurs. Il n'a à aucun moment l'occasion de toucher l'aine d'atterrissage. Les contrôles de police, et du service de l'immigration se font avec célérité et efficacité et le temps d'attente pour la récupération des bagages est raisonnablement long.

L'ami qui vous attend à la sortie peut perdre un certain temps à chercher l'endroit où il a garé sa voiture. Il semble que ce soit là un trait bien canadien. Les parkings sont en effet immenses et les voitures innombrables et neuves pour la plupart.

Montréal cité, qu'on la survole en avion, ou que l'on parcourt ses artères en voiture, est telle que l'on vous l'a décrite: la grosse ville cosmopolite et moderne. le petit New York canadien.

Le modernisme partout est présent. Très heureusement il n'est pas vraiement envahissant et oppressif comme il l'est ailleurs. Les longs rubans gris cendrés que développent les autoroutes, le fonctionalisme dans l'organisation des services, le fait que chacun ou presque tout le monde mange plus qu'à sa faim — ou a en raison de signaler cela, ici même dans ces colonnes. C'est un fait que l'on ne méditera pas assez, puisque dans d'autres pays, le nombre de ceux qui souffrent et meurent de sous-alimentation demeure terriblement impressionant. Et que faut-il dire lorsque par surcroît il existe dans ces pays une guerre de survie nationale? — tout cela témoigne d'une réussite canadienne.

Réussite matérielle, cela s'entend. Car voilà qu'on apprend qu'il existe un malaise diffus dans la population, que de temps en temps il devient explosif, que les grèves, ici, sont longues et fréquentes et qu'enfin l'on se heurte à l'inévitable question nationale, laquelle me semble devoir se poser à l'échelle du Canada tout entier comme étant la recherche ou le besoin d'une identité nationale.

Pour un Contre une Conscience Nationale?

Il y a diverses manières de poser ce problème, ou plusieurs façons de voir l'épine dans le talon d'Achille. Et il est possible de le faire sans passion. Il est indéniable que la province du Québec possède un très fort sentiment national. L'histoire l'a prédisposée à constituer une communauté se distinguant par des traits originaux, qu'aucune influence étrangère n'a pu effacer. En plus, ce qui est important, il y a au sein de la population une sorte de "consensus" selon lequel "le fait Québécois" existe. Ceci est le sentiment, et il s'exprime à des degrés divers. Les plus sages constatent tout en le regrettant qu'il n'y a pas lieu de transgresser les liens fédéraux. Il n'est pas impossible en effet que l'idée de nation co-existe avec l'idée fédérale D'autres estiment que le nationalisme québécois doit trouver son expression dans l'organisation d'un état structuré et indépendant. Est-ce une aventure? L'aspect économique de la question oblige à la prudence. Etant originaire de la Martinique, il convient que j'évoque le problème des îles françaises de la Caraïbe qui, toutes proportions gardées n'est pas sans avoir certains traits communs avec la situation Québécoise. Ce sont des petites îles. Manifestement, elles ne peuvent se suffire à elles seules. Cependant a apparu au cours des dix dernières années un mouvement de revendication nationale. Le sentiment s'indigne réclame, conteste et fraie le chemin vers plus de pouvoirs politiques. La raison fait hésiter, propose des solutions intermédiaires, s'arrête aux réalités économiques. En définitive, c'est vers une sorte d'autonomie ("self-government") que l'on s'achemine.

Celui qui n'a fait que survoler les problèmes canadiens, se met à espérer qu'ici aussi l'on recherche une solution qui lie le sentiment à la raison.

Il est important de préciser que cette solution ne se trouvera pas en niant le problème, c'est-à-dire le "fait national Québécois", il est tout aussi important de noter que seules la paix et une grande ouverture d'esprit peuvent ménager pour l'avenir les chances d'une collaboration étroite dans le domaine des affaires et du développement économique.

tion n'est pas nécessairement né-

Après tout, cette irritante question faste au Canada tout entier. Le pays, dans ses profondeurs, en réagissant, dans un sens ou dans un autre, ne peut que déboucher sur une plus grande conscience nationale. Il est bien vrai qu'ici les influences étrangères sont trop visibles, que la plus contraiguanté est sans doute celle du puissant voisin dusud. L'on n'est pas sûr que le Canada puisse se contenter seulement de la réussite matérielle, que même si l'histoire de son peuplement a surtout mis l'accent sur l'exploitation de ressources naturelles, il ne doive pas accéder à une identité nationale mieux définie, plus clairement affirmée tant dans le domaine économique, que dans celui de la création artistique et de la culture en général.

A un moment où de nouvelles relations internationales doivent être bâties de manière à encourager chacun à participer au développement du monde, le Canada aurait beaucoup à faire, avec ses immenses possibilités encore neuves s'il exerçait son propre rayonnement. Si l'on peut terminer par un souhait, c'est que ce pays ait un supplément d'âme, c'est-à-dire un supplément d'être. Qu'il naisse véritablement à lui-même. Ce sera sa manière d'extirper l'épine du talon d'Achille. Sur ce point la jeunesse, peut mieux jouer son rôle, c'est qu'elle recherche des lieux avec les jeunes d'autres pays. Nous croyons en effet que c'est en approfondissant sa propre conscience que l'on débouche sur l'Universel.

KINGSTON OFY PROJECTS MEET CRITICISM

Opportunities for Youth grants across Canada, and particularly in Kingston, are under attack by taxpayers and in the prestigious pages of The Globe and Mail.

Kingston's city council has asked that municipalities be consulted when OFY grant money is passed out in future.

And a solid afternoon of telephone calls Tuesday failed to produce a single civil servant in Kingston, Ottawa, Toronto or Kitchener who would admit to knowing anything about any aspect of the OFY programme.

Opportunities for Youth, though there have been grumbles ever since the programme was announced in the spring of 1971, became a hot issue Friday when Toronto's Globe and Mail published a reporter's views on a visit made to Kingston by Graham Deline, a regional coordinator for OFY based in Ottawa. Deline and the reporter visited five OFY projects here one day last week, finding a variety of success and sense among the projects.

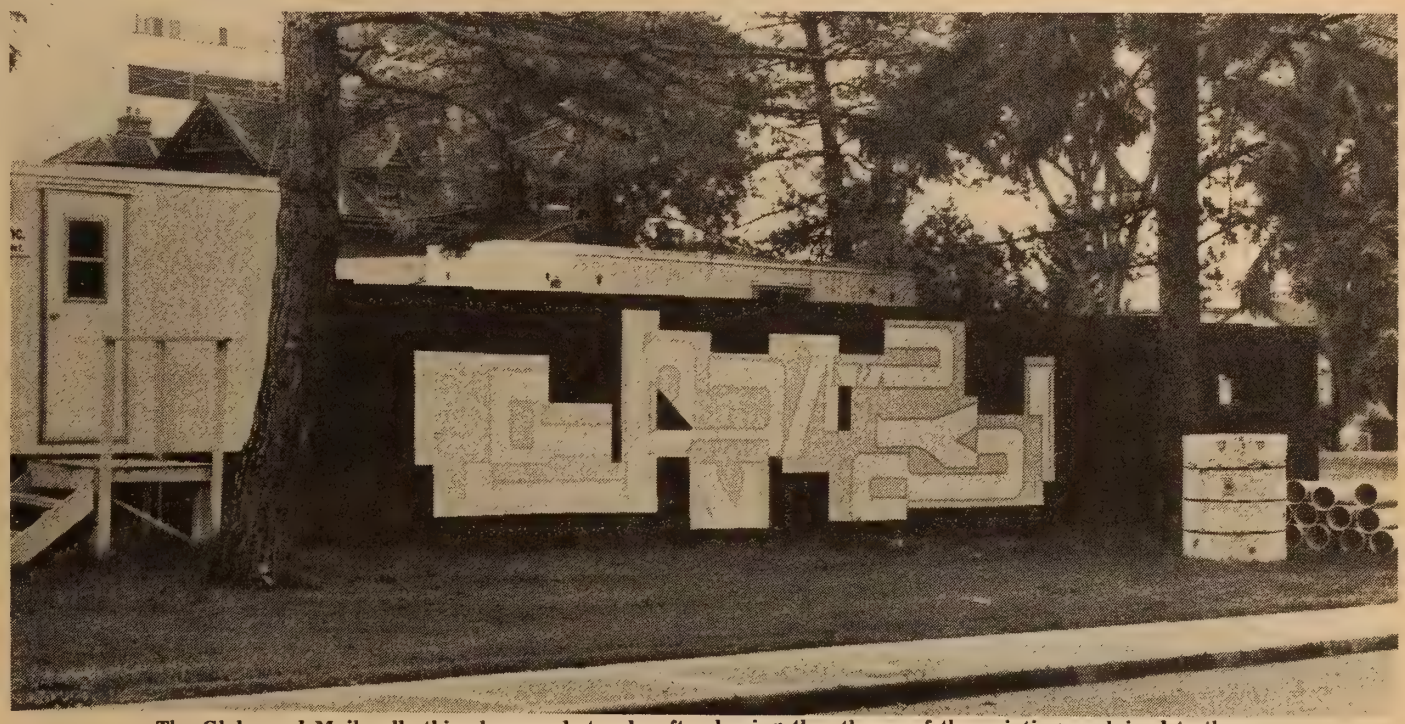
The Globe lashed out at the projects and the programme in its lead editorial Saturday, calling them "slick" and complaining that "the Government is using tax money to divert the young from honest labor".

Tuesday, OFY administrators for the government were curiously unavailable for comment.

Graham Deline, the regional coordinator for this area, was not in his office; his secretary thought he was in Waterloo. The Waterloo OFY office didn't answer its phone; at Kitchener, no one knew of Deline being in the area.

Rob Andras, Jr., a higher-ranking coordinator with a staff of 48 people, was "on vacation" from his Toronto office. His home number was not available. None of the 48 staff members could make any comments about OFY.

David Wroe, placement director for Queen's, was out of town Tuesday. His staff said they knew little or nothing about OFY projects; Wroe has said the same in the past, and has criticized Deline for his unavailability. The man who actually coordinated Kingston-area projects was John Harvey, one of Wroe's staff, who has since resigned.



Returning to the government: the office of secretary of state Gerard Pellettier, which is responsible to Parliament for OFY, had no one who could comment on the project. A liaison officer for the secretary of state, who gave his name as Deglazious, said he could make no comment but would try to find someone who could. No one called back.

Even Globe and Mail reporter Vianney Carriere, who wrote the report which started the controversy, was "on vacation" for at least two weeks, the Globe's city room secretary reported.

Contrasting with the government's failure to comment, however, Kingston OFY groups had plenty to say about the Globe's charges.

OCTOBER VOTE CALLED ON FEE STRIKE

Students at Queen's and across Ontario will vote October 11 and 12 on whether to conduct a strike in protest of government-directed increases in university and college tuition fees.

The referendum, which will follow province-wide study sessions October 10, was called Monday by the Ontario Federation of Students. Delegates representing more than half of Ontario's post-secondary students met in Toronto and passed resolutions protesting the fee hikes and calling for the October vote.

A referendum at Queen's will require the consent of the AMS outer council when it reconvenes in September, but AMS vice-president Wally Palmer, who led the Queen's delegation to Monday's meeting, said he thought that consent would come easily.

The OFS turned down a more drastic proposal, urged by delegates from Carleton and Trent Universities, the University of Ottawa, and Ryerson Polytechnical Institute, demanding that students "strike" in September by refusing to pay fees at all.

Instead, the OFS agreed to ask all students to pay their fees in the two installments which most universities allow -- half in September and half in January. This will permit the October referendum on whether to strike in January.

Queen's principal Dr. John J. Deutsch said Tuesday he could not comment on how the university would react to a fee strike. "I can't give a carte blanche kind of reaction to this. We would need to know what the objectives were."

Deutsch pointed out that "holding fees back could only hurt the university, as such."

But he would not rule out cooperation between the university and the AMS on some form of student protest.

Meanwhile, OFS delegates will meet this week with officials of Ontario's department of colleges and universities to ask that the fee increases announced in the spring be deferred until "full consultation" with affected parties can take place, and until the final report of the Wright Commission on post-secondary education comes out in the fall.

"Full consultation" probably would include strong comments from the OFS, on behalf of students, and from the university presidents and professors who make up the Council of Ontario Universities. The COU unanimously and strongly condemned the increases last spring, shortly after they were announced in a surprise move by provincial treasurer Darcy McKeough.

The increases mean fees will be $100 higher for undergraduates next winter, $400 higher for most graduate students, and $20 per course higher for part-time, summer and extramural students.

The OFS delegation will also ask the government for several changes in the Ontario Student Awards Programme: an extension of the programme to cover part-time students; a "substantial reduction" of the minimum age, presently 25, at which a student can be considered independent of all parental support; and a reduction from $800 to $600 in the share of an OSAP award which may come in loan form. (The limit was $600 in 1971-72; the government raised it to the $800 figure in McKeough's spring budget.)

Also at the weekend's conference, a Queen's resolution opposed the government's abolition of a summer stipend ($37.50 or $50.00) for rehab therapy students. Further resolutions, urged on by delegates from the University of Toronto, condemned the government's policy towards paramedical students in general (see inside this Journal for background).

And Queen's persuaded other universities' student governments to start organizing a province-wide speakers' bureau to help bring outsiders to visit a number of Ontario colleges in succession.

QSSA doubles membership

The summer school student organization formally doubled its size last night by making the 1400 summer education students regular members of the Queen's Summer School Association, along with the roughly 1800 summer students taking arts and science courses.

Education students have - through a university lump-sum grant - paid for QSSA privileges for two years now.

Addition of the education students was the highlight of QSSA's annual general meeting, which otherwise dealt mostly with routine matters. Retiring president Jeff Young told those present in lower Vic last night that it was the first time in at least four years that a QSSA general meeting has reached its quorum of fifty. In fact almost eighty people were present.

"Perhaps it was the beer," Young commented to general applause. A bar preceded the meeting and a dance followed.

The meeting touched on the tensions between summer and winter students only once, briefly, when Bill Gunn, editor of the summer newsletter Quassa, was asked to comment on the proposal that it be amalgamated with The Queen's Journal. Gunn said the issue had aroused little interest and that QSSA executive members generally had opposed the idea.

Young did mention that he hopes to investigate the question of summer school and extension fees before the summer's end. At present such fees are $15 higher per course than fees for winter intramural courses.

He also informed the meeting that QSSA has been permitted a representative on the arts and science faculty board of the university, and machinery for the appointment of a representative was approved.

Young and others suggested that summer education students ask for similar representation on the board which governs that faculty.

Committee chairmen reported on publicity, social and athletic activities of the summer; mixed volleyball apparently has been the year's major success. As an entertainment the meeting itself was not bad, though tame by the standards of winter AMS chaos; it reached its finest point during balloting when an unexpected candidate was put forward for second vice-president, and after confusion and hilarity was elected; he is Steve Gilchrist of Bradford, Ontario.

to the charge that his group was painting obscenities on walls.

He admitted that the words "fuck you" were arranged in a graphic design on the construction sidings on University and Stuart Streets.

But the Globe and Mail reporter who reprimanded the project for this was actually unable to recognize the words in the design until it was explained to him by its author Mike Edwards.

The letters have been cut apart and rearranged artistically.

Eligh shared the concern of OFY officers Andras and Deline that too few people were using the project.

Environmental Productions had planned to give free lessons in painting and scuplture as well as do outside painting projects. In spite of advertising only a minimum number of students have turned out for the lessons.

The Globe and Mail also said that Adventure Playground was designed to "let children build things so they could smash them."

Actually, vandals destroyed the things that the children had built, Michael Lazure member of the project told the Journal. And the following day the youth group went back to work rebuilding the swings and treehouses. "The purpose of the program" Lazure added "is to teach children about building".

The alleged strike by members of the OFY project, Serve the People amounted to a two-day work stoppage to protest hold up of salary cheques. "It was designed to show the government that it has a contract with us and it must live up to it," said Donna Whitley, a member of the group.

The project hires 6 men and 3 women to provide services such as small household repairs, painting outdoor maintenance and moving. These services are available to low income families, welfate recipents, and old age pensioners.

The Family Centre, a drop-in and referral centre for underprivileged families, has failed, as the Globe indicated. Nancy Garrard, co-ordinator said the centre was oosed down due to excess vandalism and money problems.

Members of the Community Service Centre, the fifth project criticized by the Globe and Mail were unavailable for comment.

In response to the criticisms vioiced in the Globe and Mail, Kingston City Council endorsed a resolution on Monday to ask to screen applications for Opportunities for Youth grants at the municipal level. The motion came from the city of Cornwall.

At the end of the meeting Ald. George Webb gave notice of a motion to be referred to the finance committee asking that the federal government counsult with municipalities before giving out money for OFY programs.

Mayor Valorie Swain said he doubted "the federal government will ever decide to turn money over to us." But he added "the idea is a good one and we should point out to them that we are the level of government that is left with the result of these programs."

AOSC profits down

Students travelling this summer are making up their minds much later than ever before, but are travelling just as much as before.

This, says the Association of Student Councils, will result in a lower profit rebate to the individual member student unions.

The AOSC said that is has had no difficulty in satisifying student travel requests, but that the demand patterns have necessitated changes in scheduling which resulted in higher expenses as compared to the same revenue.

They emphasized that the travel plan is in no financial danger and that the AOSC is not in business as a money-maker for student unions, but that any profit is distributed pro rata among the member student unions.

The Quebec student travel plan was in serious financial difficulty until recently when the provincial government stepped in with aid. In British Columbia, the western student travel plan is also in serious trouble and may have to declare bankrupcy.

Government cuts money for health sciences students

Following are two letters which throw a fascinating light on the Ontario government's policy towards students in nursing, rehab and other paramedical areas.

Queen's rehab students are affected by one section of this letter. Kingston General Hospital has student nurses, student registered nursing assistants, and lab technology students, all of whom will be affected. Hotel Dieu Hospital has student nurses who will be affected.

Student's Administrative Council
The University of Toronto

July 18, 1972.

To all OFS-FEO Member Associations:

Enclosed is a letter sent to various helath institutions by Dr. Richard Potter, Minister of Health. Its contents are, to say the least, brutal.

Students in health science programs are now facing unreasonable tuition increases and total cuts in their living allowances or 'stipends'.

In a letter dated July 4, Wally Palmer (Vice President, Alma Mater Society Queen's University) proposed a motion opposing the removal of the summer stipend for rehabilitation therapy students. It now appears that other health science students are also being adversely affected.

Our investigation has encountered bureaucratic resistance in the Department of Health. The Minister is 'busy until late August' and his Deputy is indisposed. The Ministry was reluctant to release the enclosed letter and we received this copy from other sources.

These actions are definitely related to recent tuition and loan changes. A pattern of financial attrition is developing and should be halted. We strongly urge all Member Associations to take a firm stand in this matter.

Chairmen of Public Hospital Boards,

Chairmen and Directors of Regional Schools of Nursing,
Chairmen and Directors of Other Educational Institutions Financed by O.H.S.C.

. Cabinet Committees of the Government of Ontario have been reviewing various programmes with a view to implementing changes in policy which could be considered in keeping with current philosophy and which should not seriously impede the continuance of essential programmes. While the need to review policies and introduce changes has been brought about in part by necessary constraints on financing, programmes which are financed through public funds should be reviewed from time to time to ensure that they continue to be in the best interests of the public.

It has been dediced that changes should be made in the area of financing educational programmes which, by tradition, have included the financing of room and board, living allowances and other forms of student assistance. An indication of the manner in which these policies will be implemented in specific situations follows.

STUDENT NURSE, DIPLOMA PROGRAMMES

1. Tuition Fees
   A tuition fee in the amount of $250.00 will be charged to students foreachof the two years in nursing education programmes. In the 1972-73 academic year, the fee will be charged to both first and second year students and should be collected in two equal instalments, the first one at the time of admission and the second one in January of the same academic year.
   The tuition fees will be applied to reduce previously approved operating costs. In 1972 that portion of the fee payable by the student onadmissionwill be applied to the 1972 budget.
2. Room and Board or Living Allowances
   The policy of providing freee room and board or living allowances for students in diploma schools of nursing will be discontinued effective for the first year students entering programmes in the fall of 1972 but will be continued for students currently enrolled. In subsequent years the policy change will apply to all students.
   You will be receiving detailed instructions relative to how these changes are to be effected in the 1972 budgets from the Ontario Hospital Services Commission.

REGISTERED NURSING ASSISTANT PROGRAMMES

1. Tuition Fees
   A tuition fee in the amount of $150.00 will be charged to students entering programmes for the training of registered nursing assistants whose courses commence on or after August 1, 1972. There will be no tuition fee for courses commencing before that date. The fee should be collected at the time of registration.
   A suitable schedule for refund of tuition fees for withdrawals will be worked out prior to August 1.
2. Room and Board or Living Allowances
   The policy of providing free room and board or living allowances ($70.00 per month) for students in nursing assistant programmes will continue in effect for the present time.

LABORATORY TECHNOLOGIST, RADIOLOGY TECHNICIAN AND RESPIRATORY TECHNOLOGIST AND OTHER TECHNOLOGIST PROGRAMMES

The policy of provind $140.00 per month living allowance for students in these programmes will be discontinued effective for those students entering programmes in 1972 but will not affect students currently enrolled. In subsequent years, the decision to eliminate the living allowance will apply to all students.

DIETETIC INTERNS, ADMINISTRATIVE RESIDENTS, PHYSIOTHERAPY AND OCCUPATIONAL THERAPY INTERNS, PHARMACY RESIDENTS

The policy of providing living allowances and stipends provided for students in these programmes varies in amount and while it will be made available for students who will enter internships or residency programmes in 1972, it will be discontinued in subsequent years.

Some students may be eligible for assistance within the terms of the Ontario Student Awards Programme. Information and application forms can be obtained by contacting The Director, Student Awards Branch, Ministry of Colleges and Universities, Mowat Block, Queen's Park, Toronto.

In the event you have questions regarding these policy changes, please direct them to the Ontario Hospital Services Commission and their financial representative or administrative consultant assigned to your hospital or school.

Yours sincerely,
R. T. Potter, M.D.

Transcendental meditation is a viable cure for drug addiction and alcholism according to Dr. Gordon Bell, director of the Donwood Foundation, who spoke in Grant Hall on Friday afternoon at the symposium on the Science of Creative Intelligence. Dr. Bell, who calls himself a "new but fascinated student of the phenomenum of transcendental meditation," described the attitude of the community thirty years ago that considered alcholism a criminal offense and the development of the therapeutic community which is used now mainly for the cure of addiction. And this is where meditation plugs in. The body has built up a dependence on chemicals, which disables the mind and to bring about a complete satisfying release, an alternate to chemicals must be found. Fear is no deterent and in 1948 relazation periods came to be the alternate reward. The hope is that through the clinical application of "wakeful rest," of meditation, the patient can achieve a level of new personal awareness and fully utilize his own natural resources in rebuilding his life after he leaves the therapeutic group. Dr. Bell feels that in the "myriad misadventures with chemicals" the Maharishi has made a most significant contribution, and especially in the field of pr body in the fourth state in m need or desire chemicals fro a chemical reaction is alr within. The method of reac Dr. Bell feels, should be mad community as a whole, therapeutic group.

humour which "spiced" his whole address, he began by saying "I am not a meditator. I was brought up in a good Scottish Presbyterian tradition that meditation was bad for you - it caused blindness." He was speaking on the similarities and differences in psychotic and creative thinking. He dispelled the link between insanity and genius by citing the low incidence of this relationship. Creative people make unobvious assumptions about situations, as do psychotic patients, but creative persons are able to distinguish and sort out these perceptions. Even though such people are "in touch with the irrational parts of their mind and enjoy various types of mystical experiences," they are in control, while mentally disturbed people have lost such a control. The Maharishi spoke about the beauty to be found in the finer perceptions of the mind that can be obtained through meditation, and of the elimination of stresses that can mar the mind and reduce creativity and often lead to psychotic disorders.

Each of the speakers was warmly applauded as fellow-supporters of meditation. But, judging by the tight security that was involved in the Maharishi's visit, not just anybody could be treated to the secret benefit of his technique.

editorial

Ramblings on fees, jobs, and OFY

On Saturday, Canada's national newspaper attacked the federal government's Opportunities for Youth programme. Such attacking is a national sport anyway, but The Globe and Mail hit particularly close to home, using five Kingston-based projects as examples. It called them "slick", among other things, and suggested that "we are beginning to entertain thoughts of" a taxpayers' revolution against government giveways.

While students squander money on pointless projects, or projects which disappear when the inspectors come around, The Globe said, Toronto children suffer in muggy heat because municipal swimming-pools are understaffed. Lifeguarding is "honest labor", the editorial concluded; OFY work, Kingston style is not.

The train of thought here is puzzling. Does part-time lifeguard work, however honest, pay as much as full-time work for OFY community projects ($70 to $90 a week, when government foulups haven't prevented payment altogether)? We doubt it. And students, who have a government-sponsored fee increase facing them in six weeks or so, are well aware that they need the best-playing jobs they can find.

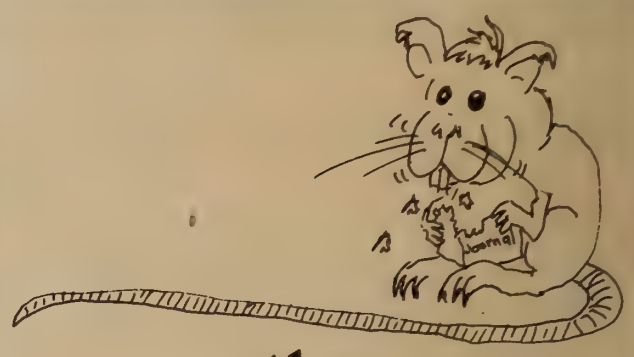
How, after all, should a student's education be paid for? Certainly the present patchy system has produced discontent on every side. A return to the ancient days in which the rich paid their own fees and the poor didn't study, however "honest", would lay everyone concerned open to charges of elitism -- valid charges. On the other hand, "free" education would mean even higher taxes than at present, even more taxpayers outraged at their annual bills.

So a patchwork system remains; a student works in the summer for whatever little wage he can get, or he goes desperately into debt, or maybe both. Is this fair; shall something as intangible as a human being's education be treated like a real estate investment, with a mortgage, a few years of payment, and eventually rich returns? Rich returns, in this economy where there are hardly even jobs?

The educated student, with his investment under his arm, is quite likely to wind up in a job he could have done when he was sixteen - or, worse, on the welfare rolls, spending still more government tax money.The economy in which Canada finds itself now seems to dictate that the government gives money away to individuals: money which came from other individuals.

Everyone objects to high taxes, in Canada and everywhere else except perhaps Monaco, which doesn't have any. Everybody knows, though, that if the government isn't doing one silly thing with money, it'll be doing another silly thing. Expenditures rise to meet income; freeloaders rise to meet money; and, presumably, at some point taxpayers rise in revolt.

Something has got to be done, and by the government. Most of the society dislikes infringement on freedom of choice; but even in the United States, government interference has occurred in the form of wage and price controls.



There are a lot of OFY projects underway, and some of them are probably a waste of time and money, but useless OFY projects will not cause the revolution any more than the stamp act caused the American Revolution.

University replys to fee letter

Dear Editors:

I noticed in reading the July 20, 1972, issue of the Queen's Journal a letter from Mr. Doug Pritchard entitled "Why are Fees so High?". This letter was based on the 1970-71 comparative financial data for Ontario universities issued through COU and dealt particularly with expenditures for student services. The point was made that Queen's University appears to spend only 0.7 per cent of its operating budget on student services while the provincial average is in the area of 2.5 per cent. Tne inference followed that Queen's University either was not providing the level of student services found elsewhere or that Queen's students pay for these services through higher non-academic fees.

I would have preferred it had Mr. Pritchard contacted us prior to writing his letter to ask whether a simple explanation was available for this apparent disparity. There is such an explanation and it appeared as a footnote to the COU statements to which Mr. Pritchard referred. The fact is that, because of internal accounting policy, expenditures for student health services and athletics were not included in the operating budget of Queen's University prior to the current fiscal year. After adjusting for these excluded items, 1970-71 expenditures for student services at Queen's approximate the provincial average.

At the same time I wish to commend the Editors of The Journal for their note to Mr. Pritchard's letter. I think their comments were extremely relevant and perceptive. I would like to underline the sentiment that the level of student services cannot always be judged just by looking at financial statements.

The boat aparently took on water faster than it could be bailed out.

LONDON - After the arrest and jailing last week of five union leaders on contempt of court charges, British longshoremen and other workers began a sympathy strike in an effort to have the men released. The men were jailed for contempt of the labour courts set up by the new Industrial Relation Act. The unions want the men released and the act repealed. By Tuesday an estimated 120,000 workers were on strike and a full general strike seemed possible. The government of Prime Minister Heath has refused to intervene directly, but there was some indication of behind-the-scenes manoeuvring to free the men.

CAMPUS THEFTS

Major thefts such as the losses in the Pub three weeks ago, or an attempted theft in the Computing Centre Monday morning, are only the tip of the iceburg of campus security problems.

Campus Security Director R. I. Luker says there is a substantial amount of petty thievery on campus which goes unreported to either the City Police or the university administration. He could not estimate the amount of losses, but expects that it is very high. There are also a very high number of break-ins involving loss or damage to university property.

Since June 1, 11 cases of breaking and entering have been reported to Luker, with about half of them resulting in losses. He says that police are called "if the situation warrents it," but that results are not spectacular because the police have nothing to go on. In one instance, the City Police did recover property taken from the Theological College and have laid charges.

But, Luker continued, there have been six break-ins in the Theological College in the past year, "mostly vandalism, but some thievery," He couldn't explain why Theology is a favourite target, but noted that the Drama Department, in the same building has the second-highest break-in rate on campus. "They don't get much there however."

There have been problems in some of the medical buildings in the past, but these instances have subsided. In addition, a number of departments have reported the loss of electronic calculators. Luker says that "cautious reaction" on the part of the departments have cut down these losses to nothing in the past few months, because most of them were uninsured.

Lloyd Cushing of the University Secretary's office could not estimate the dollar amount of university losses, but says that most of the losses are not covered under the University's insurance policies.

The policies are one thousand dollars deductable and will pay up to $25,000 per incident. They were not always this stiff. Cushing says that a few years ago, because of a large number of break-ins, the university was told that it was "uninsurable"; the premimums were raised a number of thousand dollars; and the deductable was raised from one hundred dollars to two hundred and fifty dollars; and then to the thousand dollar figure.

According to Cushing the insurance company paid out more than it received in premimums from the university for a few years. Since that time, the number of thefts has gone up, not down. He said "the university is not pleased with the situation, but is stuck with it."

Another problem, says Luker, is that of petty thievery of personal property of students and staff. Purses are often taken from desks in unattended offices. Other popular targets are bicycles and vending machines. A cigarette machine in the basement of the Union was "hit" almost weekly until the machine was moved to the pub this spring.

(A spokesman for Brown's Vending told the Journal that his machines on campus have been broken into, but that he would not consider the problem serious, or worse than in other places.)

City Police can do even less in the case of petty thievery, unless someone is actually caught in the act, or they receive a tip. They said that the University is a tough area for theft detection. One detective said that the "openness of the university doesn't help" the situation.

R. W. Allan, Director of the Physed Centre reports another type of problem -- that of youngsters who roam around the campus "looking for targets of opportunity".

He says that a number of kids, aged eight to mid-teens, are always in the gym complex, some causing damage, many, just getting in the way. Some of the children have been caught in the process of damaging university property or stealing, and are turned over to their parents. This, Allan says, does little good. "The usual reaction is 'Our Johnnie wouldn't do this,' or, more often, 'Why shouldn't our Johnnie be allowed to use the facilities.'"

It isn't that Johnnie cannot use the physed centre, Allan replies, "why, we've got half the kids in Kingston in here in our summer recreation programmes." He says most of the youngsters don't cause damage, but they do make life difficult for the physed centre staff. "The janitors and staff are aware of the problem, and we are continually asking kids to leave." Sometimes it is the same ones a couple of times a day, said one Janitor.

Allan says that the kids know the building better than he does. "At night, when we clear the building and lock-up, we think we have everyone, and sometimes in the morning, half of the entrances are blocked open. "It's impossible." He said one group of enterprising kids would climb the drainpipes to get onto the roof to recover lost tennis balls. When the drain pipes were coated in grease to stop them they came back with ropes and grappling hooks.

Allan thinks the problem has decreased somewhat over the last few months since the centre has had staff make regular and spot tours of the complex, and students have been occasionally hired as part-time door watchers.

Vandalism and running youngsters aren't Allan's only problem. Small equipment dissapears regularly during the year. The problem is particularly severe at the end of the academic year when students discard their identification cards. The physed centre loses a lot of equipment that has been checked out on discarded cards. We cannot tell from the card the difference between students; and thats why we don't honour them after a certain date," Allan said.

The locker rooms are another problem. "Don't leave your towel sitting on the bench. When you come back, it will be gone. The same thing with valueables -- don't even bring them with you." Last year, a pair was caught systematicaly going through the tote baskets, "for shoes and jock straps!"

Luker says that the vandalism and mischief caused by youngsters isn't confined to the physed centre, and the problem is greater during the school year than during the summer. "They come over during lunch hour when most of the staff is out." He said that parking attendants now take an early lunch and patrol buildings rather than parking lots at noon, but the situation is "unaccaptable".

"What can we do," commented one University official. "If we turn the urchins over to the authorities, it doesn't stop them, and just gets the university a bad name."

During the winter, vandalism in the arena parking lot reached such alarming proportions that it is now locked at six o'clock. It's inconvient for the users, says Luker, "but otherwise we would have to have a man there all night."

The Library doesn't experience any heavy occurances of theft or vandalism, except for the occasional article being removed from books, and the occasional loss of books. D. A. Redmond, Chief Librarian says that losses in the Queen's Library are much lower than in some places. One university in Ontario is planning to install electronic survalence equipment.

What does the university have in the way of a security staff? Well says, Luker, "I'm the Director of Security," but he has no officiers or watchmen. He says most of the watchmen duties have to be handled by maintance and other personnel.

A number of janitors don't like this policy saying that they have enough duties, and pointing out that their routine can easily be noted, and thus threat of their presence is of little use. One said that often the academic staff in some buildings often leaves them wide open, and have very little concern for security and often invite trouble. "But, I've gone far enough," he said, "I might loose my job."

Cushing said the University has no plans for hiring of security guards on campus. He said that there have been part-time watchmen for special problems or when there has been a tip that "something may be occuring". But "security guards are expensive, and not very effective unless you hire a whole army of characters." In addition, he said the University would like to maintain a free and open campus.

What is the University doing about security? Luker says security screens are installed on vulnerable windows, some intrusion alarms have been put in, and more flood-lighting is comtemplated. It's expensive either way. The largest share of security, however, now falls on the individual. Luker emphasizes:

- Don't leave valuable material unattended;
- Lock doors and windows;
- Challenge strangers;
- Report anything that invites trouble.

Student co-opted

A Queen's student leader has become the only student member of the Ontario government's Committee on University Affairs.

He is Doug Pritchard, president of the Graduate Student Society at Queen's and a Ph.D. student in chemical engineering.

As in the past, the thirteen-member CUA will have only one student. But the appointment of Pritchard, announced Friday by the ministry of colleges and universities, does have some significance, Pritchard said.

Doug Pritchard

"I think this is the first time the government has chosen to go through a recognized student body in getting the representative," he said.

As the government's release stated, Pritchard was suggested by the Ontario region of the Canadian Union of Graduate Students.

Pritchard said that as the only student on the committee, he would keep in close touch with student organizations such as the Ontario Federation of Students.

"I'm still only one out of thirteen," he said. But he promised to be active as a member of the committee, which holds two-day meetings twice a month in Toronto.

The role of the CUA has been in some doubt recently; it was not consulted, for example, when the government introduced a $100 tuition fee increase in its spring budget. But the government has promised to consult CUA before making further tuition fee changes, and to give it an opportunity to comment on the final report of the Wright Commission on Post-Secondary Education when that appears.

"The thing that interests me the most is tuition fees, of course," Pritchard said. (He has led Queen's grad students and others in protests against the regulation change which means most grad students face a $400 fee increase for the 1972-73 twelve-month year.)

"The government has expressed every intention of consulting CUA on any further tuition increases, and I want to be front row centre when that happens."

One other member of CUA is from Queen's: Dr. W. R. Lederman, former dean of law and now a professor in that faculty.

Five others are from universities around Ontario, and the rest from other segments of society including industry, labour and government.

Friday night Pub

A solution to the Pub - Bitter Grounds controversy which erupted this spring has finally been found. The pub will operate Monday through Friday and Bitter Grounds will use the same facilities on Saturday and Sunday.

In the spring the Pub had expressed the desire to expand its operations to include Friday and Saturday nights.

Bitter Grounds has been using the pub facilities on those two nights last year. They were formerly situated in the Coffee Shop but business seemed to improve with the move upstairs so they were unwilling to go back to the Coffee Shop.

The two groups were unable to reach a compromise at the AMS outer council meeting on March 29. But a committee was set up to make further investigations.

The problem was resolved after two meetings between Pub and Bitter Grounds officials this month. Representing Bitter Grounds was John Whyte and Greg Cook and from the Pub, George Smith and Gary Gannage.

AMS budget

Requests for $71,000 of the $56,300 worth of revenue have been received by the Alma Mater Society to date. Vice-president Wally Palmer said that the two figures are approximate, but the expenditure figure did not include a budget for the services commission.

The requests include budget from AMS peripheral agencies such as the Student Volunteer Bureau, the Legal Aid Society, Telephone Aid Kingston, and the Birth Control and Abortion Centre. These total approximately $6,000. Expenses for the operation of the AMS itself are close to $25,000.

Income includes the $5.30 student fee, some amount of profit from the AOSC student plan, and some from Dunning Hall Movies.

"I don't know where the cut will be made," said Palmer. "We will make specific allocations for grants and loans, and stick to it. In the past everyone figured the AMS was an exaustable touch for a free touch."

He did say that some of the operating costs of the AMS (audit, bookkeeper, etc) would be charged against its various subsiduary enterprises like Typing Service, and the Pub. "We'll be cutting down on office expenses," he continued. "It means operating a little more like a business at the expense of congeniality of operations.? We've also cut down on staff by one from last year."

'Straight Goods'

Queen's will host a youth conference on the environment from August 28-30.

This conference for Ontario high school students is the second of its kind. The first, held at Laurentian University was a tremendous success.

"The purpose of the conference, called the Straight Goods is to inform young people about pollution," Bob Buller, High School Liason Officer told the Journal.

One delegate from each school will attend the conference, to be held at McCarther Hall. There are 200 confirmed delegates so far but 100 more are expected to register before the end of August.

The delegates will be involved in small group discussions, lectures and films. There will also be various government and industrial exhibits on display.

Fifty resource people from government, industry and pollution control groups will attend the conference, to give lectures and direct seminars.

Dr. Everett Biggs, Deputy Minister of the Environment will give the keynote address. Other speakers include W. B. Drowley, Executive Director of Air & Land Pollution Control, Ontario Ministry of the Environment, M. Brechin, President, Consumers Association of Canada and L. Renzoni, representative to the Canadian Preparatory Committee for the UN. conference on the Human Environment.

It is hoped that the delegates will return to their schools ready to discuss the problems of the environment and perhaps begin pollution control projects of their own.

Queen's students and faculty will also be welcome at the conference.

Art therapy

Three Queen's art education students received an Opportunities for Youth grant in the spring to study the theraputic value of art in the treatment of psychiatric patients.

The idea for the project was conceived by Clare Hadden, who had read about the success of art therapy experiments in England.

The other two students involved in the experiments at the Kingston Psychiatric Hospital are Joette Shephard and Linda Girard.

Art therapy is aimed at patients who have difficulty in relating to others in a social sense. "By giving them a common meeting ground, the patients begin to come out of themselves", Joette Shephard told the Journal. "However, she added, progress is slow."

The group plans to draw up a report at the end of the summer recommending that the hospital hire an art therapist.

eco-tactic no. 17

We ask your support in bringing a fair balance between resource development and the protection of the environment and Native Canadians in our Arctic. To this end Pollution Probe at the University of Toronto has evolved the following five point program to protect Canada's last frontier.

1. At present there is too little meaningful ecological knowledge and research of the fragile Arctic environment and no urgent domestic demand for any of its non-renewable resources. Therefore, a freeze should be placed on all new Arctic oil and gas extraction and transportation (including pipelines and tankers), and northern exploration activities should be scaled down. These restraints should remain in effect for at least two years and until Canadians have enough knowledge to make a decision on the future of the Arctic.

2. Ar present, the Government refuses to recognize the land rights, claims and other interests of the Native People and denies them an effective voice in development decisions which could affect them and their way of life. Therefore, proposals concerning exploration or development in the Arctic should be fully discussed with the Native People and should not destroy their option to live off the land.

3. At present, the north is controlled from Ottawa by one department which has the potentially conflicting responsibilities for northern development, environmental protection, and the welfare of the Native People. Therefore, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development should be reorganized through the transfer of the environmental and pollution control sections to the Department of the Environment and the separation of the responsibilities for northern development and native affairs into separate departments.

4. In mid 1970 the Government passed two acts designed to reduce and control pollution in the Arctic but one is not yet law and the other cannot be enforced. Therefore, the Government should proclaim the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act and make regulations for it and the Northern Inland Waters Act as soon as possible.

5. At present, Arctic development is taking place in a policy vacuum. The Government has various conflicting objectives for northern Canada but no apparent plan for resolving them and the public is not informed or involved in a meaningful manner. Therefore, more information should be made available to the general public and an official long-range comprehensive northern policy must be established and implemented after full public hearings.

If you would like to see these proposals enacted, please send the coupon below or better still write a letter to: The Prime Minister, Parliament Buildings, Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Trudeau,
I urge you to give greater attention to the protection of the Canadian Arctic and its people. I would like to know what our government's plans are for its future.Please, Mr. Trudeau, Freeze the Arctic. Yours truly,

One of the best conversation ploys in use today is the reference to the absent expert. The basic idea behind the use of this gambit is to present your partner in the conversation with a piece of expertise he cannot deny, because the reference is too general or too difficult to check.

The most common of these absent experts is "they". "They" is generally interchangeable with "one", which the French prefer. "They" and "one" have gained almost universal acceptance, but due to their overuse have become somewhat less effective.

For example, it used to be that you could say, "They say that August is the typhoon month in Ontario", and everyone would say, "Is that right? Typhoons in Ontario. I never knew that." Or you could say, "One hears that wild horses are stampeding from the north and will overrun Toronto", and people would say, "Really? Wild horses from the north. I hadn't heard that."

However, people have heard too much of "They" and "One", and don't recognize their authority any more. Such references tend to elicit sneers, and responses like, "Yeh? Who's they?" and "Oh yeh? Where does one hear that, anyway?"

Despite the demise in usefulness of "They" and "One", there are still other effective absent experts. One of them is complex and distant sounding institutional bodies. Use of such expertise can often be the clincher in any discussion. For example, you could inform someone who is talking about his favorite places in the world that "The American Cybernetic and Poly-ethnic Institute for Calibrated Indigenous Restitution, or ACPICIR for short, says that South America is only a figment of American propaganda." The other fellow will initially try to disclaim your assertion, but you need only to persist, saying that it is not your view but that of ACPICIR, and he will give in.

I should add at this point that it is vital to guage your conversational partner so that you aren't making references that may be in his field of interest or knowledge. The more precise your partner's mind, the more vague your references should be, and the opposite holds true.

If you are discussing something with a person who does not read extensively, you can make great use of The Bard. The Bard is a touchy ploy, for you never know who might be familiar with him. Thus you should never quote him directly, for you may be trapped by a memory holding fragments from grade nine english. The Bard should always be paraphrased, thus providing you with an extra layer of protection.

When the conversation starts to get away from you, you should immediately interject with The Bard in this manner; "Well, if I might paraphrase The Bard, 'Trees once dead, there's no more trees then' ". (This might occur in a discussion of Dutch Elm Disease.) This is a very effective tool in stopping the conversation and establishing yourself as a force to be reckoned with. I should point out that while most people tend to think of Shakespeare as The Bard, there is no need to restrict yourself to his works. Quote

Hi there

This is the second-to-last issue of The Journal for summer school 1972. The final issue will appear Thursday, August 10; deadline will be noon Tuesday, August 8.

It's also the second-to-last issue of The Journal for volume XCIX, a volume in which all sorts of records and precendents have been set -- most pages, most issues, first summer publication, and a first venture at three-times-a-week publishing.

This particular issue represents the first time The Queen's Journal has ever published in August -- and it means Volume XCIX has included at least one issue in every month of the year.

Happy summer.

The obsolete classroom

(This article, by J. David Martin, a sociology professor at Lakehead University, is reprinted from the June-July 1972 issue of University Affairs.)

The bulk of our education, in which the largest number of students participate and in which the students we consider best are trained, takes place in the traditional classroom. This need not be described in detail; we all have sat through class lectures enough to know how they are conducted. A single teacher instructs from 20 to 1,000 students by making a speech to them on a set number of days each week. The students are expected to take notes on the speech, memorize portions of it, and otherwise increase their store of knowledge and inspiration by hearing and attending to it. Usually, after a number of lectures are heard, the students are examined on their contents.

The function of the lecture, in the days before mass-produced books, was simple: Books students could not obtain were read to them. The lecture was more efficient than the library in enabling a large number of students to be exposed to the contents of a rare book or manuscript, in a day when scholarship was limited by the relative scarcity of books and the relative difficulty of communicating facts and ideas. Books being handwritten at the time, students could hear them almost as fast as they could read them, and many students could be exposed to one book simultaneously.

Today, despite a technological revolution that has produced a surplus rather than a shortage of books and communication channels, the university lecture is remarkably similar to its medieval ancestor. It is expected to be a bit more stimulating or amusing than the mere reading of a manuscript, to be sure, and the recent trend toward student evaluation of teaching will doubtless strengthen the force of that expectation. Still, the lecture remains the oral presentation of substantive material to a group of students. The students still memorize and-or make notes as their way of learning the material. (Some innovative students are making "lecture notes" with tape recorders).

Typically, there is relatively little response from the students. A minority of the students is usually put to sleep, and another group - at times a majority - flounders in confusion some ten seconds to ten minutes behind the lecturer. The lecturer often repeats himself - or tries his best to do so - by giving the same lecture many times to different collections of students. There are days when the teacher is tired, bored, distracted, or hung over, with resulting bad lectures and there are days when the student is tired, bored, distracted, or hung over.

The point of the foregoing is simply this: The lecture could be automated out of existence in a few years. Three innovations now available for use would permit this to be done while at the same time accentuating, rather than reducing, the human element in education. The three innovations are: video tape, modern printing, and modern data display.

The value of video tape is so "obvious" it may not seem to deserve elaboration, but at times, televised lectures have achieved great student dislike. In most of the cases with which I am familiar, the preparers have not been skilled at television performance, however good they might be in a live classroom - and there is a difference. There is a "feedback" problem in that the videotape performance cannot be adjusted to the rather few student reactions that are readily observable - the lecturer cannot repeat himself in response to blank looks, for example. This means that videotape lectures must be more thoroughly planned than "live" ones and performed a bit differently. They should preferably be carefully pretested to assure that they hold interest. Most of the complaints I have heard have been about interest or entertainment value and not about content.

The interest and impact of many lectures would be improved by the use of illustrations. Films of science experiments, and films of real-life examples in the social sciences, could be intersperses with ordinary lecture, blackboard work, and displays of data. (For the arts, readings of literature and photographs of paintings, as well as films of musical and theatric performances could be used.) The instructor's narration could be dubbed over the illustration as desired. "Lecturers" thus augmented would certainly maintain a higher-than-usual level of student interest and attention, and could be expected to communicate at least some material more effectively as well.

In many cases, however, it would make more sense to abandon lectures altogether than it would to automate them. Whenever a student can read something, it is wasteful of his time and of the teacher's to make him hear it instead. Students can read faster than we can talk, and at times of their own convenience. If the instructor is careful in his choice of reading matter, the amount of time he spends (or a televised surrogate spends) lecturing can probably be reduced to a small fraction of its present size.

The range of reading material available to the student can be much enhanced through modern data display, by which I refer to everything from microfilm to overhead projection, including copiers. A campus telephone system, for example, could be so organized that a student could access televised "lectures" and reading materials from the residence hall, or at the very least from a carrel; and have them rapidly delivered or electronically impulsed to a display device at his side. He could copy notes from a conference with an instructor and if the instructor finds them valuable for the whole class, they can be directly placed on a "ditto" stencil and run off. Blackboard notes can be photographed and copied or printed. The list of possibilities is as long as we have the imagination to make it, and the point is clear. Lecture notes are an inefficient technique for copying or recording information, as well as a chore that prevents the student from giving full attention to the lecture itself and that requires that the pace of lecturing be slowed.

In much the same way, the lecture itself is inefficient in conveying information to people in large numbers. Print, television, and "data display" offer greater efficiency than the lecture and also permit easier review of unlearned and incompletely learned material, since they can be stored and can be retrieved by individuals.

This, as much as poor teachers, seems to me to be the cause of our problem of indifferent lecturing. The lecture is a form of mass communication, and inherently cannot measure up to standards of personal instruction. The mass communicator is necessarily indifferent to individual responses; he must focus on the mode of the audience. The teacher who lectures from a text is faithful to the tradition of his medium, however little he may appeal to students and however little he may add to their education. The teacher who attends to the individual student ideas, needs, and problems in his class is not really lecturing, and student complaints about professorial indifference can be read as complaints about lecturing as an instructional form.

Many student complaints, I perceive, have been of this kind. I have heard few students complain that they see too much - and many have complained that they see too little - of their faculty. If we can escape the obsolete lecture hall, our teaching time will be made available for genuine teacher-student interaction.

The seminar class, which cannot work well when it grows larger than about 20 people, is one possibility. Tutorials are another. The possibility of more effective marking should be given some attention. Which and how many of these options should be followed undoubtedly will vary from one course to another. What should not vary is the direction of the trend produced: as technology takes the burden of repetitive speech-making from us, we should invest our time in the more personal interactive forms of teaching.

It was once said that the best university in the world is a bench, with a teacher at one end and a student at the other. It may just be that there is a technological path back to that bench.

Family centre replies

Dear Editors:

Your article on the Kingston OFY projects in last Thursday's Journal clarified many of the distortions presented by the "prestigious" Globe and Mail in its famous editorial "Awaiting that Swim". Unfortunately no one on the Journal staff contacted any of the members of the Family Centre project to confirm whether the picture portrayed by Vianney Carriere and the editor of the Globe and Mail was in fact representative of our project.

The "Family Centre" faced many difficulties owing to the nature and location of the project, its short duration (9 weeks ending July 23rd), the responsibility of leasing a house, and many problems with Ottawa (initially and throughout the duration of the project). But problems similar to these were faced by most of the OFY projects. We were not unique in this respect.

The "Family Centre" operated out of a house on Rideau Street in order to initially provide a more natural form of contact with the community than would have been possible from a church basement or a school. Our objectives were to interact with the neighbourhood, providing a place for discussion, for help, and for friendship if such a need existed. We spent most of the time giving the younger kids in the neighbourhood a bit more attention than they were used to at home, taking them on outings, playing games and doing handicrafts. The older kids used the house as literally a home away from home -- a place to share ideas, play soccer and meet with friends.

We closed the house one week before the end of the project for several reasons. The house was vacant from 10 p.m. to 10 a.m. every day, which only invited break-ins and petty vandalism on the house. With a rise in the number of broken windows and minor damages done in the house whose expense of repair was not covered by the operating grant for the project) we decided that the house had outlived its worth and decided to operate the project without a central base such as the house provided.

Although the project has officially ended, we continue to go up three afternoons and three evenings a week on a volunteer basis. By this project we have managed to lessen a few barriers separating Queen's students from the North Kingston community and we continue to visit Rideau Street not as paid members of an "OFY" project but as people genuinely interested in the community and its residents.

The value of OFY projects (potentially a permanent feature of Canadian life) may well lie chiefly in the impact they make in the future and not in the "monitoring" of immediate effects nor in the prejudices of their detractors or believers. Their benefits will have to be evaluated on their own criteria by those they touch and by the community which responds to them.

Sincerely,
Members of the Family Centre

Toronto Mass prostituted?

Dear Editors:

The introduction given to the Toronto Mass at their McArthur Hall concert on Sunday evening was an insult to the group. It was suggested by the individual who carried out this task that the group had come to present a concert simply to make everyone "feel good". If he was embarrassed to speak in anything but generalities, then I think he should have declined the task.

Although they sought assuredly to radiate a spirit of brotherhood, it occurs to me that the Mass' purpose was unmistakable specific; i.e., the presentation of the Good News of the Gospel. Most, if not all of, the songs they sang, and the fact that some of the most moving of these were composed by a member of the group, attest to this aim.

If, as suggested during the performance, the Toronto Mass does return for a fall concert, may I express the hope that they be introduced with words that more accurately reflect their character -- or, if the AMS deems it unwise to permit this, no introduction at all, which would be better than the one recently weighed upon them.

Unwelcome in Summerhill

Dear Editors:

I have attended Queen's for one whole year (1971-72 winter session and intersession) and now am in summer school. In all this time I have not had cause to register one complaint.

However, I visited Summerhill the other day after doing research for an art history essay, in the hopes of having my one and only look at the place before I completed my paper. The professor had assured us that we were more than welcome to look around -- the atmosphere, on the contrary, was anything but friendly. I was barely throught the west entrance when I was severely reprimanded for my unathorized presence. I stated that I have been (I presumed) ill-advised as to existing conditions. I was told that under no circumstances could I go upstairs, but, finally, that I could look through the downstairs. I replied that I had already done so, and took my departure.

I blamed this conduct on the school of nursing, a representative of which I had been unfortunate enough to meet up with.

Since the building is, after all, an official historic site, and the landmark of the college, no doubt there are many others who, for reasons not at all academic, would like to see the place. May I suggest that, in order to save others my embarrassment, the nursing science people (whose work, I cannot but believe, must be terribly important) relinquish their space to another department whose time is not so precious, and-or whose interests are those of the university in general.

This, I am sorry to say, will be my first and last visit to Summerhill.

Pensons-y -- Quebec libre?

Dear Editors:

First I must say that I am not very interested either in political problems or in economic ones. Since we have to give our opinion on such questions, however, I will try to express my viewpoint about the independence of Quebec.

Quebec is Canada's largest province. Most of its population is French. That implies a way of living and thinking different from Quebec's English neighbours.

Let's examine the problem from two sides. Quebec is a country inside another. As I said, its population is mostly French. But those French people are surrounded by English-speaking people who are fundamentally different from French-Canadians. This situation engenders a problem whose solution could be Quebec's freedom as a state, as a country or as a government.

Up to now, French have been ruled by English-thinking politicians who are the federal power. Of course, Quebec has its own government, which has only a provincial relevance. But it is still partly under the federal jurisdiction. And the people of Quebec just can't stand either federal intrusions in Quebec's administration, in Quebec's laws, or financial help from the central government. In my opinion, that is one of the reasons why Quebeckers want to be free to rule themselves, in their own way, or to be responsible according to their needs both social and economic. But on the other hand, it is very difficult for the federal government to vote laws satisfying both English and French Canadians, Quebec needs one law, and the other nine provinces others. The federal government should treat Quebec in a special way because French-Canadians and English people do not share the same needs. There is something else. Quebec's French population constitute a minority compared to Canada's English population. Their demands can hardly be put into practice without provoking an unfavourable reaction from the other English provinces.

The other side of the problem is a cultural one. In fact the problem has its roots in a confrontation between the French and the English culture. They, I mean the Quebeckers, are afraid of being in the minority, are afraid of being assimilated by English people. French-Canadians are very attached to their civilisation, to their culture and language. English are seen as conquerors or colonizers. Once free, Quebec could be sure to keep all she cares about, and she would remain a French country with a French culture, a French way of life and French traditions.

Something good could result from Quebec's separation. In fact, she would rule herself according to her own needs, her own viewpoint and so forth. Another aspect could be that, once independent, Quebec could be a country, a French country. She would have her own government, her own laws, her own language – and she would become homogeneously cultured.

Summer school students

(Editors' note: The following paragraph appeared under the heading "Editor's Comments" in last week's issue of Quassa, the summer school association newsletter. We aren't quite sure how to react to it. Sure summer school students are a special breed. So are medsmen. So are graduate students. But they're all students and share a wide variety of student problems. At least, that's what we thought.)

In spite of my previous comments on the average summer school student, I feel that this person is a special breed. Not likely do you see such a student who is so interested, and energetic about courses in the regular winter session. They seem to have a drive to match the hurried pace of summer school. Time is so short that little free time is allowed for anything but studies. These six-week-wonder-students have the proper motivation to succeed, their own invested money and living expenses as well as the projected salary-hike in the fall. Summer School students deal in realities of life and are not fogged up with ideals of little observable value unless it is immediate to them. They are also worldly enough to realize the true value of education at the university level. Their vision of life is not clouded by the short sightedness of people who have not yet challenged the real world. Although not involved actively in the university scene, excluding enjoying the odd social scene, summer school students willingly attend and pay for their attendance, not by lack of nothing better to do but by choice of furthering their knowledge. It is no wonder this different breed wishes to keep its identity separate from the regular student.

"Mourir" ou "ne pas vivre"?

Chèrs Redacteurs:

C'est un mort ressuscité qui vous parle. J'ai décidé entre deux vers de revenir conscient, car avec tous les commentaires que suscite le Québec depuis les dernières élections, je ne pouvais plus me décomposer en paix.

Donc, afin de tuer ma curiosité, j'ai regardé légèrement votre monde pour savoir si je devais "ne pas vivre" ou "mourir", et j'ai décidé de "mourir", car c'est plus simple et moins engageant. "Ne pas vivre", c'est se condamner à être fier, à combattre, à être seul.

"Mourir", c'est fantastique car l'on s'enterre dans un bien-être qui vous rend insconscients de sa nation et de ses problèmes.

Le cimitière dans lequel je gis est pourri de drogue, de publicité, de faux, et de bien d'autres parasites qui m'aident à me décomposer.

Ne tuez pas les mirages que je me mortifie à vous décrire, car sinon vous serez obligés de vous engager sur une voie pénible voire sans issue.

Pour que vous soyez certains de mourir d'une belle-mort: incorporez-vous à la (bonne) société, liverez-vous à ses caprices, et en retour elle se chargera de vous embaumer avec volupté et de vous dévorer avec sensualité.

Maintenant que ma pensée est livrés, je m'endormirai la conscience libre et continuerai a me décomposer en paix; car si vous suivez ma philosophie, le silence sera établi.

"Que l'inconscience ait ma pensée!"

Gypsy could have been a winner

By Marney Cousins

If Gypsy had had more of the Gypsy and less of Rose, the St. Lawrence Summer Theatre would now be running its second hit of summer 72. The production is sporadic. Fast-moving, well-choreographed numbers clash with pieces which appear to have been rote memorized. The fluctuation of the musicals tempo gives a feeling similar to that of being on a roller coaster. One minute the dancing chorus singing Mr. Goldstone exhilarates the audience. In the following scene while singing You'll Never Get Away From Me, Rose puts forth more feeling for her chow mein than for Herbie. It is this vacillating pattern which flaws a potentially exciting production.

Barbara Marrison's performance as Rose sets the sliding scale in Gypsy. Throughout the majority of the first act, her actions are stilted and without feeling. The true bite and gumption in a stage mother is completely missing. Miss Marrison can vocally carry Rose, but lacks sensitivity towards the action of the scene and the other actors. Her characterization never really jells and is only most effective when charged by the sensitive portrayals of Herbie and Louise.

Gerry Millar delivers a strong performance as the emasculated agent, overshadowed by Rose in all he does. His movements are natural and appear as a facet of the real Herbie. He is baffled by Rose's manipulations and finally her continuous show drive triggers his assertion of his manhood. As Herbie leaves, he takes a large portion of Gypsy with him.

The production misses going into a tailspin with Mr. Millar's exit, as the final blow for Herbie conceives "the" Gypsy Rose Lee. Barbara Edwards as Gypsy is superb! Her metamorphosis from the gangling Louise into the strutting Gypsy mesmerized the audience. Miss Edwards' delivery is clear, strong, and filled with motion. She listens to the other actors, heightening their characterizations and her own. The rise of Gypsy Rose Lee is analogous with the rest of the production. She completely makes it all the way to the top -- the others don't.

There are many fine cameo roles in the musical. Mr. G. Simonett as Tulson, Jacki Berry as June, Lillius Whiteland as Tessie and Jennifer Hidges as Mazepa raise the energy level of Gypsy each time they appear. These characters possessed the spunk and depth missing in many other sections.

Gypsy is a brightly-costumed, lavish musical that is initially satisfying. It appears to be on the right track in the many good moments it holds. The choreography is tight, costumes vivid, and the music catchy. The energy level so often is right on. If only Rose had felt this and harnessed it into her character, Gypsy would have been a winner.

Midsummer Night's Yawn

by Paul Gompertz

"It is not enough to speak, but to speak true." Had Theatre 5's production of A Midsummer Night's Dream shown greater credence in this axiom from the play itself, the end product would have been considerably improved.

As it was, the derogation of the lines of the play was the outstanding feature of this production. A Midsummer Night's Dream is one of the earlier plays, and one of its prime characteristics is its preponderance of end-strapped lines and rhyming couplets. These present problems to the actors, for it is easy to lapse into a sing-song nursery-rhyme delivery which limps along the regular iambic rhythm of the speeches. The four lovers especially found it impossible to feel anything but the rhythm of the verse, and as a result their delivery was intensely tedious. Theresa Sears as Helena was the worst culprit, and her voice, which is by nature highly unsuited to dramatic delivery, lapsed into a predictability of modulation which was distracting and irritating.

Cindy Wells as Hermia was the least cupable of the lovers, and managed to display some genuine feeling for her part. The two men, meanwhile, were content to substitute volume for emotion, which resulted in pusillanimous performances from both.

Daniel Buccos as Theseus was at least interesting, and the production followed Peter Brook's lead of doubling the part of Theseus and Oberon. There was little distinction between the two, for the latter was simply a gross exaggeration of the former. There was nothing kingly, regal, stately or imposing about this Oberon, and the wide variety of inflection in the delivery of lines was produced by totally gratuitous modulations.

The production also lacked any form of consistency. Oberon was scruffy and human, in contrast to a diaphanous and fairy-like Titania. Stage illusion was shattered, as when Oberon entered with a flying leap, crashed down next to a sleeping Titania, made her visibly shake, and then turned and put his finger to his lips to signal to Puck to be quiet. This is a typical example of a number of similar infelicities, and the overall effect was flaccid and indeterminate.

The production wasn't helped by Gordon Robertson's almost non-existent direction, which was essentially two-dimensional in effect, and for the vast majority of the time ignored all the acting area except the proscenium. There was little action as such, and the play drifted from one tableau vivant to another. That such a fast-moving and lively play should be so stifled and cramped was in itself remarkable; coupled with the other failings it was disastrous.

The "rude mechanicals" provided welcome relief, for they were consciously funny and gave opportunity for legitimate amusement. They stood out from the rest of the play, but this was partly due to the deceptive nature of broad comedy, for they were still far from realising their full comic potential.

The audience at the performance was a very small one, and epitomised the general nature of Theatre 5's recent following. Unless the standards of production next year are considerably higher, I can see nothing that might reverse the trend, though I must confess I did not see The Homecoming or La Ronde, which, it is rumoured, were slightly better than the normal fare provided by Theatre 5.

OFY director defends local projects

Max Beck, National Director of Opportunities for Youth told a press conference on Friday that he had "come to Kingston as a result of the flak in the Globe and Mail two weeks ago but was entirely satisfied with the eight projects he had just seen."

At the same time, however, he announced that changes are to be made in certain projects. The staff of the Community Service Centre will be reduced from nine to five people and the group has been advised to make house calls in order to increase their clientele.

Parent Helpers, the project designed to aid welfare families by providing free babysitting, will also experience a staff decrease from five to four people.

"These decreases in personnel are not punitive measures but mostly the result of people leaving," Beck tried to assure the Journal.

The work load of Environmental Productions has been increased to include work on other community projects. Beck said that "rather than put people out of a job we would prefer to find more for them to do."

In response to a question concerning a recommendation from Kingston city council for municipal screening of projects. Beck said he was "not keen on the idea."

"It would involve setting up a huge bureaucratic machine and municipalities might want people to work on their own projects rather than new ones," he added.

Beck said he was in favour of regional selection because it would be "easier to coordinate."

Local selection committees were responsible for choosing projects this year in Cornwall and Sault St. Marie. This Process is presently being evaluated by a consulting firm.

Also available for comment on this subject was Graham Deline, District OFY officer. The Journal has been trying unsuccessfully to get in touch with him ever since the controversial Globe article two weeks ago.

Deline said he was not sorry about any of the decisions concerning which projects were financed. "However, I am not entirely satisfied with the way we selected projects," he added.

An effort was apparently made to ask Social Planning Council what type of project was needed most in Kingston However, a decision had to be made before evaluation of project applications arrived from the Council

The Opportunities for Youth Program has been greatly criticized for its lack of coordination and supervision In defining his role, Deline said, "I don't see myself as a boss. If projects were too tightly supervised they would lose their educational benefit. I just shoot the shit and discuss ideas with them."

Many projects have also complained that organization has been hindered by the late announcement of selected projects This year the announcement was not made until late April Beck said he shared this concern with the students. "However, it is difficult to remedy in lieu of the fact that OFY is only an ad hoc thing and it takes a political decision each year to set the wheels in motion," he commented.

Late cheques have also been the cause of many project problems. But Beck said this was "not altogether the fault of the people in Ottawa." "Sometimes projects don't send in their financial statements early enough," he said.

Both Beck and Deline believed that the general depiction of OFY projects in Kingston was unfair They also stressed the educational value of the projects "OFY gives students the chance to put into practice their own inovative ideas, Beck said and added that community colleges in Alberta are granting credits for OFY projects, because they feel the projects provide a better experience than many courses"

Journal

Vol. XCIX, No. 80, Thurs., Aug. 10, 1972

It was a very good year

With some real regrets, a core staff comes to the end of the summer, and thus the end of the year's publication of The Queen's Journal. It was a very good year.

From September orientation until April examinations, co-editors of The Journal, volume XCIX, were Leslie D. H. Kaye and Bill Johnston. Since they retired, at the end of the real academic year, The Journal has operated with a few diehards and no formal editor. This volume of The Journal has broken records, set precedents, made enemies, and tried hard to be a living newspaper in a university which is now the size of a small city. We survey the year's issues and conclude that, well, we could have done better; we could also have done worse.

The Journal has served the Queen's community for ninety-nine years now, since its first issue appeared on October 10, 1873. Thus, when The Journal resumes publication in September (the first issue is scheduled for September 14), it will be modestly titled Volume C.

Editor-in-chief of The Journal for 1972-73 will be Jennifer Grass. Some of the past year's stalwarts and the present summer's enthusiasts will be on the staff; others will be gone. Time passes and The Journal keeps publishing.

We thank all those who have helped with Volume XCIX -- the staff, permanent and transitory alike; the advertisers; most of all, the readers who have grumbled and written letters and occasionally praised, if praise were ever due. We look forward to your support again very soon.

newsbriefs

Discipline gets first test

The discipline system set up last spring has had its first test.

The "filter tribunal" met July 24 to hear a student appeal against an academic decision, according to a brief statement released by the university. The statement did not name the student or give details of his grievance.

"The Committee decided that in the circumstances of this case the appeal should be dismissed as unjustified," the statement said.

The filter committee can take that action, can refer a case to a proper deliberative body, or can send it on to the Ultimate Tribunal -- an outside arbitrator -- for a decision.

It consists of three student senators (in this case Ed Devai of education, Frances Rancier of nursing and Dave Prichard of theology) and three faculty senators (this time Dr. John Stedmond of English, Dr. L. G. Berry of Geology and Dr. W. G. Breck of chemistry).

Queen's benefits

A public letter from Queen's principal Dr. John J. Deutsch has notified university employees of new fringe benefit arrangements which, the letter says, will benefit most staff considerably.

The major changes are the abolition of a maximum number of days of sick leave per year, an increase in the university's share of health insurance premiums from one-third to two-thirds (over a period of eighteen months), and an increase in the employee's share of premiums for long-term disability insurance.

The new fringe benefit package was planned by university staff with tax and insurance experts and government tax officials.

Further information is available from the university's personnel department.

Surgery head to retire

Dr. J. R. McCorriston, head of the department of surgery, has given notice that he will retire as department head at the end of June 1973, and the principal of Queen's has appointed a committee to search for a successor.

Chairman of the committee will be Dr. Douglas O. Waugh, vice-principal (health sciences). It also includes nine medical faculty members, the executive director of Kingston General Hospital (since surgery is a department of KGH as well as of Queen's), the principal himself (Dr. John J. Deutsch) ex officio, and two outside advisers, both medical professors from other Ontario universities.

No PO codes for Queen's

Queen's does not have its postal codes assigned yet, despite form letters from the government which assign codes to a number of university departments.

The form letters arise from a post office error, according to a statement issued by George Wattford, director of university services. In fact, Queen's as a whole will have only one of a few codes, and details of the arrangements will not be worked out until later this year, Wattsford said.

He added that a department which receives a government notice of a postal code should not use the code, but should notify the manager of administrative services (Ken Bickerstaffe, in the interim office building).

A notice in the fall will tell departments what postal codes they should use.

Study status of women

Principal John J. Deutsch announced last month the appointment of a Principal's Committee on the Status of Women at Queen's.

The Committee will review the status of women at Queen's in their roles as members of the academic faculty, of the administrative and academic support staff and as students.

Mrs. L. Good, chief of the Acquisitions Division, Douglas Library, will chair the committee meetings which begin in September.

At that time the committee will decide whether to proceed by compiling briefs or holding hearings.

AMS rumbles; mumbles and does

. . . a few jottings on whats been sorta happening...

Charter Bus Service: Wally's been negotiating with Voyageur Colonial and everything seems pretty well set for a regular weekend bus service from campus to Toronto and campus to Ottawa. The normal return fares to Toronto are: by train, $15.60 (+ plus taxi); by bus $14.20 (+ taxi). Our service will offer the trip for $9.00. To Ottawa (return) fares are normally $11.80 by train and $9.90 by bus. We'll offer it for $6.00. This service will represent a considerable saving to all students going home to these cities, or going to away-games, etc.

Free City Bus Service will be offered (we think, with some certainty) to all Queen's Students for the 6 wk. period from October 1 to November 15. This free bus service is being offered by the P.U.C. with the understanding that we will hold a referendum to see if the students would want to pay a lump sum for similar "free" service – ie. the A.M.S. would have a contract with the P.U.C. for so-much-a-head. There will be absolutely no charge for the 6 week trial period no matter what the outcome of the vote. At this point we're only waiting for the final answer from the P.U.C.

It's come to our attention that there will be 200 freshmen living on the West Campus so this service will be especially helpful to them. Also students will be able to ride the bus to the city limits when they are hitch-hiking out of town or take a bus to the new stadium during football season.

United Appeal: We're hoping to make our strongest effort ever: We're planning a dance following a football game, an entry in the Row for Dough, and a bicycle race sponsored by the mile.

Fee Increase: Students at Queen's and across Ontario will vote October 11 and 12 on whether to conduct a strike in protest of government - directed increases in university and college tuition fees. All students are asked to pay their fees in the two-installments which most universities allow - half in September and half in January. This will permit the October referendum on whether to strike in January.

It'll be up to us to make sure everybody is completely aware of all the details.

Canada Student Loans Plan: Ken Wong, Ross Dunsmore and gang are working feverishly on a study concerned with the CSLP. It's good to see Queen's people taking the initiative on the financing of post-secondary education. This will undoubtedly be the most important issue facing students in the coming months.

Provincial Speakers Programme: Lyn Whitham and the Education Commission are starting to organize this one.

University Centre Management Study Group: lots

Pub Expansion: George Smith, our illustrious Pub Manager and John Veenstra, our illustrious Pub manager-to-be, and Wally report that new washrooms will be installed in the House of Commons and the T.V. room will be annexed to become the House of Hashish.

Pub: Bitter Grounds: The big dispute was settled to everybody's satisfaction. The Pub will operate Monday - Friday and the Grounds takes over on Saturday and Sunday. Many have high hopes for the Sunday evening Grounds. Not only will it be the only game in town, but the pace may be what many people are looking for at that time.

Rehab. Girls: Recently the Ontario Federation of Students passed 3 motions:

1. condemning the removal of the stipend that was being paid to the girls.
2. condemning the fact that the cutbacks were made without consultation of those affected.
3. supporting the notion that students who are involved with on-the-job training should be paid commensurate with their commercial value. George Kerr, Minister of Colleges and Universities, says the stipends aren't his bag but he'll look into their eligibility for student loans (a put off). Syl Apps is giving us a hand.

K.G.H. Nurses As Associate A.M.S. Members: The K.G.H. Nurses are interested in being linked with the A.M.S. Actually they would like to get into a few of our activities like concerts, sports events and the Phys. Ed. Centre. Naturally they would have to pay a good portion of the non-academic student interest fee. This is only in the planning stages as yet but everything looks good for the go-ahead.

New Office Staff: We hired two new people. One is a bookkeeper for the services - something badly needed that should help out with our accounting in services like the Pub, Tumblewood (nee Heffalump), Typing Service, etc. This is another step in getting Q.S.A. off the ground. The second girl we hired is for the typing service.

New Office: We're having the Outer Office partioned off for the Commissioners.

Bike Parking Lots: We've had a few requests for a bike parking lot so we're looking into how they work and for how much.

Dining Committee: . . . for Wallace Hall and Coffee Shop . . . to provide effective liaison between those who patronize the food service facilities and the caterer and the University Administration. This one's in the clouds as we're waiting 'till the Fall to get somebody to serve on it.

Grey Cup Parade: . . . the Queen's Band will most likely represent Queen's and Kingston in the Grey Cup Parade in Hamilton as our part in the Tercentennary celebrations.

Queen's Tartan: . . . if anybody on Council is interested in finding out what uses we could put the tartan to, and how we'd go about doing it, let us know.

Phys. Ed. Summer Fee: Wally did some digging and found that the $1.00 per month summer membership for winter students was unfair. It was subsequently lowered to $0.00. YEAH.

. . .if there's anything you want to help us carry through let us know . . . there's more . . .

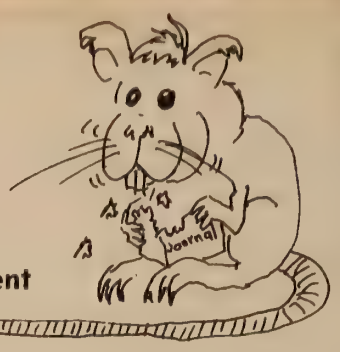
Meteor shower tomorrow night

The last few and next few days have hosted a number of interesting astronomical displays. There have been several unusually large solar flares (eruptions on the sun's surface) in the last few days. These eruptions cause many sub-atomic particles to enter the earth's atmosphere. The resulting disturbances disrupted some long range radio communications, and were also responsible for unusually fine displays of Northern Lights last weekend and early this week.



In addition, August is a prime month for meteorites ("shooting stars"). In the following article Peter Ryback of the Queen's Astronomy group tells a little about the August meteor showers (known as the Perseids).

The Perseids, the most widely observed annual shooting star display, will peak this year around midnight on Friday, August 11, when a single observer may see 50 or more shower members each hour. These meteors will appear to diverge from a point in the constellation Perseus which is low in the northeast before midnight. This point, termed the radiant, is an effect of perspective. Meteors appearing near the radiant have short trails, those far from it much longer ones. Perseid meteors appear as white, very swift shooting stars. Many are bright and often leave persistent trains.

A meteor shower, in general, occurs when the earth, in motion about the sun, intercepts small solid particles distributed around the orbit of an old or extinct comet. In the event, as for the Perseids, the particles are evenly distributed about the comet's orbit, the meteor shower is of the same strength year after year. Other meteor streams, however, may be relatively young in which case the particles are concentrated in a small dense cloud. In most years, a meteor shower from such a stream may be weak. However, when the earth intercepts the main cloud of particles, a very strong shower can occur. Such a phenomenon occured during the Leonid meteor display of November, 1966.

This year is a favourable one for the Perseids, as the moon will only be 3 days old at shower maximum, resulting in a dark sky for most of the night.

I have followed with great interest the debate taking place between summer school students and regular session students concerning the identity of the former group. I imagine it has been going on for years, and the current flurry of publicity just indicates a vocal point in the continum.

The Queen's Summer School Association (QSSA), the elected government of the summer students, has decided that summer students are distinct from regular session students. They refuse to be lumped with the winter masses, and they point to the special qualities of the summer student to make their point. The best expression of this attitude came in the publication of Quassa, the QSSA weekly news-sheet, several weeks ago.

The editor of Quassa termed the summer student "a special breed", that is more interested and energetic about courses than winter students, and in possession of an unmatched drive among Queen's students. He points out that the summer student has "the proper motivation to succeed", which turns out to be that he is paying for his own education. The editor also says that the summer school student possesses an unclouded vision of reality, a vision not polluted by idealism. Winter students, he advises, are short-sighted, for they "have not yet challenged the real world". He concludes, "It is no wonder this different breed wishes to keep its identity separate from the regular student."

From this side of the debate, it occurs to me that the summer students are taking an elitist role. They are claiming special qualities which make them different and distinct from other Queen's students, and they want others to recognize these qualities.

As Prof. Arthur Lower pointed out to us at the spring convocation, there is nothing wrong with elitism. People form elites on the basis of skills and qualities that they possess as a group, and this makes them distinct from others. He noted that society needs elites to keep running. His example was that a person would be hesitant to call any man in from the street to remove his appendix; rather, he would call a doctor, a member of an elite group with the special quality of being able to remove an appendix.

However, in this case, the elitist tendencies of QSSA and Quassa is a fundamental contributing agent to the flurry of debate.

The Alma Mater Society, the student government of the winter session students, abhors elitism. It has been consistent during the past few years that the people who eventually form the AMS government campaign on a platform of populism, and disavow any elitist tendencies. They guarantee that the AMS will be returned to the poeple, and that they are not part of any ruling clique.

For most students, the AMS appears as an elite and effete group, and despite that fact that the AMS does provide some worthy services, they heartily condemn the AMS as elitist. Very few students become involved with the AMS, and thus they never have a chance to dispel this impression. It exists on the periphery of their consciousness as a group of snobby big-shots.

Now, nobody wants to be known as a snobby big-shot, and so consecutive groups of AMS officers spend great amounts of their energy trying to appear humble and concerned with the plight of the average student. This becomes very difficult when the university constantly asks students to become involved in the running of the Univeristy; when they ask students to sit on committees and boards which will shape the Queen's of 1980 and 1990, a projection that bears little relevance to the class of 1975.

When the summer students start claiming an elitist position, there is a natural clash. The AMS people always fight the image of elitism, and are baffled by a group wanting to be elitist. The AMS is constantly trying to get more people involved in both the AMS and the governing of the University, and suddenly they confront a group which doesn't want to get involved.

The resulting clash of ideologies raises debate and claims of distinctiveness. However, there is one practical area that is of great concern, and is quite apart from ideological questions. Who is paying for what?

Winter students pay a fee to the AMS which does several things. First, it has paid and is paying for the Students' Memorial Union, and is paying and will pay for part of the new University Centre. In addition, the fee set up the student pubs and other such services as the typing and duplicating service. The fee publishes the Queen's Journal, which is not the official QSSA publication, but is still read by most summer students.

At any rate, QSSA still maintains its elitist position, and the AMS still doesn't really understand it, and the bills are being paid. I shudder to think what would happen if we ever went on the semester system.

A Modest Proposal for

A Canadian Bill of Obli

Dr. Shumiatcher is a western Canadian Barrister. In 1947, he drafted Canada's first Bill of Rights, an Act that was passed that year by the Saskatchewan Legislature. Its purpose was to give expression to certain basic human rights and fundamental freedoms. Chief among these was the right to equality of treatment in all economic relationships without discrimination because of an individual's race, religion, creed, colour, or ethnic or national origin.

In the 25 years that have passed since writing that statute, the terms of which have been reflected in many parts of the Canadian Bill of Rights and in similar statutes passed by almost every other province, Dr. Shumiatcher has become as concerned over the duties of citizens as he has been over their rights. He presents here a novel draft for an Act of Parliament designed to impose obligations and duties upon the one class of citizens that may be expected to gladly assume them — our politicians. The reactions of those who are members of Parliament and of provincial legislatures and those who aspire to become members of these bodies, will be a matter of some interest to all Canadians.

—Editor

An Act for the better definition and enforcement of the obligations of politicians to the citizens of Canada.

PREAMBLE

The Parliament of Canada, affirming that the Canadian Nation is founded upon principles that acknowledge and advance a society of free men and women and free institutions, and that these depend upon the exercise by all citizens of their right to elect as their representatives to sit in the House of Commons, persons charged with the responsibility

(a) of gathering and understanding facts and assessing and fairly judging of them;

(b) of giving mature consideration to conflicting interests and justly balancing them upon their merits without personal bias or interest;

(c) of listening to those who struggle to make themselves heard and of independently considering their opinions;

(d) of expressing the will of those whom they represent;

(e) of doing all things that preserve the life, reputation and property of every citizen and of refraining from doing all things that may derogate from any individual's enjoying thereof;

(f) of husbanding the property that is taken by the processes of taxation and held in trust by the Government of Canada for the benefit of the Nation and of prudently and economically administering the public purse, applying to the task the same care that each of them would bring to the governance of his own personal affairs;

(g) of laying upon their agents who are the employees in the public service of Canada the duty to apply the law equally fairly and without excess of zeal;

And being desirous of declaring these principles, which honour and custom have imposed upon all Members of the House of Commons, and of enshrining the duties and responsibilities that each Member assumes and bears by virtue of his Office;

And in order that there may be ever present to his mind these duties, to refresh his conscience and govern his conduct within the House of Commons and beyond; and to the end that all Citizens of Canada, howevermuch they may dissent on other issues, may regard with confidence and respect the integrity of all Members of Parliament, without which the principles of representative democratic government cannot function or survive;

What's Up, Doc?

by Paul Gompertz

Everything from the movie What's Up Doc is old hat, from the basic 'mistaken identy' motif which generates the action to the final unexpected reunion of father and daughter. But, because the movie has no pretensions to novelty, and races along with tongue in cheek vigor, it is a comic success. There is no depth to, or justification for, the actions of the movie, but they are perfect comic material. Barbara Streisand has some great one-liners and her caricature 'stooges' play up to her perfectly.

Without a doubt, the highlight of the movie is a spectacular and hilarious car chase through San Francisco which borrows unashamedly from 'Bullitt', and the Burglars, and a host of others, and which sends up the current vogue for more and more thrilling and spectacular chases, as in the 'French Connection' and 'Puppet on a Chain'.

It is difficult to find much to say about a movie which trys to do no more than be comic. It becomes a matter of success or failure, and this movie is a success. I would especially urge those who were nauseated by the cloying sentimentality of 'Love Story' to go and see 'What's Up, Doc?'. I wouldn't dream of quoting the last two lines of the movie but coming from Ryan O'Neal, they are precious!

The movie is directed by Peter Bogdanovitch (The Last Picture Show) and while his direction is inobstrusive, it is an essential part of the movie's success, for it is his guiding hand that holds the movie in control, and avoids the over-emphasis which would have ruined it.

For laughter, and no more, it is a must, and I would urge anyone who wants nothing more than relaxing entertainment to go and see 'What's Up, Doc?' at the first opportunity.

Tent finally finds success

by Jennifer Grass

Forty Carats, a comedy by Jay Allen was produced with unusual expertise by the Summer Playhouse Company at the Tent Theatre.

The play looks at the generation gap from the other side. Ann Stanley, an attractive forty year old divorcee and mother of a seventeen year old daughter falls in love with a boy almosttwice as young as her. Rita Barnes brings to this role a convincing and comic flavour. And her lover, Peter Latham played by Gordon Love, gives an equally strong performance. The conflict set up here is both credible and amusing.

But the plot is further complicated by an affair between millionaire Eddy Edwards and Ann's daughter Trina. Jennifer Law portrays this supposedly hip chick, Trina in a very stiff and sterotyped manner. And unfortunately Wilf Thomas gives an equally unconvincing performance of Edwards. The hillbilly accent is excessively overdone although the looks and gestures are right.

But Ron MacPherson rescues them by his competent performance of the comic figure Billy Boylan, ex-husband friend and hanger-on. And sometimes, Majorie Preston steals the limelight as Ann's social climbing mother, Maud Hayes.

The fast pace of the play is maintained by witty dialogue and convincing acting which lead eventually to a surprising climax.

Forty Carats is produced with the sound direction of Peter Lichtenfels, who replaces Lee Tommarrello. Lichtenfels has a light but sensitive touch in interpreting this play. And this is reinforced by the performances of his cast.

Art is therapeutic

Dear Editors:

With reference to the Newsbrief in your last edition regarding the discoveries made by three Art students - on an O.F.Y. grant - that art can be therapeutic for psychiatric patients - I should like to make the following statement. This "Therapeutic Art" has been conducted with psychiatric patients, in Canada and abroad, both at diagnostic and treatment levels for at least the past 15 years, both by Occupational Therapists and Psychologists. Its values have been proven and documented repeatedly. Occupational Therapy Departments in many psychiatric hospitals have art instructors on their staff, or are skilled at teaching the patient the basic techniques themselves.

Had either the Government or these students involved researched this more carefully, then perhaps the money allotted them could have been channeled into more appropriate-streams which may have benefitted either physically or psychiatrically handicapped individuals to a far greater extent.

(Ms.) L. Rutherford, O.T. Reg.

(Editors' note: A spokesman for the school of rehab therapy at Queen's agreed that art is a common tool in occupational therapy for psychiatric patients. But, she said, the OFY summer project at Kingston Psychiatric Hospital is not duplicating any existing work with patients, and does not claim to be actual "therapy". Rather, she said, the OFY project involves "art classes for psychiatric patients" who are not receiving therapy of a similar kind, and is being carried on in cooperation with the occupational therapists at KPH.)

In union, strength

Dear Editors:

Since "Jacy" expressed her viewpoint about the independence of Quebec, I shall express mine.

It is true to say that Quebec is Canada's largest province; it is true to say that its population is mostly French, and it is also true to say that French Canadians are fundamentally different from English Canadians. However, this does not mean that Quebec's solution to this cultural problem lies in her independence. You have many federations in the world which can cope pretty well with cultural problems. For example let us take a look at Switzerland: she never had any problems, and I think it is actually impossible to foresee any, at least in the short run. Moreover, French Canadians do not seem to be aware of English Canada's cultural problems. Indeed, at least for the past ten years or so, English Canadians have struggled against Americanization. You are going to tell me that English Canadians speak the same language as the Americans and that many of them are Loyalists that came from the US after the American Independence War and that, in fact, they are Americans. This is not so.

You would really be surprised to see how, since the days of John A. Macdonald, English Canadians have been so busy trying to prove to the British that they were not British and to the Americans that they were not American. Like Quebec, English Canada became aware of her identity very recently, and at the same time. In fact. French Canadians do not seem aware that they are not struggling against anglicization as much as against Americanization. This is very simple.

Let us take a glance at Canada's economy, and we could see that it is greatly owned by American interests which indirectly leads to the pouring of American culture into Canada. If Canada is not strong enough economically to withstand American economic and therefore cultural intrusion in Canada, I would hardly see how a poor independent Quebec could succeed where Canada has failed. There is a French saying, l'Union fait la Force. I think that if Canada stands united, it has a better chance to resist the U.S. "pacific" invasion of Canada.

If Quebec separates from the rest of Canada, she will fail to preserve her culture and her traditions. Moreover French Canadians do not seem to be aware of the fact that Maritimers are not, and will never be, Westerners, that Ontarians will remain Ontarians, and that therefore there shouldn't be one law for the other nine English provinces.

"Jacy" also mentioned that Quebec doesn't like federal financial help; I then wonder why Quebec keeps on asking for more and more money from Ottawa. It is true to say that Quebec doesn't like federal intrusion in Quebec's political and social affairs, but Quebec asks for money from the federal government. In other words, Quebec wants Ottawa to mind its own business -- and she wants money from Ottawa as well. I think that if Quebec is to receive money from the federal government (and she receives more than she gives), she should stop complaining all the time or the federal government should withdraw any kind of financial help from Quebec.

Switzerland works

Dear Editors:

After reading the article and the subsequent letter by "Jacy" concerning the topic of Quebec separatism I would like to add a few comments on this problem. Everybody seems to agree that there is English Canada versus French Canada which is equal to a bunch of unsurmountable difficulties. That's the way it is. That there might be a half-way mark between those two cultures, a potential meeting point for the two sides - nobody appears to believe seriously in such a thing.

But it is possible both in theory and reality. Have a close look at Switzerland, a country known mainly for cheese, chocolates, watches and skiing. In this same country people speak four different native tongues; three of them are official languages. German is number one (65 per cent) followed by French, Italian and Romansh. Roughly one half each of the population belong to the Protestant and Catholic Churches. These religious groups do not follow the language borders. Throw in a couple of tough dividing mountains and squeeze the whole mix into a small spot about the size of Lake Ontario - a highly unstable product. Yet it works! It is not my intention to simply praise my home country. I just want to point out that it is entirely possible for different ethnic groups to live together without losing any of the precious individualities of the parts involved. Nothing is perfect: there is always a bit of sand somewhere in the democratic machinery of Switzerland but good-will and understanding from all parties concerned will get the gears back in shape. The existence and maybe necessity of certain gaps (particularly along the language boundaries) between different groups of citizens won't be denied by any Swiss. But the things in common are much more important.

Is there no similar way for Canada?

Tuition fee roundup

Dear Editors:

So what after all happened in the tuition fee furor?

For undergraduate students there is an across-the-board $100 increase and $200 more a year to pay back to the government for POSAP participants. POSAP is supposed to allow higher awards to meet the fee increase.

For full-time graduate students the fees will be increased to $877.50 per annum, although Kerr has allowed that for the '72-'73 session universities may provide bursaries of up to $300 to offset part of the 81 per cent increase of $392.50. Queen's has promised to provide these to all graduate students, making this year's fee about $580. It is not yet clear whether the $300 will simply not be charged or whether all will be charged the full fee and all will receive the full bursary. Kerr has also allowed that the maximum remuneration for teaching by grad students will be raised to $2400 per annum -- this is a red herring since fewer than a dozen Queen's grad students earned the old maximum of $1800. And Kerr did not give the universities any more money with which to pay the tuition bursaries or to provide more teaching opportunities.

For inactive, part-time and post-resident graduate students, Queen's has announced a 100 per cent increase to $300 per annum for the coming session.

So what happens next? Is this only one of the first steps on the way to Wright Report fees as high as $2250? This is the fourth tuition fee increase for graduate students in as many years. But Kerr's office is still getting 25 letters a day against the latest fee and POSAP changes – the greatest volume of mail DCU's ever had on anything. Write another one. The question of a fee strike was raised by the GSS at the April "Day of Mourning" and the proposed October referendum on a partial witholding of fees by all students we fully support. This fight is far from over.

Midsummer review

Dear Editors:

Theatre critics usually don't get much emotion from me because as long as they stay within the "fair comment rule" I feel each one to his own ipinion. But Paul Gompertz's recent review was so poorly done and his cutting remarks so unjust and his evaluation so unrealistic that it reflected negatively on the credibility of The Journal.

The most obvious point that Mr. Gompertz missed was the tone of the play. It was apparent from the costumes, the stage setting, and the attitude of the players that the theme was to make Shakespeare fun. And they succeeded. At least well enough that I put down my money twice and sat through two performances. The young lady who was my guest for one of the evenings agreed that the troupe had done a good job and were, indeed, entertaining. True, not Stratford level (where we often attend), but then a night at Stratford costs me $30, not $3, so I'm willing to settle for a little less from Theatre 5!

But, Mr. Gompertz, how could you be so mean to Theresa Sears, when she smiles so sweetly? And sir, if you missed Miss Sears' charm you have my sympathy, for then you're missing much that life has to offer. Admittedly, her talent was more visible in "La Ronde", but, unfortunately for you, you missed that one, eh?

Let's hope that the small audiences mentioned in the review are not directly attributable to such inappropriate critiques as Mr. Gompertz's article. Personally, Theatre 5 has helped me bear an otherwise dreary stay on the Queen's campus.

As a positive suggestion, perhaps Mr. Gompertz might be of greater value as an internal troubleshooter for The Journal, where his talent for pointed criticism should find virgin ground. This will leave the position of theatre critic for another staff member who has a better feeling for the performing arts and who, inevitably, will be more charitable.

(Editors' note: We took a poll around the office and generally agreed that Paul Gompertz was pretty hard on "A Midsummer Night's Dream". But we try to pick qualified reviewers and then let them write as they wish, harsh or othersiwe. Dissenting opinions are always welcome, as long as people remember that taste is, in the end, a personal thing; each to his own; and volunteer reviewers are always welcome too.)

UPPER MARLBORO Maryland - Arthur Bremer was found guilty of the shooting of George Wallace and three others last May, and sentenced to a total of 63 years in prison. The jury at the five-day trial took only 90 minutes to decide that Bremer was legally sane at the time of the shooting. During the trial, evidence showed that Bremer had travelled to Ottawa during President Nixon's visit last spring intending to assasinate Nixon, but security had been too tight.

Calgary considers US Police Chief
